

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

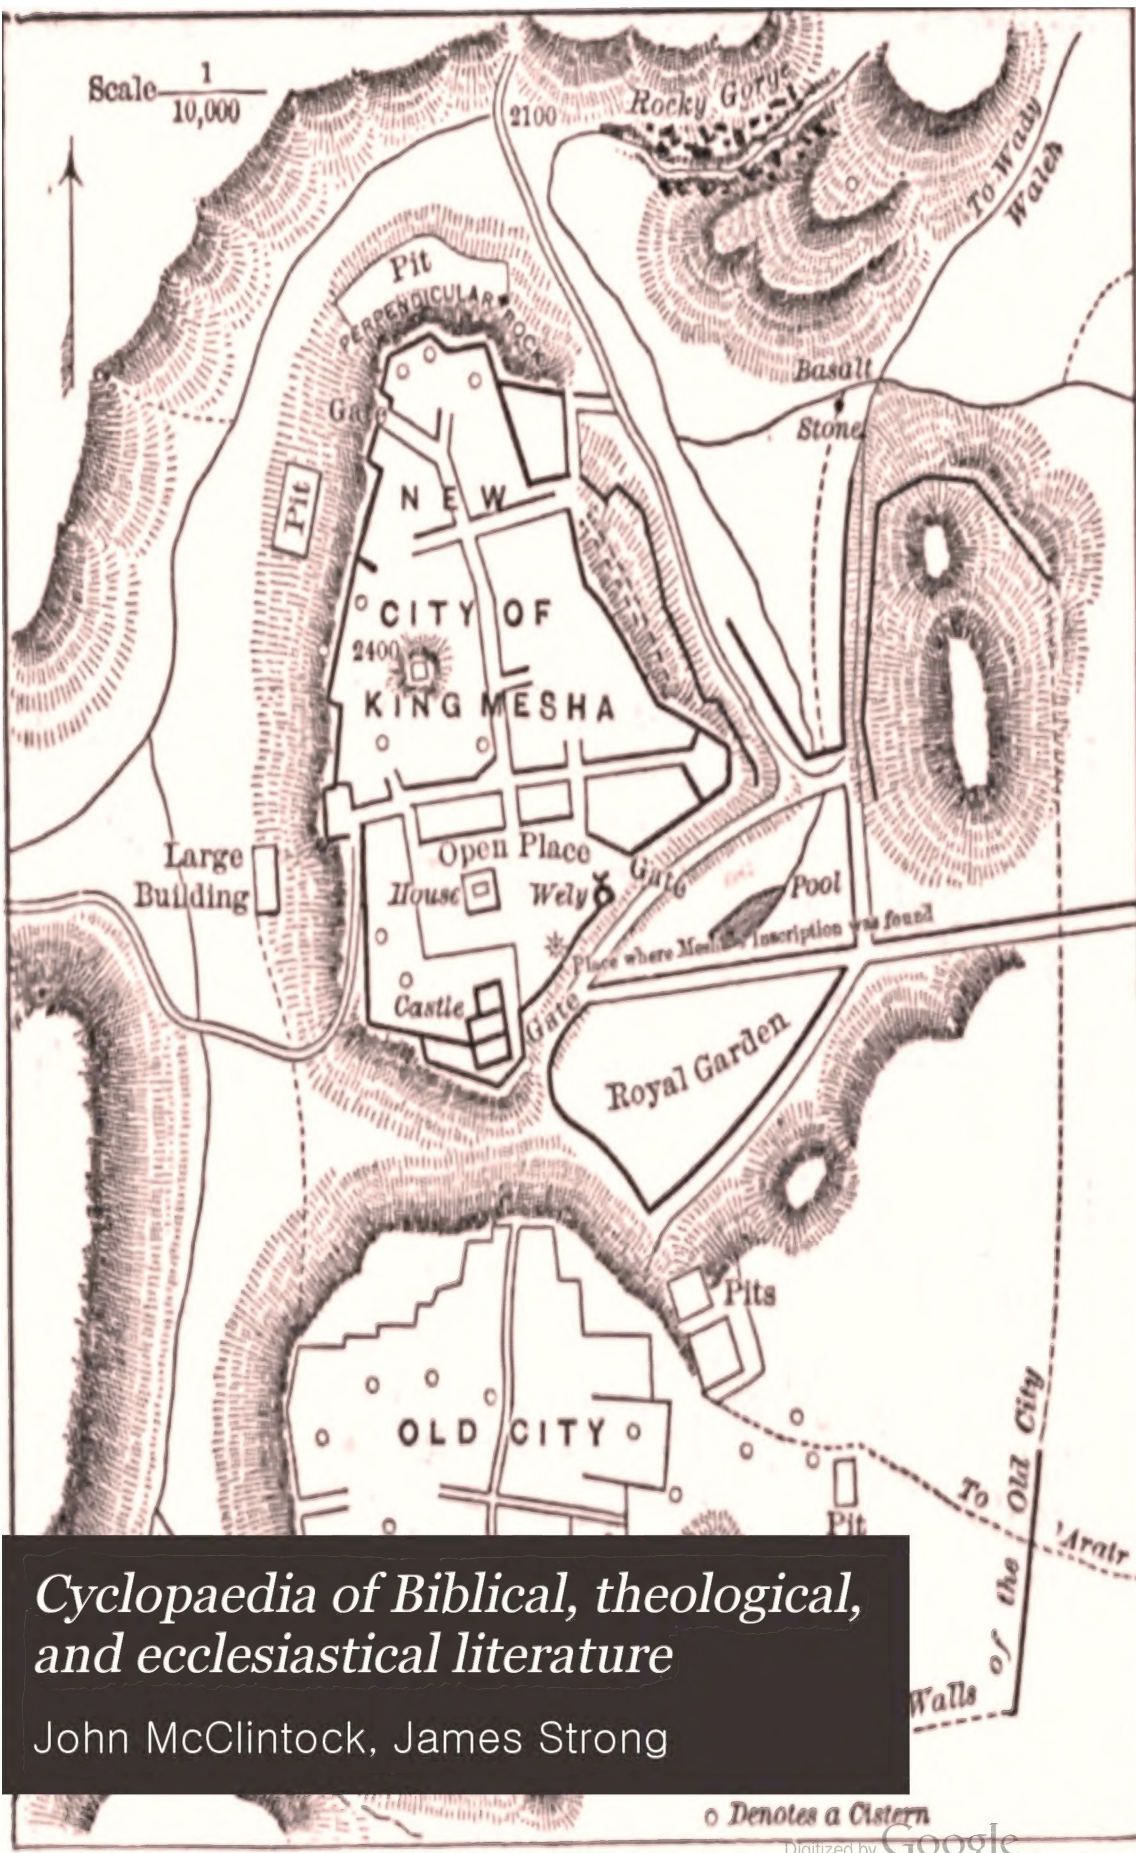

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. OF

BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE.

Co.

Coales, THOMAS THOMPSON, an English Congregational minister, was born at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, in 1784 or 1785. He studied at Cheshunt College, and labored successively at Ashbourne, Birmingham, Thrapston, Ebley, Gower, Hereford, Sleaford, St. Ives, Middleton, Kidderminster, Alfriston, Farrington, and East Grinstead. In 1850 he returned to Ashbourne, where he remained till his death, Oct. 26, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 209.

Coan, George Whitefield, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Bergen, Genesee Co., N. Y., Dec. 30, 1817. He graduated from Williams College in 1846, and from the Union Theological Seminary in 1849; was licensed to preach, and ordained June 6 of the same year. He selected Persia as the field of his labors, and in October he sailed for Ooroomiah, where he continued the labors of Perkins, Grant, Stoddard, Fisk, and Rice. After thirteen years of labor there his health failed, and he was compelled to return to America, but, two years later, having recruited his strength, he again sought his mission field, in 1864. Ten years of faithful toil again broke his health, and once more he sought its restoration in his native clime. Dr. Coan's heart was still with his brethren, and he availed himself of every opportunity to present the claims of Persia to the various Presbyterian churches in this country. He died at Wooster, O., Dec. 21, 1879. See N. Y. Observer, Jan. 1, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Coan, Leander Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born in Exeter, Me., Nov. 17, 1837. He attended the Exeter and Garland high-schools, and graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1862. He was acting pastor in Amherst and Aurora, from May, 1862, to June, 1863, when he was ordained as pastor of that parish. In May, 1864, he was dismissed to enter the army. From August, 1865, to September, 1867, he was acting pastor in Boothbay; from November, 1867, to November, 1870, preached in Brownville, and the following year in Somerset, Mass. From 1872 to 1874 he was city missionary in Fall River; from December, 1875, to June, 1879, he preached in Alton, N. H. When the Constitutional Convention of New Hampshire convened in 1877, he was elected its chaplain. He died Sept. 24, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 16.

Coanes, JOHN, an English Congregational minister, was born at Mile End, London, in 1777. He became a member of the Church in early life, entered Homerston College before he was twenty, and settled as a minister at Walworth, where he labored ten years. He afterwards labored successively at Morley, near Leeds, Keeth, in Yorkshire, Aylesbury, Folkestone, in Kent, Wycliffe Chapel, London, and Watford, Herts, where he remained five years, then resigned the active ministry, and retired to Hunton Bridge, near Watford. Here he taught a day-school, and preached occasionally for two years. His last days were spent at Bexley Heath, where he died, Nov. 6, 1862. Mr. Coanes was noted for his blameless life and faithful exhibition of evangelical truth. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 216.

Coarb (Cowarb, or Comharba; in Latin, corba; meaning conterraneus, or, of the same region) is the title in the Celtic-Irish and Scottish churches of the abbatial successor of the original founder of a monastery. So an abbot of Hy would be called the coarb of Columba; of Armagh, the coarb of Patrick, etc. The common use of the word dates from late in the 8th century, when such abbacies had become hereditary in many cases, and not only so, but had passed into the hands, in some instances, of laymen, while a prior discharged the spiritual office. Later the coarb became to a monastery what the herenach or uirchimeuch (i. e. lay advocate) was to any church, monastic or not. A female coarb occurs once or twice (Reeves, ad Adamn. Vita St. Columba, add. notes, p. 404). Coarbs that were still clergy became styled in Ireland, later, plebani=rural deans, or archpresbyters, or chorepiscopi (in the later sense of the word), i. e. the head of a "plebs ecclesiastica," viz. of clergy who served chapels under him as rector. See Reeves, Coltorio Visitation, p. 4 n., 145, 209; Robertson, Early Scott. i, 830.

Coat, The Holy. Its miracles are commemorated on Oct. 1 in the Georgian Calendar. See HOLY COAT OF TREVES.

Coate, Michael, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Burlington, N. J., in 1767. He was converted in 1794; served the Church as an exhorter and local preacher, and in 1795 became a member of the New York Conference. He died a member of the Philadelphia Conference, Aug. 1, 1814. Mr. Coate was remarkably meek and devout, lively and zealous, practical and exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1815, p. 255; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 253.

Coate, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the New York Conference in 1794, and after travelling Flanders Circuit, N. J., and Albany Circuit, N. Y., went in 1806 to Canada as a co-laborer with Dunham, Coleman, and Wooster. In 1806 he was stationed at Montreal. His later history is unrecorded. See Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, iii, 195, 476; iv, 274; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 255, 256.

Coates, Alexander, an English Wesleyan preacher, a native of North Britain, was converted young; began his ministry in 1741, and died at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Oct. 6, 1765. He was the oldest preacher in the connection. His abilities were extraordinary; he was very popular, and his conversation wonderfully pleasant and instructive. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Myles, Chronol. Hist. of the Methodists (4th ed.), p. 168; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 420; Wesley, Journals, Oct. 7, 1765.

Coates, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Iron-Acton, Gloucestershire, in 1783. He was received into the sacred office in 1806, toiled with unwearied assiduity for forty-four years, and died, Feb. 8, 1860. "His success may be traced in the circuits he travelled." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860, p. 404.

Coates, Richard, an English Methodist preacher, began to travel in connection with the Wesleyan Conference in 1764, being appointed to the Staffordshire Circuit. The severity of the winter and his excessive labors brought on a disorder of which he died, at Wednesbury, Staffordshire, in 1765, aged twenty-eight. He was a lively, pious, zealous, and useful young man. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, a. v.

Coatlantanna, in Mexican mythology, was the Flora of the Mexicans, in whose honor great floral festivals were held.

Coats, Calvin S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Orangeville, Wyoming Co., N. Y., May 15, 1809. He experienced conversion at the age of sixteen; spent some time as an exhorter and local preacher, and in 1831 entered the Genesee Conference, wherein he labored with marked zeal and fidelity until failing health, in 1868, caused him to become a superannuate, which relation he held to the close of his life, Feb. 11, 1875. Mr. Coats was remarkable for the activity of his intellect, the strength of his convictions, and his restless zeal in Christian work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 119.

Coatts, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, held a bursary of theology at the Glasgow University in 1702; was licensed to preach in 1714; called to the living at Dalmellington in 1717, and ordained; resigned in August, 1755, and died Feb. 6, 1757. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, ii, 109, 110.

Coatts, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1725; was licensed to preach in 1726; became tutor in the family of Dunlop; was presented to the living at Kilmaurs in 1735, but was opposed and hindered by heritors and parishioners for a long time; was ordained in May, 1739, and died May 2, 1777. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, ii, 180.

Coaxtitli, in Mexican mythology, was a rude deity, apparently the god of the fruit-bearing earth. He is represented as a sitting, long-haired man, with closed eyes, grasping something in his clumsy hands, perhaps a loaf of bread. The strange decoration of his head seems to characterize him as a priest; at least, the latter carried something similar, as we know from designs and busts.

Cob, Thomas, an English martyr, suffered death by burning, in Suffolk, Aug. 12, 1555, for his confession of Christ. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 382.

Cobain, Edward, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was converted in youth, commenced preaching on the Newry mission in 1810, and died Aug. 16, 1856. His long labors were blessed with many gracious revivals. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Cobāli (Κόβαλοι, rogues), in Greek mythology (similar to the German Kobolden, i. e. "goblins"), were small, tantalizing spirits, which played all manner of possible tricks. They were worshipped by the ancient Sarmatians, viz. the Borussi, Samogitæ, Lithuanians, Livonians, etc. These spirits, they believed, dwelt in the most secret parts of their houses. The people presented to them the daintiest meats.

Cobard, Jacques, a French martyr, was a school-master in the city of Saint-Mihiel, in Lorraine, who maintained against three priests that the sacrament of baptism and of the Lord's Supper did not avail unless received with faith. For this, and also for his confession, which he, being in prison, sent of his own accord by his mother to the judge, he was burned, most quietly suffering, in 1545, in Lorraine. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 401.

Cobarrubias, Alonzo de, an eminent Spanish architect, flourished about 1450. He first introduced Roman architecture into Spain; erecting, among other works, the magnificent cathedral of Toledo, and, at Valencia, the monastery and temple of the order of San Girolamo.

Cobb, Alden, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in New York, in March, 1802. He was converted in 1833, and soon afterwards was publicly set apart to the ministry. His labors were chiefly in the state of New York, especially at Dansville, Middlesex, North Potter, Sparta, Italy, Scottsburg, and Jerusalem. He died in Middlesex, Aug. 10, 1868. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1870, p. 75, 76. (J. C. S.)

Cobb, Allen H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Barnstable, Mass., Nov. 21, 1780. He joined the Church in early life, and in 1802 was admitted into the Maine Conference, in which he served faithfully until poverty compelled him in 1809 to locate, when he retired to New Gloucester, and nine years later moved to Durham, where he died, Sept. 15, 1856. Mr. Cobb represented Durham nine years in the legislature, was two years a senator from Cumberland, and two years a member of the executive council. He was emphatically the friend of the poor, the widow, and the orphan. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 286.

Cobb, Alvan, a Congregational minister, was born about 1788, his ancestors being early settlers in Plymouth, Mass. He graduated from Brown University in 1813, and was installed pastor of the West Church in Taunton in 1815, where he continued for nearly forty-six years. At his house was formed the Doctrinal Tract and Book Society, since enlarged into the Congregational Board of Publication, of which he was director until his death at Taunton, April 2, 1861. Mr. Cobb instructed several young men in theology, published several Sermons, Doctrinal Tract, No. 23, besides thirty periodical articles. In theology he was an Emmonsite. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 308.

Cobb, Archibald Parritt, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Parsippany, Morris Co., N. J., Nov. 9, 1821. He prepared for college at home, entered the sophomore class at Princeton, from which he graduated in 1850; then from the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853, remaining there one year longer as tutor. He was licensed to preach in Montclair, April 20, 1853, and was ordained April 19, 1854, when he became a stated supply in the Witherspoon (colored) Presbyterian Church at Princeton. The following year he was installed pastor of the South Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, where he remained six years, and was then called to the pastorate of the Tennent Church, Freehold, N. J., where he remained until the close of his life, Feb. 2, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 70. (W. P. S.)

Cobb, Asahel, a Congregational minister, was born at Abington, Mass., May 8, 1793. After pursuing a preparatory course of study in Litchfield, Conn., he graduated from Hamilton College in 1823, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1826. On Dec. 12 of that year he was ordained assistant pastor at Mattapoisett, Mass., from which he was dismissed in 1830. The following year he was installed at Sandwich, where he served eleven years. From 1844 to 1848 he was acting pastor at North Falmouth, the succeeding year at West Yarmouth, and in 1854 at Little Compton, R. I. For about eleven years he was pastor of First Church, New Bedford, but was not regularly dismissed until 1870. He resided thereafter, without charge, at Sandwich, Mass., and died there, May 2, 1876. He served two terms in the Massachusetts Legislature—the first in 1848 and 1844, and the second in 1852 and 1853. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 413.

Cobb, Edward, held for many years the stations successively of elder and minister in the Society of Friends (Orthodox), and died in Portland, Me., Nov. 3, 1852, aged fifty-seven years. See The Friend, vi, 56.

Cobb, Frank Woodbury, a Congregational minister, was born at Durham, Me., Nov. 20, 1851. After preliminary study at the Lewiston High School, he graduated from Bates College in 1873, and five years afterwards from Yale Divinity School (?). He was ordained pastor of the Church at Three Rivers, in Palmer, Mass., Feb. 12, 1879, and died there, Sept. 4, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 20.

Cobb, Henry K., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Randolph, Orange Co., Vt., May 7, 1827. He received an early Unitarian training, was converted when about fifteen, lapsed into sin, and several years later was reclaimed by the Methodists. In 1853 he was admitted into the Vermont Conference; in 1869 was transferred to the West Wisconsin Conference, to fill a difficult appointment in the city of Madison, and labored there until his sudden death, Nov. 25, the same year. Mr. Cobb was an effective speaker, a beloved pastor, an ardent friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 251.

Cobb, James E., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, entered the Arkansas Conference in 1848, was agent of the American Bible Society in 1850, editor of the Memphis Christian Advocate from 1852 to 1855; transferred to St. Louis Conference in 1856; to the Washita Conference in 1857; appointed to Columbus African Mission in 1858; president and agent of Arkadelphia Female College in 1862; agent for Trans-Mississippi Army Tract Society in 1864, and afterwards served on charges in the Little Rock Conference until 1870, when he was transferred to the Louisiana Conference, and appointed president of Homer College, which position he filled four consecutive years. The remainder of his life was spent as presiding elder. He died April 28, 1879, about fifty-five years old. Mr. Cobb was intensely earnest as a preacher, and deeply pious in his daily life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 37.

Cobb, John, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree from the University of St. Andrews in 1682, became a helper in the parish of Birsay and Harray, and was transferred to Kirkwall in 1689, being the last minister appointed before Episcopacy was abolished. He was promoted to Stronsay and Eday in 1696, transferred to St. Andrews and Deerness in 1700, and died before January, 1719, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 378, 386, 393, 408.

Cobb, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Oliver Cobb, was born at Rochester, Mass., March 9, 1800. He graduated from Brown University in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1825. The following year he served as a home missionary in Harwich. Having been ordained at Dartmouth, Oct. 31, 1827, as an evangelist, he labored as acting pastor in Nantucket for two years, and then (1829-30) in Bloomfield and Huntsburg, O. In October of the latter year he was installed pastor in Hampden and Kirtland. From Kirtland he was dismissed in 1833, and from Hampden in 1834. Meanwhile he was serving as acting pastor (1832-33) in Mesopotamia, and from 1833 to 1835 in Bristol and Parkman; also, during the same time, was acting pastor in Southington. From 1835 to 1837 he labored in the Presbyterian Church at Clear Creek; the three years following he preached at Mount Eaton, and from 1841 to 1845 at Salem. Twice he was engaged as a Bible agent and colporteur, viz., in 1840 and 1841, and from 1845 to 1849. The year succeeding the last date he was city missionary in New Bedford, Mass.; in 1851 he was acting pastor in North Falmouth, and in 1852 and 1853 in Chilmark. Subsequently he resided, without charge, in Kingston, and died at Taunton, Nov. 15, 1878. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 39.

Cobb, William Alexander McKendree, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, son of Rev. Jesse B. Cobb, was born in Granville County, N. C., Sept. 2, 1817. He became religious very early, studied earnestly, began preaching in 1838, and in 1839 entered the Tennessee Conference, in which he travelled a few months, and was transferred to the Arkansas Conference. In 1849 he was transferred to the Indian Mission Conference, and served the Creeks and Cherokees until 1854, when ill-health obliged him to retire from active service. In 1861 he undertook the presidency of the Female College in Cross County, Ark., where he did excellent service till the institution was broken up by the war in 1864. In 1866 he entered the White River Conference, and labored zealously until his decease, Jan. 2, 1873. Mr. Cobb excelled in all ministerial duties. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 885.

Cobb, William Newell, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at McLean, Tompkins Co., N. Y., July 15, 1818. He received an excellent common-school education; at the age of eighteen engaged in civil-engineering, which he followed six years; experienced religion during the time; served two years as class-leader; in 1842 entered the Genesee Conference; was transferred to the Oneida Conference the following year, and died Aug. 3, 1878. Mr. Cobb's labors were highly acceptable. In the pulpit he was always practical, logical, and eminently edifying. In daily life he was judicious, solicitous, energetic, and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 67.

Cobban, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, Sept. 10, 1824. He emigrated with his parents to Canada when seven years old, experienced conversion at the age of sixteen, and joined the Wesleyan Methodists, who soon after licensed him to preach. He removed to Fond du Lac County, Wis., in 1851, and in the same year entered the Wisconsin Conference. Failing health obliged him to locate in 1859, and he retired to his farm in Chippewa County. In 1860 he re-entered the effective service in the Northwest Wisconsin Conference, and after two years' labor was put upon the supernumerary list, in which relation he served on circuits until 1867, when he again entered the effective ranks, and continued zealous and faithful until his death, Jan. 4, 1870. Mr. Cobban was prompt in every duty as a minister, and highly esteemed by all who knew him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 251.

Cobbe, Charles, an Irish prelate, was born at Winchester, England, where he received the rudiments of his education. He then went to Trinity College, Oxford, but took his degree of D.D. in the University of Dublin, March 9, 1735. His first ecclesiastical preferment was to the rectory of Skreen, in the diocese of Meath. He was afterwards appointed dean of Ardlagh, whence he was promoted to the see of Killala and Achonry, May 30, 1720. In 1726 he was translated to the see of Dromore, and from that, March, 1731, to Kildare, with which latter dignity he held the deanery of Christ Church, Dublin, and the preceptory of Tully, in the county of Kildare. On July 19, 1734, he was sworn privy-councillor, and was finally translated to the see of Dublin, March 4, 1742. He was one of the spiritual lords who desired leave of absence from the trial of lord Netterville by protestation in 1743; and also one of the council who subscribed the proclamation of February, 1744. In 1745, on the breaking-out of the rebellion in Scotland, he sent a letter to his clergy to remind them of the excellence of the Protestant faith, and to entreat them to be steadfast in the profession of it. In 1759 archbishop Cobbe was very active in procuring the investment of the charitable donations of Andrew and the Rev. William Wilson, in the county of Westmeath, for the purpose of building a hospital for aged Protestants. He died at St. Sepulchre's, April 12, 1765. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 339.

Cobbin, INGRAM, an English Congregational minister, was born in London in December, 1777. He entered Hoxton College in 1798, and was ordained pastor at South Molton in 1802. His health being very uncertain, he changed location frequently, soon leaving South Moulton for Banbury, and thence removing to Hulloway. After preaching awhile at Putney, and then at Credition, he became assistant secretary to the British and Foreign Bible Society, and two years later attempted the pastorate at Worcester, but broke down in his first sermon. A similar attempt was made subsequently at Lymington, and with a like result. In 1819 he interested himself, with other ministers and gentlemen, in the formation of the Home Missionary Society, and became its first secretary. His health continuing feeble, he relinquished public life in 1828, and died at Camberwell, March 10, 1851. Mr. Cobbin published, among other works, Evangelical Synopsis:—Bible Remembrancer:—and various Commentaries. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1851, p. 212.

Cobden, EDWARD, D.D., an English divine and chaplain in ordinary to George II., was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and King's College, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree in 1713. Early in life he was chaplain to bishop Gibson, to whom he was indebted for preferment to the united rectories of St. Austin and St. Faith, in London, with that of Acton, in Middlesex, a prebend in St. Paul's, another at Lincoln, and the archdeaconry of London. Dr. Cobden collected his whole works in 1757, under the title of Discourses and Essays. Another noted work was Concio ad Clerum, XI Cui. Muii (1752). He died April 22, 1764. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coberley, WILLIAM, an English martyr, was a native of the county of Wiltshire, and a farmer by occupation. He openly asserted that the bishop of Rome was Antichrist, and God's enemy. He was examined and condemned to be burned, March 25, 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 102.

Cobhran, an Irish saint, is said by St. Ængus to have been the son of Neuin, or Euain, and of Mineloth, sister of St. Columba; but as there are in the calendars a Cobhran of Cluain, or Cluain-Euach, commemorated July 9, and Cobhran of Cluain-Cuallacta, commemorated Aug. 2, it is difficult to decide which dedication belongs to the nephew and disciple of St. Columba.

Cobia, DANIEL, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Charleston, S. C., Sept. 13, 1811. On leaving school he entered Charleston College, from which he graduated in 1829. In 1830 he entered the General Theological Seminary in New York city, from which he duly graduated. In 1833 he was ordained deacon, and immediately took charge of St. Stephen's Chapel, Charleston, especially interesting himself in Sunday-school work. Three churches in his native city having invited him to become pastor, he accepted the invitation from St. Philip's, beginning his ministry there in September, 1834. He was ordained priest Sept. 18, 1835. After spending a short time at Wilmington, N. C., and at St. Mary's, Ga., for the benefit of his health, he sailed for the island of St. Thomas, and, a few days after, for the island of St. Croix, where his health improved somewhat; but he soon began rapidly to decline, and died in Charleston, S. C., Feb. 8, 1837. Mr. Cobia was a remarkably eloquent preacher, and his chief characteristic was his religious zeal. One volume of his sermons was issued after his death. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 719.

Cobleigh, NELSON EBENKZER, D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Littleton, N. H., Nov. 24, 1814. He studied in the common school at Newbury, Vt., and worked his way through Wesleyan University, Conn., graduating in 1843. In 1844 he entered the New England Conference, and, in 1853, accepted the chair of ancient languages in McKendree College, Ill. The following year he was elected to the same position in Lawrence University, Wis., and in 1857 was recalled to McKendree College, as president. In 1863 he became editor of Zion's Herald, Boston. Overwork and the rigorous climate obliged him to retire from all active labor in 1867, and he sought the milder climate of East Tennessee, where he was soon elected to the presidency of Wesleyan University, at Athens, Tenn. In 1872 he was elected editor of the Methodist Advocate, Atlanta, Georgia, in which capacity he labored with marked zeal and ability to the close of his life, Feb. 1, 1874. Dr. Cobleigh was in the truest and highest sense a great and good man. He was intellectually earnest, deeply and uniformly pious, thoroughly devoted to his work, a cheerful, energetic laborer; had few equals as an educator; was pathetic, logical, and powerful as a preacher; as a writer, clear, pure, and graceful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 131; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Coblentz, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Confluentinum), a provincial synod, was held in 922 by order of the two kings, Charles the Simple, of France, and Henry, of Germany. Eight bishops were present, Hermann, archbishop of Cologne, presiding, who drew up eight canons, of which no more than five have come down to us. The only one of any importance is the sixth, which directs that all monks shall submit in everything to the jurisdiction and control of the bishop of the diocese; also marriages between relations, as far as the sixth degree, are forbidden. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 579; Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Cobo, BERNABÉ DE, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Lopera, in the province of Jaen, in 1582. He was missionary to Mexico and Peru for fifty years, and, on all his journeys, studied with arid natural history, and particularly botany. He died at Lima, Sept. 9, 1657, leaving works in MS., which were brought to Spain and placed in the library of Seville; they consist of ten volumes, including a history of the Indians. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cobo, JUAN, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Alcazar de Consuegra, near Toledo. He became a monk at Ocaña, and engaged first in teaching in different convents of his order, and afterwards attached himself to foreign missions. Cobo sailed for Mexico in May, 1586, where, in a short time, he became very famous as a preacher, but was soon afterwards sent to the Philippine Isles. Cobo arrived at Manila in June, 1588, and, in order to instruct the Chinese resident there, studied that language. In 1592 he was appointed to the chair of theology at Manila, but was soon after sent to the emperor of Japan, on an embassy of alliance, which he accomplished successfully. On his return, in November, 1592, the vessel was cast upon the coast of Formosa, and all the passengers were massacred by the inhabitants. Cobo composed several works for the use of missionaries, especially on the Chinese language, for which see Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cobthach, an early Irish Christian, the son of Brendan, and brother of St. Baithen, St. Columba's successor at Iona, is mentioned among the companions of St. Columba in crossing from Ireland to Iona. Camerarius, without authority, places him in the calendar on Aug. 7.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Coburn, David Nichols, a Congregational minister, was born at Thompson, Conn., Sept. 11, 1808. He received his preparatory education at Monson Academy, Mass., and graduated at Amherst College in 1838, and from the theological institute at Hartford in 1841. He was ordained at Ware, Mass., Sept. 21, 1842, where he remained until April 17, 1845. From thence he removed to Monson, where he remained without charge until his death, Dec. 7, 1877. Mr. Coburn published A Historical Discourse, delivered at Ware, May 9, 1851, on the centenary of the first Church there. See Hist. Cat. of the Theol. Inst. of Conn. 1881, p. 30. (W. P. S.)

Coburn, Jesse, a Baptist minister, was born at Fitzwilliam, N. H., in 1787, and removed with his parents to Braintree, Vt., in 1797. He was converted at the age of thirteen; was subsequently ordained in Cornish, N. H., and for several years labored in churches in that state and Vermont until in 1818 he moved to Hanover, N. H., and took charge of the Church in that town, preaching much, also, in all the region round about. He died Dec. 22, 1833. (J. C. S.)

Coburn, John R., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Charleston County, S. C., Sept. 18, 1799. He was converted in 1827, joined the South Carolina Conference in 1828, and continued in the regular work of the ministry until 1877, when he was placed on the superannuated list. During the greater part of this time he was a missionary to the blacks on the Atlantic coast. He died in Florence, S. C., Sept. 29, 1880. Mr. Coburn was faithful, self-sacrificing, zealous, and abundantly successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 213.

Cob-wall is a wall built of unburnt clay, mixed with straw. This material is still used in some parts of the country for cottages and outbuildings, and was formerly employed for houses of a better description: it is supposed also to be the material of which the domestic edifices of the ancients, including even the Greeks and Romans in their most civilized period, were chiefly built.

Cocagne, Jean Baptiste, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rosières, France, Oct. 1, 1821. He received a careful Roman Catholic training; emigrated with his parents to Cape Vincent, Jefferson Co., N. Y., in 1831, and was there apprenticed to a Protestant family, in which he experienced religion. After uniting with the Methodists, receiving license to exhort, and supporting himself during a four-year course at Gouverneur and Fairfield seminaries, he entered the Black River Conference in 1846. In 1851 he had charge of the French mission in New York city; in 1852 was transferred to the Michigan Conference to take charge of the French mission in Detroit, and in 1856 received a retransfer to the Black River Conference. He sailed Nov. 1, 1856, for a visit to his native land, in the steamer Lyonnaise, which was wrecked on the following Sabbath night, and he was drowned. Mr. Cocagne was kind, frank, generous, and ardent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 365; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cocca (Coga, Choca, or Cuach), of Cill-Choca, a female Irish saint, commemorated Jan. 8 and June 6, is supposed to be the same as elsewhere called Ercuat (q. v.) or Erguat, the cook and embroiderer or robe-maker of St. Columba, Cocca being a form of "Coqua," a cook (Todd and Reeves, Murt. Doneg. p. 379; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 130).

Coccius (or Cccoyus, i. e. Köchlin), Hulde-ric, a German theologian, was born at Freiburg in 1525. He studied at Basle, and became preacher in 1564, professor of exegesis of the New Test. in 1569, and doctor of theology. He died in 1585, leaving, Index et Prefatio in Opera D. Gregorii Pontificis (Basle, 1551):—Jo. Lud. Opera (ibid. 1555). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coccius, Jodocus (1), a canon of Jülich, who was born of Lutheran parentage, and died about 1618, is the author of Thesaurus Catholicus (Cologne, 1599, fol.; 1619, 2 vols.). See Hartzheim, Bibl. Colon. p. 210; Räss, Conventen, viii, 500; Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coccius, Jodocus (or Jos) (2), a German Jesuit, born in 1581 at Trier, was for some time professor of theology and first chancellor of the theological academy at Molsheim, in Alsatia, and died Oct. 25, 1622, at Rufschach. He wrote, among other works, Parallelen Biblicum (Molsheim, 1618):—Theses Theologicae (ibid. 1619):—De Arcano Scripturae Sensu (ibid. 1620):—De Antichristo (ibid. 1621):—S. Missae Sacrificium ab Hæreticorum Injuris Vindicatum (ibid. 1622). See Streber, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coccopani, Giovanni, an Italian painter and architect, was born at Florence in 1582, and executed a number of pictures for the churches of Lombardy. In 1622 he was invited to Vienna, where he was employed by the emperor in the wars as state engineer. He was appointed professor of mathematics at Florence on the death of Castelli, and was afterwards invited to Rome to fill the chair in the academy of that city, but he refused to quit Florence. He died there in 1649. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cocha, of Ros-bennachair (County Clare), an Irish saint, is commemorated June 29. In the Life of St. Ciaran, of Saighir, there is an account of the many services St. Ciaran did to St. Cocha, and of their lasting friendship. She was St. Ciaran's nurse, and through him her monastery at Rosbanagher was founded in the 6th century (Todd and Reeves, Murt. Doneg. p. 183, 379; Lanigan, Ecd. Hist. of Ireland, i, 405).

Cochelet, Anastase, a French Carmelite, was born at Mézières in 1551. He was a noted preacher, and for a time had to retire to Antwerp. He returned in 1617, and died at Rheims in 1624, leaving a number of works against the Reformers, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cochin, Charles Nicolas (1), a French designer and engraver, was born in Paris in 1688, and studied painting until he was nineteen, when he devoted himself to engraving. The following are some of his principal plates: The Meeting of Jacob and Esau; Jacob and Laban; Jacob Pursued by Laban; Rebekah with the Servant of Abraham; The Trinity and the Assumption; The Lame Man Cured. He died in 1754. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cochin, Charles Nicolas (2), son of the foregoing, an eminent French designer and engraver, was born in Paris in 1715, and was instructed by his father. He wrote several books relating to the arts, which were highly valued. He died April 29, 1790. The following are some of his plates: The Infant Jesus Holding a Cross; The Virgin; The Crucifixion. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cochin, Jacques Denis, a French theologian and philanthropist, was born in Paris, Jan. 1, 1726. He was made pastor of St. Jacques-du-Haut-Pas in 1756, and became famous by his zeal and charity. In 1780 he conceived the idea of founding a hospital for the poor in the faubourg St. Jacques, himself subscribing 87,000 frances for that purpose, and, with the liberality of others, the building was finished in July, 1782. Abbé Cochlin died June 3, 1783, at Paris, leaving several devotional works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cochlin, Jean Denis Marie, a French philanthropist, was born in 1789. He occupied several civil offices, but is best known as the founder of the asylum homes of Paris, and by his efforts to improve and extend public primary instruction. He died in 1841, leaving some works on these benevolent subjects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cochlin, Nicolas (or Natalis), a French designer and engraver, was born at Troyes, in Champagne, about 1619. He settled at Paris, where he engraved a great number of plates, among them, Melchizedek and Abraham; Abraham Sending away Hagar; The Children of Israel Crossing the Red Sea; St. John Preaching in the Wilderness; The Repose in Egypt; The Conversion of St. Paul; The Adoration of the Magi; Pharaoh and his Host Swallowed up in the Red Sea. He died in 1695. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cochlear. See Spoon.

Cochran, Hugh, a Scotch clergyman, chaplain to Sir Alexander Maxwell's family, was licensed to preach in 1715; presented to the living at Kilmaurs in 1722, ordained in 1723, and died April 9, 1733, aged forty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 179.

Cochran, Isaac C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Vermont about 1821. He joined the Presbyterians in early life; removed to Michigan at the age of seventeen; spent several years successfully as a school-teacher; became principal of Clarkson Academy in 1853; joined the Methodists, and in 1861 entered the Detroit Conference. During 1865 and 1866 he was supernumerary, and principal of Owosso Union School. He died in the midst of his ministerial labors at Utica, Mich., Oct. 25, 1867. Mr. Cochran had a cultured mind and heart. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 174.

Cochran, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1646; was admitted to the living at Strathblane in 1650, and ordained; took the side of the Resolutioners in 1651; submitted to episcopacy in 1662, and resigned in July, 1690. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 372.

Cochran, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was called to the living at Symington in 1712, and ordained. He died before April 25, 1722. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 145.

Cochran, Joseph Gallup, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Springville, N. Y., Feb. 5, 1817. He graduated from Amherst College in 1842, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1847; was ordained June 10 of the same year, and commissioned by the Presbyterian Board as a missionary to Seir, Persia, where for eight years he labored earnestly. In 1865 he returned to the United States, and in 1867 again sought, with renewed zeal, his foreign field, where, after four years more of faithful service, he died at Ooroomiah, Persia, Nov. 2, 1871. See The Presbyterian, Feb. 17, 1872. (W. P. S.)

Cochran, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Halifax, Vt., Aug. 31, 1778. He was converted in 1800; labored some time as exhorter and local preacher, and in 1804 entered the New York Conference, wherein he served the Church faithfully thirty-eight years. He died in the spring of 1845. Mr. Cochran was energetic, devoted, and successful in his ministry, and kind in all his social relations. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 31.

Cochrane, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1811; became assistant minister at Lilliesleaf, and afterwards minister to the Presbyterian congregation at Faltstone, and then that at North Shields; was presented to the living at Hawick in 1823, and died Sept. 12, 1832, aged forty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 499.

Cochrane, Sylvester, a Congregational minister, was born at Antrim, N. H., May 8, 1796. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1823, and was ordained at Poultney, Vt., in 1827, where he labored six years with great success. In 1837 he removed to Michigan, and preached in Vermontville and Howell, and for the Presbyterian Church in Northville. He died March 14, 1860, at Northville. Mr. Cochrane was an able and faithful minister, and an advocate of all moral reforms. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 344.

Cochrane, William, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1639; was licensed to preach, and became a helper to Mr. Naine at Dysart in 1651; was elected schoolmaster of that parish, admitted to the living there in 1657, conforming to episcopacy, and was instituted in 1666. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 410.

Cock, in Christian Art. Representations of this bird frequently occur on tombs, from the earliest period. When not associated with the figure of St. Peter, it appears to be a symbol of the resurrection, our Lord being supposed by the early Church to have broken from the grave at the early cock-crowing. A peculiar awe seems always to have attached to that hour, at which all wandering spirits have, through the Middle Ages, been supposed to vanish from the earth. Hamlet and the ancient ballad called The Wife of Usher's Well occur to us as salient examples of a universal superstition. Prudentius's hymn Ad Galli Cantum (Cathem. i, 16) adopts the idea of the cock-crowing as a call to the general judgment. See Aringhi, ii, 328, 329 (in a complete list of animal symbols).

Fighting-cocks seem to symbolize the combat with secular or sensual temptations. The practice of training them for combat has probably always existed in the East, and certainly was in favor at Athens (comp. Aristoph. Av.; 1 Cor. ix, 27). See Bottari, iii, 137.

Two cocks accompany the Good Shepherd in Bottari, plate clxxii (from the tympanum of an arch in the cemetery of St. Agnes).

Cock, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1777; presented to the living at Cruden in 1778, and ordained. He died July 10, 1837, aged eighty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 606.

Cock, James, a Scotch clergyman, was called to the living at Keithhall and Kinkell in 1738, and died Feb. 17, 1776, aged seventy-seven years, leaving two sons in the ministry, Alexander at Cruden, and William at Rathen. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 583.

Cock (or Kook), Jerome, a Flemish painter and engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1510. He applied himself chiefly to engraving. The following are some of his principal plates: Moses with the Tables of the Law; Daniel in the Lions' Den; Samson and Delilah; a set of eight female figures, Jael, Ruth, Abigail, Judith, Esther, Susanna, the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalene; The Resurrection; The Last Judgment; The Temptation of St. Anthony. He died in 1570. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cock, William, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1776; was licensed to preach in 1782; presented to the living at Calsalmond in 1794, and ordained in 1795; transferred to Rathen in 1801, and died July 1, 1848, aged ninety-one years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, iii, 579, 639.

Cockayn, George, an English Independent minister, was descended from an ancient family in Derbyshire. He is said to have been educated at Cambridge, and in the time of the civil war held the living of St. Pancras, Soper Lane, London. He was a celebrated preacher, and in November, 1648, preached the fast-day sermon before the House of Commons. He became chaplain to one of Oliver Cromwell's lords, and in 1657 published a funeral sermon with the title Divine Astrology. He was ejected from his living in 1660, when he founded the Church at Hare Court, London, and was the first preacher there. He had distinguished citizens in his Church, yet he suffered much persecution from the royalists. He was a man of ability and learning, took part in compiling an English-Greek Lexicon, in 1658, and died in 1689. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 279.

Cockburn, Henry, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1618; and was presented to the living at Channelkirk in 1625. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1638, but was suspended by that of 1648, and deposed in 1650 for praying in public for the army in England under the duke of Hamilton. He afterwards suffered great misery and privation, but was restored to the ministry in 1659, and had an act of parliament in his favor in 1661. He was employed at Earliston for fifteen months, and returned to Channelkirk in 1662. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, i, 521, 522, 523.

Cockburn, John, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, nephew to the bishop of Aberdeen, where he was educated, was called to the living at Udney in 1676; transferred to the living at Old Deer in 1681; scrupled at taking the test imposed by parliament, but did so in 1682, and was transferred to Ormiston in 1683. He was the first who projected a periodical account of literature in Scotland, and secured a license to print the monthly transactions and account of books out of the Universal Bibliotheca, which was recalled in 1688, and he was forbidden to print any more. He was deprived by the privy council in 1689, for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty. In 1698 he was appointed by the bishop of London as minister of the Episcopal congregation at Amsterdam, and in 1709 was promoted to the rectory of Northall, Middlesex, where he died Nov. 20, 1729. His son Patrick was an English vicar. His publications were, Jacob's Vow (1686):—Bibliotheca Universalis (1688):—Eight Sermons on Several Occasions (1691):—Inquiry into the Nature, Necessity, and Evidence of the Christian Faith (1696, 1697):—Fifteen Sermons on Various Subjects (1697):—Bourgeoisism Detected (1698):—Right Notions of God and Religion (1708):—An answer to Queries Concerning Important Points in Religion (1717):—History and Examination of Duels (1720):—Specimen of Remarks Concerning Affairs and Persons in Scotland (1724). Cockburn, Patrick (1), a Scotch clergyman, was educated at St. Andrews; entered into holy orders when young; went to Paris and taught Oriental languages in the university there, with approbation; but embracing the Protestant faith, returned to Scotland, and was appointed, in 1562, the first Protestant minister at Haddington. He had to supply certain kirks monthly, and was chaplain of Trinity Aisle in 1568. Complaints were made that he neither attended provincial nor general assemblies. He died in 1568. His publications were, Oratio de Utilitate et Excellentia Verbi Dei (Paris, 1551):—De Vulgari Sacra Scriptura Phrasi (ibid. 1552):—In Oratorem Dominicampia Meditatio (1555):—In Symbolum Apostolicum Comment. (Lond. 1561). See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, i, 811; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cockburn, Patrick (2), an English clergyman, husband of the noted writer Catharine Cockburn, was born about 1678, and was many years vicar of Long-Horseley, Northumberland. He died in 1749. He wrote, Penitential Office (1721):—Praying for Superiors, etc. (1728, 1739):—An Inquiry into the Truth and Certainty of the Mosaic Deluge (1750). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cockburn, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, was promoted to the see of Ross in 1508, and was still bishop there in 1515. He died in 1521. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 190.

Cockburne, James, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1658; was licensed to preach in 1662; presented to the living of Abbey St. Bathans in 1664, and ordained; ten years later was censured for immorality, and transferred to Pencailand in 1674. Under accusation of scandal he resigned in 1684, and died in April, 1687. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, i, 348, 406.

Cockburne, John, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1612; was presented to the living at Humble in 1617; instituted in 1618, and resigned before Aug. 23, 1648, owing to age and infirmity. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, i, 837.

Cockburne, Samuel, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1600; was appointed to the living at Kirkmichael, Banffshire, in 1601, having also Inveraven in charge; was transferred to Minto in 1609, and died before Aug. 5, 1624. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, i, 506; iii, 237.

Cockburne, William, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1627; became chaplain to John, earl of Cassilis, and was admitted to the living at Kirkmichael in 1638. In 1651 he did not take part with either Resolutioners or Protesters, but was confined to his parish in 1662 for nonconformity, and died in August, 1677, aged about seventy years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, ii, 119.

Cocke, Stephen F., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Virginia. He was a student in Union Seminary, Virginia, and then spent part of a year in Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of West Hanover in 1836 as pastor at Bethany, Va.; stated supply at Fincastle in 1837; pastor at same place from 1839 to 1844; pastor at Little Rock, Ark., in 1846; stated supply at Victoria, Texas, from 1846 to 1849; home missionary at Port Lavaca from 1849 to 1852; served in some agency in Indianola from 1852 to 1856, and died in the latter year. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 81.

Cocker, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ashton-under-Lyne, April 9, 1840. He early became a member of the Congregational Church and a village preacher, and was educated for the ministry in an academy and in Lancashire Independent College, where he studied from 1860 to 1865. In the latter year he became pastor of Copeland Street Chapel, Stoke-upon-Trent, in which relation he continued during the remainder of his life. He was two years secretary to the North Staffordshire Congregational Union, and was also its president. He was accidentally killed, Feb. 1, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 289.

Cockerton, THOMAS, an English Baptist minister, was born at Soham, Cambridgeshire, July 26, 1839. He was converted under the preaching of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, in whose "Pastor's College" he pursued his studies. He was settled at Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, three or four years; was then for over two years at Castle Donnington; afterwards removed to Daventry, but, after laboring a short time, ruptured a blood-vessel, and died in his native place, June 4, 1868. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1869, p. 137, 138. (J. C. S.)

Cockin, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Thornton, near Bradford, in 1783. In youth he was remarkable for his studious habits. When about eleven years old he was led to Christ by reading Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, and some years afterwards was admitted to Church fellowship at Queen Street, Sheffield, where he was apprenticed to a bookseller. In 1804 he entered the Independent Academy, Idle, and at the close of his course settled at the Lane Chapel, Holmfirth, near Huddersfield, where he remained forty-three years, during which period he was kept from his work only one Sunday by illness. The last twelve years of his life were spent almost in seclusion at Halifax, where he died, Oct. 17, 1861. Both in the pulpit and on the platform Mr. Cockin was effective and popular. In conversation he excelled. He had a great ascendancy over others, and possessed a strong character. He wrote and published a Life of his father, the Rev. Joseph Cockin, Sketches after Reading, and one or two controversial pamphlets on Calvinism. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1862, p. 226.

Cockin, Joseph, an English Congregational minister, was born at Frizinghall, near Bradford, March 12, 1852. He conceived a desire to become a missionary in early childhood, and from that time read and studied with this end in view. He was educated at Cheshunt College by the London Missionary Society, for service in the foreign field; was ordained at Salem Chapel, Bradford, March 12, 1877, and sailed on the 29th for his station at Hope Fountain, Central Africa. He entered heartily upon his work, but his robust constitution yielded to the deadly climate, and he died Feb. 8, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 363.

Cocking, Samuel, a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, sent out by the British Conference, died at Bangalore, a few months after landing in India, April 30, 1861. He was a pious, humble, diligent young man. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 27.

Cocking, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, entered the sacred work in 1819, and for more than half a century was a practical, earnest preacher, greatly beloved. He died at Alford, Oct. 6, 1870, in his eighty-first year. Mr. Cocking wrote, A Sketch of Wesleyan Methodism, with its History in the Grantham Circuit (1836, 12mo):—Sabbath Desecration (London, 1847, 2d ed. 12mo), an excellent practical tractate. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1871, p. 13.

Cocks, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Great Farrington, Devon, Oct. 12, 1783. He was a dissipated youth; came to London in early life; met with religious companions; was converted under the ministry of Dr. Jenkins; joined the Church at Orange Street, and began to preach. In 1817 he became pastor of a Church at Calstock, but went to Crediton, Devon, in 1821, and became a successful home missionary. In 1826 he removed to Minehead; in 1833 to Highbridge, and in 1834 became pastor of the Church at Twerton, Bath. In 1841 he was called to Amersham, Bucks, where he remained till his death, Dec. 12, 1850.

Cocks, William Francis, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born in the parish of St. Agnes, Cornwall. He was converted at fifteen; began to preach at nineteen; entered the conference at twenty-four, and was appointed to the mission work. After two years and a half spent in study at Richmond he was sent to the St. Vincent District, West Indies. He died in July, 1881, in the thirty-first year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 43.

Cocq, FLORENT DE, a Flemish theologian of the Premonstrat Order, lived in the latter half of the 17th century, and wrote, Principia Totius Theologiae Moralis et Speculativae (1683):—Conversio Vera et Apostolica (Liege, 1685):—De Jure et Justitia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cocquault, PIERRE, a French historian, a native of Reims, was canon of the Church of that place, and died in 1645, leaving, Mémoires pour Servir à l'Histoire Ecclésiastique de Reims, preserved in MS. at the library of Reims:—Mémoires pour la Révénération des Eglises des Pays-Bas, in MS. (ibid.):—Table Chronologique de l'Histoire de Reims (ibid. 1650). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cocquelin, NICOLAS, a French poet and theologian, was born at Corberie, near Lassy, district of Orne, in 1640. He was chancellor of the Church, and of the University of Paris, and sought to prevent the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He died at Paris in 1693, leaving Interpretation des Psaumes et des Cantiques (Paris, 1686; Bordeaux, 1731; Limoges, s. a.):—Le Manuel d'Epictète (Paris, 1688), mostly in verse:—Traité de ce qui est dû aux Puissances (ibid. 1690). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cocytus, in Greek mythology, was the name of the muddy stream which Charon crossed in carrying the souls of the dead to the kingdom of shades. It is a tributary of the Acheron.

Coda, Bartolommeo (surnamed Ariminese), an eminent Italian painter, son and pupil of the following, was born in Ferrara, and lived till 1558. His chief painting is a Virgin between Sts. Roche and Sebastian, in the Church of San Rocco at Pesaro. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coda (or Codì), Benedetto, a Ferrarese painter, was born about 1460, and studied under Giovanni Bellini. He is said to have painted several pictures for the churches at Rimini. The principal are The Marriage of the Virgin, in the cupola of the cathedral, and his picture of The Rosary, in the Church of the Dominicans. He died about 1520. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coddæus, Gulielmus (Willem van der Codde), a Dutch Orientalist, born at Leyden in 1675, was appointed in 1691 to the chair of Hebrew in his native city, but deprived in 1699 for refusing to subscribe to the statutes of the synod of Dort, and died about 1690. His principal works are, Notæ ad Grammaticam Hebræam (Leyden, 1612):—Hoseæ Propheta cum Commentariis, etc. (ibid. 1621):—Fragmenta Comædiarum Aristophanis (ibid. 1625). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Coddæus, Petrus (Pier van der Codde), a Dutch theologian of the order of the Oratory, was born at Amsterdam in 1648. In 1683 he was made pastor at Utrecht, and in 1688 titular archbishop of Sebaste, and apostolic vicar of the united provinces. Being accused of holding the principles of Janenism, he went to Rome in 1700, in order to justify himself, but in 1704 his doctrine was condemned by a decree of the Inquisition, and he was deprived of the spiritual administration of the Catholics of Holland. He died at Utrecht, Dec. 18, 1710, leaving Declarationes super Pluribus Interrogationibus, etc. (Rome, 1701). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Coddiani was, according to Epiphanius (Hær. xxvi, p. 85), a nickname given to an impure sect of (nostic heretica. He explains the word as "platter-men," deriving it from a Syriac word, codda (Aram. ܥܕܕܐ), a platter or dish; and says they got the name because, on account of their "pollution," no one could eat with them, and it was necessary that their food should be given to them separately.

Codding, ICHABOD, a Congregational minister and lecturer, was born at Bristol, N. Y., in 1811. He early manifested the eloquence and zeal for reform which characterized his whole life, becoming a popular speaker on temperance at the age of seventeen. At twenty he entered Canandaigua Academy, and prepared for college, teaching in the English department at the same time. In 1834 he entered Middlebury College, and began a fervid attack upon slavery, which resulted in his leaving the college. For the next five years he traversed the New England States and New York, as the agent of the American Anti slavery Society, and though persecuted and often seriously injured by mobs, never lost his self-command, nor displayed a violent or vindictive spirit. In 1842 Mr. Codding went West, and having entered the Congregational ministry, spent the remainder of his life as pastor successively at Princeton, Lockport, Joliet, Baraboo, Wis., and Bloomington, Ill., lecturing meantime in almost all parts of Illinois against slavery. He died in Baraboo, Wis., June 17, 1866. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1866, p. 567.

Coddington, ELI H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Champaign County, Ill., July 1, 1837. He removed with his parents to Henry County, Ia., in his boyhood; was converted in his nineteenth year; soon after entered the Iowa Wesleyan University, and in 1861 enlisted in the Fourteenth Iowa Infantry. He lost his left arm at the battle of Fort Donelson; was discharged, and on returning home re-entered college, but soon rejoined the army as captain of Company H, Forty-fifth Iowa Infantry. After serving his full term he again resumed his college course; graduated with credit in June, 1866; was admitted into the Iowa Conference in the following September, and in 1878 closed his effective services and entered upon the superannuated relation, which he sustained to the close of his life, July 30, 1877. Mr. Coddington was intensely patriotic, studious, and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 85.

Coddington, GEORGE SPENCER, a Congregational minister, was born at Seneca Falls, N. Y., April 8, 1838. After having studied at the Syracuse High School, he went to sea, returning in 1860, after three years' absence. In 1861 and 1862 he was a student in Michigan University. During the three years following he served in the army, and then entered the Commercial College in Indianapolis. In 1870 he graduated from the Chicago Theological Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist July 1 of that year at Lacon, Ill., where he was acting pastor till 1871. In 1872 he removed to Dakota, there organized churches at Dell Rapids and Medway, in charge of which he remained until death, at Ann Arbor, Mich., Sept. 19, 1878. He was a representative in Dakota legislature in 1876. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 40.

Codomann, LORKKZ, a German Protestant chronologist, was born at Flotz, Sept. 15, 1529. He was successively co-rector at Amberg, rector at Hof, pastor at Eger, and superintendent at Gernersheim and at Bayreuth, where he died, April 2, 1590. His principal works are, Supputatio Præteritorum Annorum Mundi (Leipsic, 1572);—Annales Sacra Scriptura (Wittenberg, 1581). See Hoefr. Novæ Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Codratus. See QUADRATUS.

Coduro, PHILIPPE, a French theologian, was a native of Annonay. Having been minister at Nîmes, he renounced Protestantism, and became a Catholic. He was versed in the Oriental languages. He died in 1660. His principal works are, Commentarii in Jobum, explanatory of every Heb. term from the Rabbins (Paris, 1651):—Traduction des Livres de Job et Solomon, with notes (ibid. 1647, 1657). See Hoefr. Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coduri (Abul Hosein), AHMED, a learned Mussulman doctor, of the sect of Abu Hanefi, was born at Nissabur in 367 of the Hegira. He held the office of reis of the Hanefi sect in Irak, and died in 428 of the same æra (A.D. 1037). Among his works the most celebrated is a Treatise on Dogmas of Hanefi, founder of the sect which bore his name. See D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v.

Coe, HARVEY, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Granville, Mass., Oct. 6, 1785. He was converted in 1804; graduated at Williams College in 1811; was licensed to preach in 1812, and settled in what was then called the Connecticut Western Reserve, O. He joined the Portage Presbytery in 1833, and was appointed agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He died March 9, 1860. He entered the ministry with patriotic zeal, and the blessing of the Lord crowned his labors. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 158.

Coe, JAMES R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, in 1854, at Bethlehem, Conn.; in 1857, of St. James's Church, Winsted; in 1860, of St. John the Evangelist's Church, Stockport, N. Y., where he remained until 1865. He then removed to Oakfield, as principal of Carey College Seminary, and became rector of St. Michael's Church, in connection with which he performed missionary work until his death, March 16, 1874, at the age of fifty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Coe, JONAS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born March 20, 1759. He was educated at Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J.; studied theology privately; was taken under the care of the New York Presbytery in 1790, and was licensed to preach in 1791. In 1792 he accepted a call to the united congregations of Troy and Lansingburg, where he labored effectually for eleven years, and afterwards at Troy alone, until his death in 1842. He was a faithful pastor and an able minister. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 576.

Coe, JONATHAN, an Episcopal minister, was born at Winsted, Conn., and graduated at Wesleyan University in 1839. He pursued his theological studies under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Jarvis, of Middletown, was ordained in 1843, and in that and the following year had charge of parishes in Bethlehem and Northfield. From 1847 to 1852 he was rector of the parish in Winsted; from 1852 to 1866, of parishes in Athens and Cocksackie, N. Y. He died April 25, 1866. See Wesleyan University Alumni Record, p. 33; Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1866, p. 311. (J. C. S.)

Coe, NOAH, a Congregational and Presbyterian minister, was born at Durham, Conn., May 24, 1786. He graduated at Yale College in 1808; pursued his theological studies in part at Andover in 1809 and 1810; was ordained July 3, 1811, and preached in Chester, N. Y., for two years. In 1814 he was installed over the Presbyterian Church in New Hartford, where he remained until 1835. In 1836 he commenced preaching in the Second Congregational Church in Greenwich, Conn., where he was installed May 23, 1837. He was dismissed May 20, 1845, and was not again a settled pastor, though he preached and labored almost continuously until he was over seventy. From 1848 to 1854 he was engaged as a city missionary in New York city, and in Williamsburg, L. I. He then removed to New Haven, Conn. From November, 1854, to February, 1856, he served as stated supply of the Congregational Church in Northfield, Conn., and for the succeeding year supplied the Congregational Church at New Preston Hill. He died at Hartford, May 9, 1871. He was vigilant and diligent in his parish, instructive and faithful in the pulpit. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1871; Presbyterianism in Central N. Y. p. 216.

Coe, Philemon Elmer, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in New York city, June 20, 1815. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1834, spent two years thereafter in Princeton Theological Seminary, and graduated at the Union Theological Seminary in 1839. He was ordained to the ministry in the Protestant Episcopal Church, June 30, 1843; became rector at Hammondsport, N. Y., in 1844, and was home missionary at Medina and Royalton, from 1845 to 1850. His next engagements were as home missionary at Stamford, rector at Plainfield and Scotch Plains (1851-59), and at Westfield, N. J., where he died, Dec. 20, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Coe, Samuel Goodrich, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Noah Coe, was born at New Hartford, Oneida Co., N. Y., Oct. 22, 1819. He graduated at Yale College in 1838, and immediately entered the Yale Law School. In 1840 he established himself in the practice of the law at Berlin, Conn., but soon after entered the Yale Divinity School, and graduated in 1843. He was ordained over the Church at Middlebury, Vt., July 14, 1844, and remained there until compelled to leave by failing health, in November, 1850. Dec. 13 of the same year he was installed pastor of the First Church, Danbury, Conn. Here his strength again gave way, in 1864, and he resigned, and did not again accept a permanent pastorate. He resided four years at Ridgefield, and supplied the Church there until 1868. A period of illness followed this service, but in 1869 he so far improved in health as to preach for six months in the Second Presbyterian Church in Cleveland, O. He died at New Haven, Conn., Dec. 7, 1869. Mr. Coe was master of a vigorous style, and was a very impressive preacher. See Cong. Quarterly, 1870, p. 302.

Coëffeteau, Guillaume, a French theologian, was born at St. Calais, Sarthe, in 1589. Having completed his theological studies and been ordained priest, he became rector of Bagnolet, near Paris. He declined to be coadjutor of the bishop of Marseilles, his brother, and contented himself with a pension of two thousand livres. In 1623 he resigned at Bagnolet, in order to retire to the college of Bayeux, where he composed the greater part of his works. He died at Paris at the Dominican house, Rue Sainte-Honoré, in 1660, leaving an edition of the poem of Simon Nanquier, with notes: —De Lubrico Temporis Curriculo (Paris, 1616): —Compendiosa Formulæ Orationis Concionisque Ratio (ibid. 1643). His posthumous works were published by his nephew, James Hallier, under the title, Florilegium, etc. (ibid. 1667). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coëffeteau, Nicolas, a celebrated French theologian and preacher, was born at St. Calais, a little village near Le Mans, in 1574. At the age of fourteen he entered the Dominican order, in the city of Mans. Later, being sent to Paris, he completed his studies with honor at the convent of St. Jacques, and entered upon a course of philosophy with brilliant success. Henry IV chose him, in 1602, as his ordinary preacher; his brotherhood, after having appointed him definitor of the congregation of France, elected him by acclamation prior of the convent of St. Jacques, and although he was unable to fulfil the required conditions, he was allowed, through the interposition of Henry IV, to assume the position. In 1606 he was appointed vicar-general of the congregation of France. His writings against Peter Du Moulin, James I, king of England, and Duplessis Mornay, added to his celebrity. In 1617 he was made bishop of Dardania, in partibus infidelium, and as suffragan of the bishop of Mentz, he went to govern this diocese, where Calvinism was rapidly gaining ground. In return for this service he was appointed, in 1621, bishop of Marseilles, but his failing health did not permit him to assume this position. Abbé de Marolles, in his Mémoires, gives an account of the death of Coëffeteau, which occurred at Paris, April 21, 1623. From a large number of works we mention the following: —L'Hydre Abattue par l'Hercule Chrétien (Paris, 1608): —Examen du Livre de la Confession de Foi Publie sous le Nom du Roy de la Grande-Bretagne (ibid. 1604): —La Défense de la Sainte-Eucharistie (ibid. 1606): —Le Montagne Sainte de la Tribulation (ibid. eod.): —Premier Essai des Questions Théologiques, etc. (ibid. 1607), which the Sorbonne prohibited him from completing: —Le Sacrifice de l'Eglise Catholique (ibid. 1608): —Tableau des Passions Humaines (ibid. 1615, 1621, 1623; translated into English, under the title, Picture of Human Passions, Lond. 1621): —Tableau de la Pénitence de la Madeleine (Paris, 1620): —Tableau de l'Innocence (ibid. 1621): —La Marguerite Chrétienne (ibid. 1627): — a collection of theological works, entitled (Œuvres du R. P. Coëffeteau, Contenant un Nouveau Traité des Noms de l'Eucharistie, etc. (ibid. 1622). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cœlestiani. See CELESTINK; PELAGIUS.

Cœlestinus, a French theologian of the Capuchin order, was born about 1596 at Mont de Marsan, and died at Toulouse in 1659. His principal works are, Synopsis Prosopochronica Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ (Toulouse, 1644): —Prosopochronica S. Scripturæ (Paris, 1648): —Clavis David, sive Arcana Scripturæ S. (Bordeaux, 1650): —Speculum sine Macula (ibid. 1651). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coellacus. See CROLLACH.

Coëlo, Alonso Sanchez, an eminent Portuguese painter, was born in 1515, and resided chiefly in Spain. He painted a number of works for the churches of Madrid. His master-piece is in San Geronimo, representing The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, with the figures of Christ and the Virgin. He died in 1590. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coëlo, Gaspar, a Portuguese missionary of the Jesuit order, was born at Oporto in 1531. He preached the Gospel upon the coast of Malabar for eighteen years, and went to Japan in 1571, where he became noted for the zeal with which he labored for the conversion of the idolaters. In 1581 he became vice-provincial of the mission, and died at Conzuka, in Japan, May 7, 1590. His letters have been published in the Relations du Japon (1575, 1582, 1588). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coemaca (or Coemoca). See CAEMHOG.

Coeman. See CAEMHAN.

Coemgen (Caoimhghen, or Kevin), abbot of Glendalough, commemorated June 8, was born possibly in A.D. 498. In Celtic his name signifies "fair-begotten," and he belongs to the second order of Irish saints. He was early made a priest. Having fled to Glendalough, through fear of being elected abbot, he founded a monastery there in A.D. 549. He died in A.D. 618 (Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, ii, 43 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, vi, 69, 70).

Coemptio (mutual purchase) was one of the methods of contracting marriages among the ancient Romans, in which the parties solemnly bound themselves to each other by giving and receiving a piece of money. See MARRIAGE.

Coen, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Jan. 19, 1827. He joined the Church in 1846, was licensed to preach in 1848, and in 1850 was received into the Pittsburgh Conference, wherein he labored with acceptability and success until his death, Feb. 14, 1861. Mr. Coen was pleasant and companionable, consistent and uniform in his daily life; clear, logical, and convincing as a preacher, and abundantly successful as a pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 34.

Coenbarga (or Quoenbarga) is the name of two early English saints:

1. A daughter of Heriburg, being abbess of Watton, York, and a nun in that house, was cured of an infirmity by John, bishop of York, about A.D. 686 (Bede, II. E. v, 3).

2. An abbess, associated with the abbess Cuenbarga and others in a proposal for mutual intercessory prayer (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii, 842). See CUENBURGH.

Coenferth, one of two presbyters from the diocese of Worcester, attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 903 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii, 546).

Cœnobium (κοινῶνιον, from κοινός, common, and βίος, life) is equivalent to monastery in the later sense of that word. Cassian says "monasterium" may be the dwelling of a single monk, "cœnobium" must be of several; the former word expresses only the place, the latter the manner of living (Coll. xviii, 10). The neglect of this distinction has led to much inaccuracy in attempting to fix the date of the first "cœnobium" or communities of monks under one roof and under one government. Thus Helyot ascribes their origin to Antony, the famous anchorite of the Thebaid in the 3d century (Ordres Relig. Diss. Prelim. § 5). But the counter opinion, which ascribes it to Pachomius of Tabenna a century later, is more probable; for it seems to have been the want of some fixed rule to control the irregularities arising from the vast number of eremites, with their cells either entirely isolated from one another or merely grouped together casually, which gave the first occasion to "cœnobium." In fact, the growth of cœnobitism seems to have been very gradual. Large numbers of ascetics were collected near the Mons Nitrius [see CENLITÆ], and doubtless elsewhere also, long before Pachomius had founded his cœnobium. But the interval is considerable between this very imperfect organization of monks thus herding lawlessly together and the symmetrical arrangement of the Benedictine system. Very probably the earliest cœnobias were of women; for, though the word "virgins," in the account of Antony having his sister in the charge of devout women, is by no means conclusive, the female eremites would naturally be the first to feel the need of combination for mutual help and security.

The origin of the cœnobitic life is traced back to the time before the Christian æra. Something similar is seen in the pages of Plato (Legg. 780, 1), and the Pythagoreans are described by Aulus Gellius as living together and having a community of goods (Noctes Atticæ, i, 9).

Opinions have been divided among the admirers of asceticism as to the comparative merits of the solitary life and the cœnobitic. Cassian (Coll. xix, 3) looks up to the life of perfect solitude as the pinnacle of holiness, for which the cœnobitic life is only a preparatory discipline. Theophylact (St. Nunc. iv, 20) interprets "those who bear fruit an hundred-fold" in the parable as virgins and eremites. Basil (Reg. c. 1), on the contrary, and the sagacious Benedict (Reg. c. 1), prefer the life of the cœnobite as safer, more edifying, less alloyed by the taint of selfishness. Even Jerome (Epp. ad Rustic.

125; Ad Heliod. 14), his monastic fervor notwithstanding, prefers life in the community to life in utter solitude, though at first he seems to have been a zealous upholder of the contrary opinion. Doubtless experience had impressed on him the perils of solitude. Legislators found it expedient to curb the rage for eremitism. Justinian ordered monks to stay within the "cœnobium." Similarly Charlemagne discouraged hermits, while protecting cœnobitic monks, and the seventh council of Toledo censured roving and solitary monks. Even in the East the same distrust prevailed of persons undertaking more than they could bear. Thus the council in Trullo enjoined a sojourn of some time in a cœnobium as the preliminary to life in the desert. Benedict aptly illustrates the difference, from his point of view, between these two forms of asceticism. The solitary, he says, leaves the line of battle to fight in single combat. See MONASTICISM.

"Cœnobium" is used sometimes in mediæval writers for the "basilica," or church of the monastery. "Cloister" and "convent" are frequently used for "cœnobium." See also ASCETICISM; BENEDICTINE RULE; MONASTERY.

Cœnred, king of the Mercians, succeeded his uncle, Ethelred, on the resignation of the latter in 704. In 709 he followed the example of his uncle, resigned his crown, and went to Rome in company with Offa, king of the East-Saxons, where he remained for the rest of his life. In Rome, Constantine being pope then, Cœnred was shorn and made a monk "ad limina apostolorum," continuing to his last hours in prayers, fastings, and alms-deeds (Bede, H. E. v, 19). Cœnred was the fifth of the Anglo-Saxon kings who abdicated on religious grounds, following Ethelred.

Coens, HENRICUS, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, sailed from Holland Oct. 7, 1725. He served at Aquackanonk (now Passaic), N. J., Second River (now Belleville), Pompton (now Pompton Plains); at Ponds from 1730, and died Feb. 14, 1735. He wrote to Holland a detailed account of the troubles between the churches of Second River and Aquackanonk. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 8d ed. p. 213.

Cœnuald (Cœnwald, or Kenwald), a monk, was sent by archbishop Theodore to Rome, bearing written charges against Wilfred before pope Agatho. Malmesbury represents him as supporting the charges in harsh and bitter terms.

Cœnwaloh (or Cœnualh) was the eleventh bishop of London. His episcopate falls between 789, when Eadgar was bishop, and 796, when Eadwald, his successor, died. His name is attached to a questionable or spurious charter of Offa, dated 793.

Coëtivy, ALAIN DE, a French prelate, was born in Brittany, Nov. 8, 1407. He was successively bishop of Dol, of Carnouailles, and of Avignon, and was regarded as one of the most virtuous ecclesiastics of his time. He was made cardinal in 1448, performed many important missions, and died at Rome, July 22, 1474. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coëtlogon, FRANÇOIS DE, coadjutor of the bishop of Quimper in 1666, afterwards titular bishop in 1668, was born in Brittany, France, June 3, 1631. He founded in his diocese a large seminary, as well as a house of retreat, and participated in the labors of the assembly of bishops in July, 1699—the assembly which condemned the Maximes des Saints of Fénelon. He died at Quimper, Nov. 6, 1706, leaving Réflexions, Sentences, et Maximes tirées des Œuvres de Saint François-de-Sales (Paris, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coëtlosquet. JEAN GILES DE, a French prelate, was born at Saint-Pol-de-Léon, Sept. 15, 1700. He was chancellor of Bourges, and became bishop of Limoges in 1789; was preceptor of the duke of Berry, then of Louis XVI and his brothers, which functions, according to custom, admitted him into the French Academy in 1761. He died in Paris, March 21, 1784. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cœtus (a coming together, or assembly) is the name of an ecclesiastical association or assembly in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America. It was organized in 1747, being designed to supply the want of a classis or synod in this country, and was composed of ministers and elders who were in favor of the independence of the Church. Its powers were too limited to enable it to accomplish all that was hoped from its organization. For a full account, see REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. A similar body also existed in the GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA (q. v.). (W. J. R. T.)

Cœur, Pierre Louis, a French prelate, was born at Tarare (Rhône), March 14, 1805. In 1820 he became a Carthusian monk, and spent several years in the study of theology. In 1824 he was made professor at the seminary of L'Argentière, and afterwards in the seminary of Saint-Irène, where he wrote an Essai sur l'Indifférence en Matière Religieuse. He became subdeacon in 1825, deacon in 1826, and priest in 1829. In 1827 he went to Paris to attend the Sorbonne and the Collège de France. He next devoted himself to preaching for several years, with marked success, and obtained a membership in the academy at Clermont-Ferrand. In 1834 he was canon of Nantes, in 1838 of Bordeaux; in 1839 he was appointed vicar-general of Arras, and in 1841 titular canon of the metropolis. He afterwards taught sacred eloquence with great success. He was appointed to the episcopal see of Troyes Oct. 16, 1844, and consecrated Feb. 25, 1849. He died Oct. 16, 1860. He was a collaborator on the Revue Religieuse et Edifiante. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coffen, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llangofen, in Monmouthshire, and of St. Goven Chapel, in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307).

Coffin. The following additional particulars are from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.:

"The early Christians adopted the custom of the heathens in using coffins. Stone coffins were ordered for the interment of monks, by abbot Warin, of St. Albans, 1188-96; they had hitherto been buried under the green turf. In the 10th and following two centuries a low coped coffin of stone, with a hollow for the body, and a circular cavity for the head, was in use; one palm deep in St. Anselm's time. The boat shape is the most aucient, the ridge being next in point of age. St. Richard of Chichester, in the 13th century, was buried in a wooden coffin. Those of the Templars, in the Temple Church, London, are of lead, decorated with ornaments of elaborate design in low relief. An old legend represents St. Cuthbert, in his stone coffin, floating down the Tweed."

Coffin, Charles (1), a French hymnist, was born Oct. 4, 1676, at Buzancy. He studied at Beauvais and at Plessis. In 1718 he succeeded the celebrated historian, M. Rollin, as rector of the Paris University, which position he held until his death in 1749. At the instance of Monsieur de Vintimille, archbishop of Paris, he composed the hymns for the new Paris breviary. To grace of rhythm they join the most touching simplicity and tenderness. His works were published in 2 vols., Paris, 1755. Several of his hymns were also translated into English by Mason Neale and John Chandler. A number of these translations are also found in Lyra Messianica, p. 16, 36, 41, 160, 164, 169, 181, 264, 372. See Miller, Singers and Songs of the Church, p. 142; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Coffin, Charles (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newburyport, Mass., Aug. 15, 1775; graduated at Harvard College in 1793; studied theology privately, and was licensed by Essex Middle Association, May 14, 1799. He spent several years raising the endowment for Greenville College, Tenn., of which he became vice-president, and in 1810 president. In 1827 he became president of East Tennessee University at Knoxville, and remained there until 1833. He died June 3, 1853. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 246.

Coffin, Charles B., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was inducted into the ministerial office in 1868. In 1870 he was assistant minister of St. Luke's Church, New York city, which relation he sustained until 1873. In the following year he became rector of Trinity Church, Haverstraw, N. Y. He died July 9, 1875, aged forty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Coffin, Nehemiah Cogswell, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1816. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1836; studied theology for one year (1839) in Andover Theological Seminary, and graduated from Lane Theological Seminary in 1841. He was ordained Sept. 10, 1843; was stated supply at Fearing, O., from 1842 to 1845; at Beth-el and Bremen, in 1845 and 1846; at Hebron, from 1846 to 1851; teacher at Granville Female College, in 1851 and 1852; stated supply at Piqua, from 1852 to 1860; was without charge at Sandusky, in 1860 and 1861, and at Marblehead, from 1861 until his death there, Jan. 9, 1868. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 140.

Coffin, Stephen, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Alton, N. H., March 8, 1792, the youngest of fourteen children. He was converted at the age of twenty-one, and in 1839 became a member of the Church in Wolfborough. In the winter of 1841 he was ordained, and afterwards labored as an evangelist, spending most of the autumns and winters in preaching to destitute churches, and holding protracted meetings for nearly a year in Wisconsin and Illinois. He died in Dover, N. H., March 4, 1867. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1868, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Coffing, Jackson Green, a Congregational minister, was born at Redstone, Pa., Sept. 21, 1824. He graduated at Marietta College in 1853; was a student at Union Theological Seminary from 1853 to 1856; then a resident licentiate in 1856 and 1857; was ordained Nov. 9, 1856; was a foreign missionary at Aintab, Western Asia, from 1857 to 1861; also at Hajin and Adana, in 1861 and 1862, and was assassinated at Alexandretta, March 26, 1862. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 77.

Coggeshall, Freeborn, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Newport, R. I., Dec. 31, 1845. When he was a child his parents removed to Providence, and he fitted for college in the high-school of that city. He graduated with the highest honors of his class at Brown University in 1867. He immediately entered the General Theological Seminary in New York, where he was a student for three years, with the exception of six months, which were spent in travel in the old world. He was ordained a deacon June 12, 1871, and commenced a mission at Elmwood, near Providence. He was ordained presbyter Dec. 22 of the same year, and for about a year was assistant rector of the "House of Prayer" in Newark, N. J. He was assistant rector of the Church of the Advent in Boston, from the fall of 1872 until June, 1874, when he resigned his office and went abroad, intending to spend three or four years in theological and literary study at the University of Oxford. While engaged in his studies he performed ministerial duties in Oxford and the neighboring villages. Two years were devoted to most congenial work, and he had made his arrangements to return to his native country, when he died at Oxford, Oct. 6, 1876. See Brown University Necrology, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Coggeshalle, RALPH DEK, a learned English Cistercian and historian, is chiefly known by his Chronicle of the Holy Land, which is valuable because he was an eye-witness of the facts related. He was at Jerusalem, and was wounded there during the siege of that city by Saladin. He died about 1228. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Coggin, David, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1817; graduated from Dartmouth College in 1836, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1841; was ordained May 11, 1842; was pastor at Westhampton, Mass., and remained there until his death, April 28, 1852. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 145.

Coggin, Jacob, a Congregational minister, was born at Woburn, Mass., Sept. 5, 1782. He graduated from Harvard College in 1803; studied theology with his pastor, Rev. Jonas Chickering, and was ordained in Tewksbury, Oct. 22, 1806. Here he was sole pastor for more than forty years. Twice he represented Tewksbury in the legislature; was chosen, in 1852, a presidential elector, and in 1853 was a delegate to the convention for revising the constitution of the state. Governor Clifford appointed him one of the inspectors of the state's alma-house, upon the establishment of that institution, and he was chaplain of it till his decease, Dec. 12, 1854. See Necrology of Harvard College, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Coghill, DONALD R. M., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, where he was converted at the age of fifteen, and was educated at the university there. He was received by the conference in 1834, and sent to Hexham, next to Aberdeen, and finally to Wigton. In 1840 bodily affliction compelled him to give up the active work. He died April 9, 1842. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842.

Cogitosa, a monk of Kildare, is commemorated on April 18, in the Mart. Tallaght, where he is called "the wise." There is great diversity in the dates of his life, as given by different writers, but Lanigan and Petrie prove incontrovertibly that Cogitosa must have written previously to A.D. 831, when Kildare was first plundered, and must have flourished at latest in the beginning of the 9th century (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, i, 379 sq.).

Cogler, NERIGANDUS, a German poet of the Benedictine order, who lived in the early part of the 17th century, wrote Stille Poetica et Profana (Augsburg, 1730). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Cognac, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Coprinacense or Cumpaniacum), were French provincial synods as follows:

I. Held on the Monday after the octave of Easter, 1238, by Gérard de Malemort, archbishop of Bordeaux, together with his suffragans. Thirty-eight canons, or articles of regulation, were published, among which we find some that show what great abuses had then crept into the monastic system.

9. Orders that each bishop shall take care that sentences of excommunication pronounced by a brother bishop be enforced within his own diocese.

12 and 13. Forbid priests and monks to act as advocates in any cause, save that of their own churches or of the poor.

18. Fines those who continue forty days in a state of excommunication.

19. Directs that not only those persons who maltreat a clergyman shall be excluded from holding any ecclesiastical office or preferment, but their descendants also to the third generation.

20. Forbids abbots to give money to their monks in lieu of board, lodging, and clothing; also to take any entrance-fee from new-comers. Orders that, if the revenues of the house are too small for the maintenance of a large number of monks, the number shall be reduced.

22. Forbids monks to leave their walls without leave, and to eat abroad.

25. Orders that if either monk or canon shall be found to possess any property, he shall be deprived of church burial.

29. Forbids them to eat their meals with lay persons.

30. Forbids their living alone in priories, etc.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 556.

II. Held in 1255, by the same archbishop, in which thirty-nine canons were published. The first seventeen are but a repetition of those of the Council of Cognac in 1238.

19. Relates to fasting and abstinence.

20. Prohibits, under pain of excommunication, to eat flesh in Lent, especially on the first Sunday.

21. Contains a list of festivals to be observed throughout the year.

22. Declares that there are but ten prefaces.

23. Forbids the laity to enter the choir during service.

24. Directs that women about the time of their confinement shall confess and communicate.

26. Excommunicates those who attend fairs and markets on Sundays or festival days.

28. Forbids the married clergy to exercise any ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

29. Forbids to bury any corpse within the church, except that of the founder, the patron, or the chaplain.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 746.

III. Held in 1260, by Pierre de Roncevaux, archbishop of Bordeaux. Nineteen statutes were made.

1. Forbids night-service or vigils either in the church or church-yard, on account of the disorders committed by the people who attended.

2. Forbids an ancient custom of dancing within the church on the day of the festival of the Holy Innocents, and choosing a mock bishop.

5. Forbids a priest to marry parties belonging to another parish without the license of the chaplain or prior belonging to that parish.

7. Forbids, under anathema, cock-fighting, then much practiced in schools.

15 and 16. Forbid extra-parochial burial without the curate's permission. One object of this canon was to prevent the ecclesiastical burial of excommunicated persons.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 799.

IV. Held in 1262, by the archbishop of Bordeaux. Seven statutes were published.

1. Lays under an interdict those places in which ecclesiastical persons or property were forcibly detained.

5. Enjoins the clergy to say the office within churches with closed doors in places under interdict, and forbids any of the parishioners attending.

Another council was held by the same archbishop in the following year; the place is uncertain. Seven articles were agreed upon, of which the second declares that a person under sentence of excommunication for twelve months shall be looked upon as a heretic. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 820-822.

Cognatus. See CAGNAZZO.

Cognatus (or Cousin), JOHANNES, a Flemish historian and theologian, lived in the early part of the 17th century; was canon of the cathedral of Tournay, and wrote, De Fundamentis Religionis (Douay, 1597):—

De Prosperitate ex Ezitio Salomonis (ibid. 1599):—Histoire de Tournai (in French, ibid. 1619, 2 vols.):—Historia Sanctorum (ibid. 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cogshall, ISRAEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Schenectady, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1820. He was converted at the age of nineteen; soon afterwards received license to exhort; removed to Michigan, where he was licensed to preach, and, after spending some time teaching school and preaching, was admitted into the Michigan Conference in 1843. At the opening of the Rebellion, he was appointed chaplain of the 19th regiment of Michigan Volunteers; on his return from the army served two years as agent of Albion College, and then again entered the regular itinerant ranks, in which he remained faithful until his death, April 7, 1879. Mr. Cogshall was thoroughly devoted to all the interests of the Church. He was a man of decided opinions and strong convictions, kind, sympathetic, active, studious, and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 65.

Cogswell, James, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., Jan. 6, 1720. He graduated at Yale College in 1742, and was ordained in 1744 over the Church in Canterbury, where he labored twenty-seven years. His next charge was Scotland, from 1772 to 1804. He died at the house of his son, Dr. Mason Fitch Cogswell, in Hartford, Jan. 2, 1807. He was "learned, social, benevolent, submissive." He published six Sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 353.

Cogswell, Jonathan, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rowley, Mass., Sept. 2, 1782. He was converted when seventeen years of age, was educated at Harvard College, ordained in 1810, and stationed at Saco, where he labored with great success for eighteen years. In 1829 he was called to New Britain, Conn., where he labored faithfully for five years. In 1834 he was elected professor of ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary at East Windsor. He retired from public life on account of failing health, in 1844, and resided at New Brunswick, N. J., until his death, Aug. 1, 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 85.

Cohana Forseh, in Lamaism, is an idol of the Tartars and Kalmucks, which seems to bear a resemblance to Siva, of India—at least, he is the destroyer. In one of his eight hands he holds a human head by the hair, and a skeleton head in another; out of the fire which surrounds him there is a skull visible. A broad chain of similar ornaments hangs below the breast and thigh. His three eyes see the present, the future, and the past; his eight hands are armed with all sorts of instruments of torture for his victims. At his feet there is a woman, whose head he seems to be about to cut off. He lives entirely in flames, and in these he kills every one who approaches him; therefore Cohana Forseh is the most terrific idol in the entire Tartar circle of deities.

Cohen, Abraham BEN-SABATA, a Jewish scholar, was born at Zante in 1670. He died in 1729. He composed a Paraphrase of the Psalms in Hebrew verse, published at Venice in 1719. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. Zanti.

Cohen, Moses, a French rabbi of the 3d century, was born at Lunel, in Languedoc. He combated the principles of the famous Maimonides, and gained the esteem of his co-religionists by various works which have not been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cohon, ANTHYME DENIS, a French prelate, was born at Craon, in Anjou, in 1594. He was sent to his uncle, canon of the cathedral of Mans, to commence his studies, and thus had no difficulty in gaining admittance to the college of Angers. He hesitated for a time between oratory and law, but finally chose the former. On the resignation of his uncle he became canon of Mans, and later bishop of Nismes. His conduct during the pestilence of 1640 was worthy of much praise. In 1641 he assisted at the assembly of Nantes. On the death of cardinal Richelieu, who had been his patron and protector, he attached himself to cardinal Mazarin. But the Protestants and even the Catholics became his enemies, and Mazarin was obliged to remove him, and he accordingly sent him to the see of Dol. Cohon soon after abdicated in favor of Robert Cupif. After spending two years at the priory of St. Lonan, Cohon returned to the court, and rendered valuable service to Mazarin. At the consecration of Louis XIV he occupied the pulpit of the church at Rheims, and pronounced a discourse. Having already received the abbey of Flaran, after the consecration the young king also gave to him the abbey of Le Tronchet. His recall to the bishopric of Nismes only surrounded him again with trouble and difficulties, and he died there Nov. 7, 1670, leaving. Lettre a M. le Cardinal de Lyon, found in MS. in the national library:—Lettre Contenant la Cabale Secrète avec Mazarin (Paris, 1649):—A qui Aime la Vérité (anonymous):—Ordonnances Synodales du Diocèse de Nismes (1670). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coifi was the chief of the heathen priests of Edwin, king of Northumbria, in A.D. 627. He advised his master to accept Christianity at the preaching of Paulinus, and he himself desecrated the temple at Goodmanham, where he had so often officiated (Bede, H. E. ii, 13).

Coimbra, Bernardo de, a Portuguese Benedictine of the convent of Alcobaca, an encyclopedist of the middle ages, of whom little is known. His book, still in MS., contains, De Cælo et Terra, de Luce, Aquæ, Sole, Luna et Stellis, de Picibus et Avibus; de Purificatione de Formatione Primi Hominis; de Adam, Eva et Serpente, de Sex Diebus et Septimana; de Adam, Eva et Filiis Eorum; de Enos, Enoch et Noe; de Arca et Diluvio; de Corvo et Columba; de Iride; de Vineâ Noe et Inebriatione Ejus; and in the fourth part, de Corporali et Spirituali Fornicationi; de Lupsu Cujusdam Virginis; de Violatore Virginis, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coimbra, Manoel de (I), a Portuguese theologian, born at Obidos, Brazil, was an indefatigable translator, and died in the 17th century, at the age of eighty years, leaving a large number of works, among which we cite, Banquete da Alma (1687):—Practica dos Exercícios Spirituaes de Santo Ignacio (Lisbon, 1687):—Astro Vespertino de S. Lucar Theresa de Jesus (1689):—Reliquia do Sump-tuoso Apparato na Canonisação de Cinco Santos: S. Laurencio Justiniano, S. João Cupistrano, S. João de Sahagun, S. João de Deus e S. Paschoal Raylon (ibid. 1691).

Coimbra, Manoel de (2), a Portuguese theologian, was born in the 17th century, in Coimbra, and belonged to a noble family. He entered the order of St. Francis, and became guardian of the convent of San Francisco de Covilhão in 1695; and occupied the same position at Coimbra about 1706. He became definitor of his order in the chapter of 1709, and died in 1727, leaving, Epítome Historial da Vida e Virtudes e Portentosa do Inicito e Glorioso Padre S. João Capistrano, etc. (Lisbon, 1692).

Coinchenn (or Conchenn) was the name of two Irish virgin saints in the 7th and 8th centuries:

1. COINCHENN OF CAEL-ACHADH is commemorated Aug. 20. Her monastery was probably at Killeigh, King's County, and she died about A.D. 748, according to the Irish annals (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 607).

2. COINCHENN, THE DEVOUT, flourished, according to Colgan, in Ulster, in the beginning of the 7th century. She became abbess of Cill-Sleibhe, and died in 654. She is commemorated on March 13 (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 38 sq.; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 168 n., 267).

Coiner, ERASMUS T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ross County, O., Feb. 2, 1832. He removed, at the age of sixteen, with his parents to Des Moines County, Ia.; experienced religion in 1852; entered Mount Pleasant Collegiate Institute the same year; graduated at Iowa Wesleyan University in 1857; received license to exhort the same year, and entered the Iowa Conference. In 1861 he enlisted in the Fourth Iowa Cavalry, and was made first lieutenant of company D, in which capacity he proved himself a good soldier and officer, as well as an exemplary Christian. He died at Jacksonport, Arkansas, June 28, 1863. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 156.

Coiningen, in the Irish martyrologies, is called the pupil of St. Mac Tail, bishop of Cill-Cuilinn, who died about A.D. 548, and is said to have been denounced by the clergy of Leinster on her account. She is identified with "St. Cunch of Cill-Fionmaighe" in the County Wicklow, and is commemorated April 29.

Coinsi, GAUTHIER DE, a French ecclesiastic and poet, was born at Amiens in 1177. He was successively prior of the abbey of Vic-sur-Aisne, and of that of St. Médard of Soissons. He died in 1236, leaving in manuscript a French translation in verse of the Miracles de Notre-Dame, written originally in Latin by Hugh Farsi, Herman, Guibert of Nogent, etc. Several copies of this MS. are found in the imperial library of Paris. Some of the accounts of Coinsi were published by Legrand d'Aussi in his Recueil des Fabliaux. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cointa. See QUINTA.

Coinualch (Coinwalch, or Cenwalh), king of Wessex, succeeded his father Cynegild in 642, being still a heathen. In 645, having been driven from his country by Penda, king of Mercia, he took refuge with Anna, king of the East-Angles, at whose court he was converted to Christianity, and baptized by Felix, the bishop of the East-Angles. After three years of exile he returned and introduced Christianity into his dominions. The West-Saxon kingdom was greatly developed during his reign. He is the traditional founder of the see and cathedral of Winchester (Bede, H. E. iii, 7; iv, 12). He died in 672.

Coislin, Henri Charles DE CAMBOUT, duke of, a French prelate, nephew of the following, was born at Paris, Sept. 15, 1664. He became successively prince-bishop of Metz, first almoner of the king, and member of the French Academy. Like his uncle, he displayed remarkable charity towards his diocesans; but he had a controversy with Rome, particularly on the bull Unigenitus. He bequeathed to the abbey of St. Germain the celebrated library inherited by him from chancellor Seguier. Montfaucon gave a catalogue of the Greek manuscripts of the large collection, to a great extent destroyed by a fire in 1793, the remains of which have been collected in the national library. Coislin died in 1732, having published a Choix des Statuts Synodaux of his predecessors in 1699:—Rituel (1713). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coislin, Pierre de CAMBOUT DE, a French prelate, was born at Paris in 1636. He became bishop of Orleans, first almoner of the king, then grand almoner of France, and cardinal. He was held in high veneration for his benevolence, and the wise manner in which he accomplished the duties of his office, and for the aid which he rendered the Calvinists in allaying the persecution directed against them by the government after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He died Feb. 5, 1706. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coit, Gurdon Saltonstall, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Connecticut in 1809. He graduated at Yale College in 1828; studied theology in Andover Theological Seminary one year; was ordained deacon Aug. 8, 1830, and presbyter at St. John's Church, Bridgeport, Conn., in 1833; was rector of Christ Church, West Haven, in 1864 and 1865; of St. Michael's Church, Naugatuck, in 1866. After this time he preached occasionally, and died at Southport, Nov. 10, 1869. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 97.

Coit, John Calkins, a Presbyterian minister, was born at New London, Conn., in 1799. For a time he studied and practiced law, and was president of a bank in Cheraw, S. C. He was finally ordained and installed pastor of an old-school Presbyterian Church in Cheraw. His ecclesiastical and political sentiments were of a very decided character. During the last few years of his life he was without pastoral charge, and, for the improvement of his health, resided in Wisconsin, North Carolina, and South Carolina successively. He died in Cheraw, Feb. 6, 1863. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1864.

Coit, John Summerfield, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New Jersey in 1828. He received a careful religious training; was apprenticed to a carpenter in Newark at the age of seventeen; experienced religion about this time; served the Church as class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher; spent a year and a half in hard study at Pennington Seminary; and in 1853 was admitted into the New Jersey Conference. In 1867 he was transferred to the Des Moines Conference, and in it served zealously until his death, Jan. 7, 1868. Mr. Coit was emphatically a good man, and an humble, devoted, and useful preacher. He was ever ready and courageous. His preaching was sound, practical, and earnest. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 283.

Coit, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at New London, Conn., April 4, 1673. He graduated at Harvard College in 1697, and was settled for several years on the Quinebaug, being ordained in 1705 and dismissed in 1748. His territory included what is now Plainfield and Canterbury. He died July 1, 1750, universally lamented. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 289.

Coit, Joseph Howland, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city, Nov. 3, 1802. He graduated from Columbia College in 1820; studied two years thereafter in Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained deacon in 1825; spent nearly the whole of his ministerial life, after 1832, as rector of Trinity Church, Plattsburgh, N. Y., and died there, Oct. 1, 1866. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1867, p. 101; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 39.

Coit, J. Townsend, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Buffalo, N. Y., May 8, 1824. He graduated at Yale College in 1844; during his college course was converted; entered the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., in 1845; after completing his studies, sailed for Europe in 1849, and remained there two years. In 1851 he was licensed by the Niagara Presbytery; in 1854, accepted a call from the Church at Albion, N. Y., where he labored for five years; in 1860, accepted a call from the Church of St. Peter's, in Rochester, and died Jan. 23, 1863. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 105.

Cok, James, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted the first Protestant minister at Ladykirk in 1585, and was before the assembly in 1597 "for tryal of the ministers of Orkney." There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 412.

Cok, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1612; was admitted to the living of Cross and Burness before July, 1624, the first minister after the parish was formed; transferred to Ladykirk in 1635, and died Jan. 28, 1646, aged about fifty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 409, 412.

Cokburne, James, a Scotch clergyman, was presented by the king to the parsonage and vicarage of Ayr in 1573, with the gift of the emolument of Kilmuir in 1576; had a presentation to the living at Muckhart in 1585, and was deposed for non-residence in 1591. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 776.

Coker, George W., a Baptist minister, was born in Macon County, Tenn., June 11, 1818. He united with the Church in 1837, and soon after was licensed to preach. In March, 1841, he moved to Wayne County, south-east Missouri, where he was ordained in April, 1843. He next took up his residence in Bollinger County, where he lived about twenty years, and during that time had the pastoral care of several churches, itinerating much in that region, and acting as missionary of the Cape Girardeau Association. He moved to Carlyle, Ill., in 1864, where he gathered a church, of which he was pastor, and subsequently had charge of one or two other churches. He died May 25, 1874. See Burum, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, 150-152. (J. C. S.)

Cola, GENNARO DI, an old Neapolitan painter, was born in 1320, and studied under Maestro Simone. The principal works of this artist are the altar-piece in Santa Maria, Naples, representing the Virgin and Dead Christ, with angels holding the instruments of the passion; A Magdalene in the chapel of the same church; The Nativity and The Annunciation, in the tribune of San Giovanni. He died in 1370. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colachus. See CELLACH.

Colan, Wilson, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Newmarket, N. H., in 1775. In early life he removed to Berwick, Me., and in 1800 removed to Waterville, where he became a Christian, and united with the Church. Subsequently he was ordained. In 1812 he removed to Fairfield, a few miles from Waterville, where he had purchased a farm. He preached on the Sabbath, and attended the meetings of his denomination, quarterly and yearly. Thus he spent fifteen years, and then devoted himself wholly to ministerial work, travelling among the poor churches, seldom receiving anything for his services, but rather contributing from his own resources to help his needy brethren. He died at Fairfield, Aug. 1, 1846. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1848, p. 79, 80. (J. C. S.)

Colangelo, FRANCESCO, an Italian theologian and scholar, was born at Naples, Nov. 25, 1769. In 1788 he entered the congregation of the Oratory of Italy, in which he occupied high positions, and in 1820 was raised to the episcopal see of Castellamare. In 1825 he was appointed president of the Council of Public Instruction in the kingdom of Naples. He died Jan. 15, 1836, leaving, Opuscoli Scientifici di Filalete:—Raccolta di Opere Appartenenti Alla Storia Letteraria:—Il Galileo Proposto Alla Gioventù:—Vita del Pontano:—Vita di Antonio Beccadelli, detto il Panarmila:—Vita di Gio. Crisostomo Intitolata che Cristo sia Dio, translated from the Greek, with notes. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colas, JEAN FRANÇOIS (also called de Guyenne), a French scholar, was born at Orleans in 1702. He entered the Jesuit order, but withdrew on account of his health, and became successively canon of Saint-Pierre-Empont and of the royal church of Saint-Aignan. He died Nov. 3, 1772, leaving, Oraison Funèbre de Louis d'Orléans (Orleans, 1752):—Discours sur la Pucelle d'Orléans (ibid. 1760):—Le Manuel du Cultivateur dans le Vignoble d'Orléans (ibid. 1770). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colb, ANDREW, a Scotch clergyman, was the first Protestant minister to the parish of Redgorton, appointed in 1574, having Luncarty in charge; was presented to the vicarage in 1577, and continued in 1591. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 555.

Colbenschlag (or Colbenius), STKPHEN, a German engraver, was born at Salzburg in 1591. He visited Italy early, and afterwards Rome, where he resided chiefly, and engraved several plates after the Italian masters, among which are, The Descent from the Cross; The Adoration of the Shepherds. He died in 1683. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Colberg, Ehregott Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Colberg, in Pomerania, Jan. 26, 1659. He studied at the different universities, was for a time professor of ethics and history at Greifswald, afterwards pastor and member of consistory at Wismar, where he died, Oct. 30, 1698. He wrote, De Tolerantia Diversarum Religionum in Polonia:—De Origine et Progressu Hæresium et Errorum in Ecclesia:—De Sapientia Veterum Hebræorum:—Phatomisch-hermetisches Christenthum. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 501. (B. P.)

Colberg, Johann, father of the preceding, died doctor and professor of the theology at Greifswald, Sept. 19, 1687, leaving, De Syncretismo:—De Libris Symbolicis:—De Verbo Dei. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Colbert, MICHEL, a French ascetic theologian, was born about 1633. He entered the order of Præmonstrants, and became abbot-general in 1670. He died at Paris, March 29, 1702, leaving Lettres d'un Abbé à ses Religieux (Paris):—Lettres de Consolation, addressed to his sister on the loss of her husband. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Colbert DE SEIGNELAY, a French prelate and statesman, was born in 1736 at Castle Hill, in Scotland, the original seat of the Colbert family. Being sent while young to France, he embraced the ecclesiastical calling, shortly after obtained the abbey of Val-Richer and Sorèze, and became vicar-general of Toulouse at the age of twenty-six. He was appointed, in 1781, bishop of Rode, and held various important positions in the ecclesiastical affairs of his time. Colbert joined great knowledge with sincere piety and pure morals. He died about 1808. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colburn, Hanford, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was received into the Oneida Conference at its organization in 1832, ordained deacon, and sent to Danby Station, which then had only three members, without church, parsonage, or salary, but before a year closed he had a great revival. Subsequently he served Newark, Owego, and Binghamton. He was then made financial agent of Cazenovia Seminary, and in 1840 elected to the principalship of that institution. Being driven by sickness in his family to enter the mercantile business, he located at Elmira; also practiced medicine, which he had studied in his youth, at Albion. At the time of his death, in 1881, he was a member of the Central New York Conference. Mr. Colburn was a wise counsellor, a faithful friend, and a man of God. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 380.

Colburn, Jonas, a Congregational minister, was born at Dracut, Mass., Oct. 25, 1789. He studied at Phillips Academy, Andover, graduated at Middlebury College in 1817, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; travelled a year in western New York as a missionary, and then returned and preached for a short time in several villages in New England, when he was ordained, in 1824, over the Church in Leverett, Mass. His other charges were Stoneham, Mass., and Wells, Me., whence he was dismissed in 1844; and did not again take a settled charge, but preached in various villages according to opportunity. He died in Chicopee, Mass., Nov. 19, 1862. See Cong. Quarterly, 1862, p. 191.

Colburn, Moses McLellan, a Congregational minister, was born at Fair Haven, Vt., Sept. 17, 1819. He studied at Burr Seminary, Manchester, and graduated from the University of Vermont in 1844; then taught in Montpelier two years, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1850. The next year he was ordained pastor of Pacific Church, New Bedford, Mass.; in 1852 was installed at South Dedham (now Norwood), where he remained until 1866; in that year became acting pastor at Waukegan, Ill.; and after a four years' service assumed the same relation to the Church at St. Joseph, Mich., where he remained until his death, Jan. 26, 1876. Mr. Colburn was a conscientious student and an instructive preacher. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 413, 431.

Colburn, Samuel S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greene County, Tenn., May 1, 1807. He removed to Lafayette County, Mo., in 1831, was converted in 1832, licensed to preach in 1833, and in 1835 entered the Missouri Conference, laboring therein continuously until 1859, when he became superannuated; but still continued to preach, as health permitted, until his death, Aug. 26, 1875. Mr. Colburn was a man of thorough consecration, untiring energy, and living piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 235; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Colburn, Samuel W., a Congregational minister, was born in Lebanon, N. H., about 1785. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1808, was ordained at West Taunton, Mass., Aug. 29, 1809, and remained there until Dec. 9, 1812. For some months he performed missionary labor in the state of Rhode Island. His health having been restored, he became pastor of the Third Church in East Abington, Mass., Oct. 13, 1813, and remained until Feb. 5, 1830. His subsequent pastorates, which were not of long duration, were at Newark, N. J., West Attleboro, and Sandwich, Mass., and Little Camp-ton, R. I. He died in New York city, Dec. 19, 1854. See Memorials of R. I. Congregational Ministers. (J. C. S.)

Colburn, Zerah, for several years an itinerant minister of the Methodist Church, was born at Cabot, Vt., Sept. 1, 1804. He was remarkably precocious, and so noted, as a child, for talent in computation that his father exhibited him in different cities in America and in Europe. Zerah spent three years in the Westminster school in London. On the death of his father in London, in 1824, he returned to the United States, and became a member of the Congregational Church in Burlington, Vt., but not long afterwards joined the Methodists. Mr. Colburn is said to have displayed no uncommon ability as a preacher, and to have lost his peculiar mathematical power. He died at Norwich, Vt., March 2, 1839. (J. C. S.)

Colby, Gardner, a distinguished Baptist layman and philanthropist, was born at Bowdoinham, Me., Sept. 3, 1810. When but twenty years of age he opened a store in Boston, and steadily rose in mercantile success, carrying on for many years the manufacture of woollen goods, in connection with Hon. J. Wiley Edmunds, and during the late civil war becoming a large government contractor for the army. In 1870 he was interested in the building of the Wisconsin Central Railroad, and in securing the government appropriation of lands along its line. Early in his business life he formed the habit of cheerful giving; for years was a trustee and treasurer of the Newton Theological Institution; and gave liberally to Brown University, of which he was a trustee for nearly a quarter of a century. The cause of missions, both home and foreign, found in him an efficient helper. In 1867 the name of Waterville College was changed to that of Colby University, in testimony of the appreciation of the corporation of a gift of $60,000 made to the institution by Mr. Colby. He died at his residence in Newton Centre, April 2, 1879. See The Boston Advertiser, May, 3, 1879; The Watchman, April 10, 1879; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Colby, John, a Baptist minister, was born in Sandwich, N. H., Dec. 9, 1787, but at fifteen years of age moved to what is now Sutton, Vt. He made a profession of his faith by baptism Dec. 8, 1805, about four years after was licensed to preach, was ordained Nov. 30, 1809, and spent nearly the whole of 1811 in New Hampshire as an itinerant. His work was greatly blessed, revivals of religion everywhere following his labors, especially in Montville, Me., where many were converted. Mr. Colby continued his itinerant work for the next year or two, visiting many sections of New England, and preaching with great zeal and unction. On his way south for the benefit of his health, he died at Norfolk, Va., Dec. 23, 1818. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Ministers, p. 55-63. (J. C. S.)

Colclazer, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Georgetown, D. C., April 5, 1811. He was converted in Ohio in 1830, and in 1851 entered the North Indiana Conference, in which he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, Sept. 26, 1865. Mr. Colclazer was a plain, earnest man, a good preacher, and a faithful Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 69.

Colcu. See COLGA.

Colcawa, Charles, a Bohemian scholar of the Jesuit order, who lived in the early half of the 18th century, wrote, Ezerclaciones Dramaticæ (Prague, 1703, 3 vols.):—Progygnasmata in Triplici Genere Chriarum (ibid. 1708). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colden is the family name of several Scotch clergymen, of whom we notice the following:

1. ALEXANDER, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1675; became minister to the Presbyterian congregation at Enniscorthy, Ireland; was called to the living at Boukle, Scotland, in 1690; was a member of the General Assembly the same year, and also in 1692; was transferred to Dunse in 1693, and promoted to Osnam in 1700. He scrupled to take the oath of abjuration, but did so in 1719. He died June 29, 1738, aged eighty-three years. Mr. Colden wrote the preface to Boston's Crook in the Lot, and was a true friend of that author, and a minister of true piety, learning, wisdom, and diligence. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 404-408, 510, 511.

2. GEORGE, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1627, was presented to the living at Kinross in 1641, and died while attending a meeting of the synod at St. Andrews, April 5, 1665, aged sixty years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 596.

3. JAMES, son of the minister at Oxnam, was licensed to preach in 1722; presented to the living at Whitsome in 1723, and ordained; and died Sept. 20, 1754, aged fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 451.

4. JOHN, second Protestant minister at Borthwick in 1586; was transferred to Newlanda, but was refused in 1592; resigned in 1594, and was admitted to Kinross. He, with two others, was appointed to sharply rebuke the earl and countess of Morton for entertaining in their house the earl of Huntly and others. He was a member of the assembly in 1602, and was one of forty-two who signed a protest to parliament in 1606 against the introduction of episcopacy. He opposed the archbishop taking the moderator's chair at the synod in 1607, for which he was censured and restricted to his parish. He died before Oct. 6, 1640. His son George succeeded to the benefice. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 252, 266; ii, 596.

5. ROBERT, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1626; was first a minister in Ireland, but was driven off by the cruelty of the rebels, and a collection was made for him in the kirk at Dunfermline in March, 1643. He was appointed minister at Boukle, Scotland, in 1650, and died after March 29, 1664. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 408.

6. THOMAS, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1657, was appointed to the living at Dalmeny in 1664, transferred to Carsphairn in 1669, and continued in March, 1672. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 181, 705.

Colding, PAUL JANUS, a Danish scholar, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, and preached at Winding, in the isle of Zealand, wrote Etymologicum Latinum, cum Interpretatione Donica (Rostock, 1622). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Cole, Albert (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Saco, Me., Feb. 19, 1809. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1834; studied at the Theological Institute of Connecticut, and completed his course at Bangor, Me., in 1837; was ordained at Blue Hills, Oct. 24, the same year, and, after a successful pastorate, was dismissed Aug. 23, 1843. He died at his native place, March 23, 1845. See Hist. Cat. of Theological Institute of Connecticut, p. 15. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Albert (2), a Congregational minister, was born at Cornish, Me., July 15, 1818. He studied at Limerick Academy, and graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1846; was ordained pastor of the Church in Winslow March 24, 1847, and dismissed Dec. 31, 1850. About three years he was acting pastor in Sanford, and held the same position in Limerick from 1853 until December, 1855, when he was installed pastor. Although he resigned this parish in March, 1857, he was not dismissed until March, 1860. He was acting pastor in Cornish from 1858 until his death, Jan. 29, 1881. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 25.

Cole, Baxter, an English Independent minister, studied under Dr. Marryat in London. He was first a teacher at Peckham, then morning preacher at Rope-maker's Walk, Moorfields. In 1765 he removed to Wyomondham, Norfolk; but in 1766 returned to London, and devoted himself to literary pursuits, for which his learning, piety, diligence, and sound judgment qualified him. He was actively employed in publishing Dr. Lardner's works; in 1793 in editing the Protestant Dissenters' Magazine, and several other publications. He died in Essex (his native place), Oct. 13, 1794, aged about seventy years. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 554.

Cole, Benjamin (1), a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1760, and was licensed by the Lewiston Conference (so called), and ordained an evangelist in 1801. In 1802 he was chosen pastor of the Church in Lewiston, and continued in this relation nearly forty years, with the exception of a few short intervals, when he was engaged in missionary labors in destitute sections of the state of Maine. He died in September, 1839. See Millett, History of Baptists in Maine, p. 440. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Benjamin (2), a Canadian Methodist minister, was born in Quebec in 1825. He was converted in 1849, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1855, retired in 1870, and died at Abbotsford, Aug. 2, 1870. He was generous, cheerful, social, an enthusiastic musician, a true friend, and deeply pious. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries (Toronto), 1867, v, 250.

Cole, Charles, an English Baptist minister, was born at Wellow, Somerset, May 20, 1733. He was brought up in the Church of England, converted in 1753 under a Baptist minister, baptized in 1756; began to preach in May, 1758, at Whitchurch, and for fifty-four years continued to minister there and in some villages around; his church increasing fourfold. He died Dec. 8, 1813. Mr. Cole published some hymns in 1789 with the title A Threefold Alphabet of New Hymns. See Gadsby, Hymn-writers, p. 39.

Cole, Clifford, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Stark, N. H., Feb. 19, 1813. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which his parents were members, but subsequently joined a Free-will Baptist Church. He was licensed to preach in 1842; ordained Jan. 13, 1845, and became pastor of the Stark and Milan Church, where, for twenty years, he continued to be loved and respected in the community and blessed in his labors. He died June 10, 1882. See Morning Star, July 12, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Erastus, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Colesville, N. Y., Aug. 18, 1796. He was educated in Oneida Academy, and began his ministerial labors in Colesville. In 1839 he removed to Litchfield, O., where he was pastor for two years; then to Huron, in 1841, where he remained for six years. He died Oct. 18, 1862. Mr. Cole was regarded by his associates as an able, evangelical, and earnest preacher of the Gospel. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 290.

Cole, George (1), an English Baptist minister, was born at Bodiest, Northamptonshire, Jan. 13, 1798. He was converted at the age of fifteen, joined the Wesleyans, and became a local preacher. In 1823 he united with a Baptist church in Kimbolton. He studied under his pastor, and in 1826 was ordained in Lynn, Norfolk; in 1828 became pastor in Kenilworth, in 1831 in Leamington, and in 1838 removed to Evesham, Worcestershire. In 1842 he accepted a call to the Church Street Church, Blackfriars, London. His next pastorate was in Exeter, and his last in Naunton, Gloucestershire, where he died, Dec. 31, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858, p. 48. (J. C. S.)

Cole, George (2), a Baptist educator and editor, was born at Sterling, Conn., June 22, 1808, and graduated from Brown University in 1834. From that year to 1837 he was professor of mathematics in Granville College (now Denison University), O. In 1838 he became editor of what is now The Journal and Messenger at Cincinnati, which office he held for nine years. For several years he was engaged in secular business, being, for a part of the time, one of the editors of the Cincinnati Gazette. In 1856 he returned to his old position as editor of The Journal and Messenger, and remained in this position until 1864. He died in Dayton, Ky., July 14, 1868. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 245. (J. C. S.)

Cole, George Washington, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Saco, Me., Jan. 5, 1805, and graduated from Bowdoin College in 1830. After teaching in Germantown, Pa., for a year, he pursued a course of theological study in the General Theological Seminary of New York. For two years thereafter he was a professor in Bristol College, Pa.; was next rector of a parish in Westchester for a year; of a parish in Te-counsel, Mich., four years; and had entered upon his ministerial duties in Kalamazoo, when he died, in 1840. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 408. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Isaac D., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Spring Valley, N. Y., Jan. 25, 1799. His early life was passed in the Collegiate Church of New York city, under the instructions of Drs. J. H. Livingston, J. N. Abeel, and G. A. Kuypers; and from 1807 to the date of his conversion, in 1818, under the ministry of Christian Bork. Owing to repeated attacks of blindness, brought on by excessive study, his attempts to enter college were defeated. In 1826 he became a successful teacher in New York city. The difficulty with his eyes having passed away, he graduated from New Brunswick Seminary in 1829; was licensed by the Classis of New York, Aug. 4 of that year; and ordained by the Classis of Paramus, May 24, 1831. He was assistant pastor at Tappan from November, 1829, to May 24, 1831; colleague at Tappan until Dec. 12, 1832; Second Church, Totowa, till Dec. 16, 1833; Tappan again, to Feb. 9, 1864; and afterwards remained without a charge, but occasionally supplied the Presbyterian Church at New Hempstead, N. Y., till Aug. 30, 1878, when he died. He was a plain, strong, clear, honest, earnest, loving man and preacher. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 213.

Cole, James, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1776, converted in early life, and became pastor of an Independent Church in Bury St. Edmunda. In 1801 he was baptized by immersion, and became, in 1806, the pastor of the Baptist Church in the same place in which he began his ministerial work. Here he remained until 1817, and then removed to Otley, where, for more than sixteen years, he labored with much acceptance and success. He died May 26, 1837. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1838, p. 22. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Jirah D., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Catskill, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1802. He was converted under the ministry of Dr. Howard Malcom, then a youthful pastor in Hudson; was baptized in Catskill, March 4, 1821. He pursued his literary and theological studies at Hamilton, graduating in 1826. After supplying the Church in Greenville for a short time, he was ordained, Sept. 12, 1827, and was pastor in Ogden until Nov. 21, 1831; for three years at Fredonia; then supplied the Second Church, Rochester, several months; supplied the Church at Parma Corners for a time, and for two years and a half preached at Fabius. After this he became the soliciting agent of the Missionary Union, one year in New York and another in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. The two following years he was pastor in Ithaca, N. Y.; then agent of the American Baptist Home Society for Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont; for five years (1843-48) pastor at Whitesborough, N. Y., and meanwhile acted as corresponding secretary of the New York Baptist Convention. From 1848 to 1850 he was pastor at Nunda. In 1850 he received an appointment to the north-western agency of the Missionary Union, and had his headquarters at Chicago. This position he held for seven and a half years; then became pastor in Delavan, Ill., and in 1860 in Barry. His other pastorates were in Galva, Cordova, Atlanta, Lockport, and Roetta, Ill., and Valparaiso, Ind. He died in Chicago, March 27, 1883. During this long period of service he performed a large amount of work as an author and compiler. He was one of the editorial committee appointed to prepare the memorial volume of the first half century of Madison University, and was also the author of a History of the Rock Island Association. As the appointed historian of the Baptists of Illinois, he left, at his decease, a work in MSS., which is represented as being one of great value. See the Chicago Standard, April 5, 1883; Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclop. p. 246. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1780; retired in 1815, residing at Carmarthen, and died Jan. 8, 1826, aged seventy-eight. He had peculiar tact in rebuking sin with effect, yet without giving offence. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1826.

Cole, Leroy, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Essex County, Va., June 5, 1749. He was converted in 1777; the same year was licensed to preach, and admitted into the travelling connection. He began his ministry in North Carolina; preached regularly until long after the Revolution; served the Church some years as a local preacher, and spent his latter life as a superannuate of the Kentucky Conference, dying triumphantly, Feb. 6, 1830. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1831, p. 115.

Cole, Nathaniel, a Baptist minister, was born at Swansea, Mass., July 14, 1780. In his youth he removed to Otsego County, N. Y., where he was employed partly as a mechanic, and partly in teaching. In 1806 he settled as a merchant in Southfield, Madison Co., where he was also a magistrate, and then county judge. In 1812 he represented the town in the New York Assembly. In 1816 he was baptized by Rev. Nathaniel Moore, and united with the Church in Fenner. With but limited preparation for the Christian ministry, he was ordained April 8, 1818, continued to preach for nine years, and died July 4, 1827. Mr. Cole was a peace-maker, yet firm, bold, decided, quick, ready, and communicative. See Haynes, Bapt. Cyclop. i, 181. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Robert W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in East Tennessee in 1818. He received an early religious education; became eminently pious in youth, and at the age of eighteen entered the Tennessee Conference. In 1841 he was transferred to the Memphis Conference; spent 1843 and 1844 very usefully as a local preacher; re-entered the effective ranks in 1845, and was appointed to the Belmont Circuit, where he died, Oct. 8, 1846. Mr. Cole was extremely modest and retiring, and never appeared to be conscious of his intellectual powers. He was sound in judgment and doctrine, and eminently equipped with all the Christian graces. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1846, p. 78.

Cole, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Mexico, N. Y., Jan. 18, 1807. He received his preparatory education at Oneida Institute and at Oberlin, and graduated from Oberlin Theological Seminary in 1838. In 1839 he was ordained an evangelist at Oberlin, and labored as such for some years. He was acting pastor at West Tisbury, Mass., from 1851 to 1855; at Weymouth, O., from 1855 to 1861; West Gloucester, Mass., from 1861 to 1867; at Saybrook, O., from 1867 to 1871; at Randolph, from 1872 to 1876. From thence he removed to Kingsville, where he remained without charge until his death, March 15, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Cole, Samuel (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1823. He graduated from Waterville College in 1850, and from the theological seminary in Rochester in 1852. He had a vigorous intellect, and took high rank as a scholar. His ordination took place in Belfast, Me., July 27, 1853. During his short pastorate he gave himself to the work with an intensity of devotion rarely excelled. "Humble, studious, and spiritual, success attended his efforts, and a brilliant future opened before him." Prostrated by disease brought on by overwork, he went to his father's house in Beverly, Mass., and died there, Nov. 11, 1854. See Watchman and Reflector, Dec. 21, 1854. (J. C. S.)

Cole, Thomas (1), an English divine, was born in 1726. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of LL.B. in 1751. At the time of his death, June 6, 1796, he was vicar of Dulverton. He was the author of, The Arbour, or, The Rural Philosopher (1756, 4to):—Discourses on Luxury, Infidelity, and Enthusiasm (1760, 12mo):—The Life of Hubert, a narrative, descriptive, and didactic poem (1795, 8vo). See The (Lond.) Annual Register, 1796, p. 62.

Cole, Thomas (2), a celebrated painter, was born at Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, England, Feb. 1, 1801. His parents, who had previously lived in America, returned in 1819, and settled in Philadelphia, where young Cole applied himself to wood-engraving and music. In 1820 he began portrait-painting in Steubenville, O., and afterwards took up historical painting. In 1825 he removed to New York city, and laid the foundation of his fame by painting scenes among the Catskills. His finest pictures are the four called The Voyage of Life, which have been engraved. He died at Catskill, N. Y., Feb. 11, 1847. A Memoir of him has been written by Rev. L. L. Noble (N. Y. 1855).

Cole, Thomas (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Delaware. He spent over two years (1824, 1825) in Princeton Theological Seminary, and was then ordained by the Presbytery of Gallipolis, O. He was in 1830 and 1831 stated supply for a church in New Richmond; labored as missionary in Ohio in 1832 and 1833; was pastor in Augusta, Ky., in 1836, for a Congregational Church; agent for the American Bible Society, St. Louis, Mo., from 1855 until his death, July 18, 1870. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 49.

Cole, William, an English clergyman and an eminent antiquary, was born at Little Abington, Cambridgeshire, Aug. 3, 1714. He was educated at Saffron-Walden, Eton, and Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he was admitted to one of Freeman's scholarships in April, 1734. During 1736 and 1737 he travelled in Flanders and Portugal. In 1739 he was made commissioner of peace in the county of Cambridge. He was ordained deacon in 1744, and was for some time curate to Dr. Oakes, rector of Wethersfield, in Suffolk. He was admitted to priest's orders in 1745, and elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries in 1747. He went to France in 1768, after having been rector for some years of Bletchley, in Buckinghamshire, which place he resigned March 20, 1767. He then removed to Waterbeche, and from thence to Milton, near Cambridge, where he died, Dec. 16, 1782. Among his works are Grose's Antiquities:—Bentham's Ely:—Life of Cardinal Pole:—Collection of Poems, and some Sermons, which he left to Cambridge University. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cole, William J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1843. He began preaching at the age of eighteen, under the direction of the Canadian Wesleyan Conference; removed to Charleston, S. C., in 1865; immediately connected himself with the South Carolina Mission Conference, and in its active ranks died, July 13, 1867. Mr. Cole possessed uncommon mental power, a remarkable winsomeness of manner, a prepossessing personal appearance, and an energy and perseverance that knew no hindrance. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 11.

Colebrooke, Thomas, a famous Sanscrit scholar, was born in London, England, in 1765. In 1782 he went to India, where he devoted himself to the study of Sanscrit. After an absence of thirty years he returned to London, and died there in 1837. He was one of the first scholars who made Europe acquainted with the religion, legislation, history, and science of the Hindûs. His essays, published in the Transactions of the Asiatic Society at Calcutta and London, were reprinted in 1837, under the title of Miscellaneous Essays. His paper on the philosophy of the Hindûs was translated into French by Pauthier. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Colefax, William, an English Congregational minister, was born near Nantwich in 1792. He was left an orphan in early childhood; converted in his twentieth year; received his ministerial training at Idle Academy, and was ordained pastor in 1821 at Hexham. In 1833 he removed to Pudsey, Yorkshire, where he continued till 1846, when he resigned the ministry. He died March 6, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 321.

Coleman, Andrew (1), an extraordinary young Irish Methodist preacher, was born in Coleraine, County Antrim. At the age of seventeen he had mastered the usual studies of a college curriculum. He was converted under the ministry of Thomas Barber, a Wesleyan evangelist; in 1785 was recommended to the Dublin Conference, and sent to the Sligo Circuit. After a few months' exhausting labor he returned to Coleraine, and died, June 18, 1786, aged eighteen years. Coleman's was a lovely character—humble, modest, affectionate, and thoroughly consecrated. He had a brilliant mind and a wonderful memory. See Etheridge, Life of Dr. Adam Clarke, p. 51; Clarke, Miscellaneous Works (edited by Everett), xii, 348; Everett, Wesleyan Centenary Takings, i, 229.

Coleman, Andrew (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in West Virginia, April 5, 1790. He entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1825; in 1842 was transferred to the Rock River Conference; in 1844 became a member of the Iowa Conference, and in 1856 of the Upper Iowa Conference. The following were his appointments: Dubuque, Rock Island, Burlington, Burlington District, De Moines District, Pittsburgh Circuit, Iowa City District, Pioneer Circuit, Lisbon, De Witt, Cedar Rapids, Rockdale, La Motte, Iowa City Circuit, De Witt Circuit. In 1872 he became superannuated, and resided at Oskaloosa, Ia., where he died, May 4, 1881. Mr. Coleman was an eminently godly man, of catholic spirit and ardent zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 321.

Coleman, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Harrold, Bedfordshire, March 11, 1809. He was educated at Newport-Pagnell College, and settled at Wickhambrook, in Suffolk, in 1838. Here he labored with eminent success until the beginning of 1864, when he removed to Halesworth, and thence, in 1868, to Penryn, Cornwall, where he continued ten years. He retired finally from active service in August, 1879, and died at Southampton, Aug. 11, 1882. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 271.

Coleman, Isaiah B., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born March 7, 1809. He was licensed to preach May 10, 1834; ordained in March, 1835, and served as pastor of the Church in West Stephentown, N. Y., about forty years. He assisted in the organization of several churches of his denomination, and was ever ready to respond to calls upon his services as a minister of the Gospel. He died March 14, 1888. See The Morning Star, April 4, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Coleman, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Black River Township, N. J., Oct. 30, 1766, of Presbyterian parents, who removed west of the Alleghanies in 1777, and settled on the Monongahela river. About the close of the Revolution he was converted, licensed to exhort, and in 1791 entered the itinerant ranks, and was appointed to Ohio Circuit. Subsequently he served several years as a missionary in Upper Canada, where he endured dreadful privations, and exhibited wonderful zeal and fidelity. His latter years were spent as a superannuate in the New York Conference. He died at his residence in Ridgefield, Conn., Feb. 5, 1842. Mr. Coleman was a man of very limited intellectual culture, but of many Christian graces. His great faith, singleness of heart, and marvellous unction in prayer made him powerful in the extension of Christ's kingdom. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1842, p. 309.

Coleman, James A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baltimore, Md. He was converted at the age of fourteen, licensed to exhort two years later, two later to preach, and at the age of nineteen was employed as junior preacher on Castle Fin Circuit, Baltimore Conference. In 1851 he became a member of the conference, was sent as junior preacher to Shrewsbury Circuit, and afterwards in turn to Westminster, Liberty, and Hampstead, Md.; was appointed to Alleghany Circuit in 1855; afterwards served Bedford Circuit, Cassville, and Birmingham Circuit, Pa.; became chaplain in the United States navy on board a receiving-ship in the harbor of Brooklyn, N. Y., and thirteen months later removed to Philadelphia, Pa., where he remained a supernummate, until his death, March 30, 1879. Mr. Coleman was affable, earnest, affectionate, and pre-eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 23.

Coleman, John, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was a native of Bath Parish, Dinwiddie Co., Va. He was educated and prepared for the ministry principally by the Rev. Devereux Jarratt; but the war of the Revolution prevented his obtaining orders in England. In 1780 he became a Methodist local preacher, but left that Church in 1784. In 1787 he was admitted to holy orders, and became minister of St. John's and St. James's parishes, in Baltimore County, Md. For four years (1799-1803) he was rector of St. Thomas's Parish, in the same county, and then returned to that of St. James. He died in Baltimore County, Jan. 21, 1816, aged fifty-eight years. Mr. Jarratt committed to Mr. Coleman the publication of his Autobiography. For seventeen years the latter was a member of the Standing Committee, and five times was a delegate to the General Convention. In 1804 he was named as a candidate for the suffragan episcopate of Maryland, but failing health prevented his election. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 220.

Coleman, Lyman, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian or Congregational divine and educator, was born at Middlefield, Mass., June 14, 1796. He graduated at Yale College in 1817, and for three succeeding years was principal of the Latin Grammar School in Hartford, Conn.; next a tutor in Yale College for four years, during which time he studied theology. From 1828 to 1835 he was pastor of the Congregational Church at Belchertown, Mass. After this he taught, first at the Burr and Burton Seminary in Vermont, next for seven years as principal of the English department of Phillips Academy, Andover. He then made a visit to Germany, and spent seven months in study with Neander, the eminent historian, which resulted in the preparation of his learned work, Primitive Christianity. On his return he was made professor of German in Princeton College. He continued there and at Amherst and Philadelphia the next fourteen years, having also a connection with various other institutions. In 1856 he revisited Europe, and extended his travels to the Holy Land, the Desert, and Egypt. In 1861 he succeeded Dr. Cattell in the chair of ancient languages in Lafayette College, but after 1862 devoted himself solely to Latin. For many years he continued his lectures to the students on Biblical and physical geography. He was also professor of Hebrew, conducting classes in that study for fifteen years. He died at Easton, Pa., May 16, 1882. Eminent in solid abilities, in accurate scholarship, in stores of accumulated learning, in extended usefulness, Dr. Coleman was no less eminent in the graces of the Spirit. His principal published works are, The Antiquities of the Christian Church;—The Apostolical and Primitive Church;—Historical Geography of the Bible;—Ancient Christianity Exemplified;—Historical Text-book and Atlas of Biblical Geography;—A Manual on Prelacy and Ritualism; all of which have been republished in England. See The Presbyterian, March 25, 1882; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Kellogg, Commemorative Sermon (Easton, 1882). (W. P. S.)

the Texas Conference, in 1870, and labored faithfully until his decease, Dec. 8, 1875. Mr. Coleman was a man of commanding presence, irreproachable character, and of earnestness and effectiveness in the ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 8.

Coleman, Seymour, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Litchfield County, Conn., Dec. 23, 1794, of devout Huguenot parents. About 1812 he removed with them to Fulton County, N. Y., where he engaged in school-teaching from the age of eighteen to thirty-one, meanwhile zealously continuing his study of books and men. He was also, during this time, admitted to the bar of Fulton County; but soon after gave up his profession, began preaching, and in 1828 entered the New York Conference. In 1832, on the formation of the Troy Conference, he became a member of it. His appointments extended through all the districts of that large conference. He died at his post, Jan. 23, 1877. Mr. Coleman was endowed with a forcible intellect, and natural heroism. His religious experience was rich, and his daily life unsullied. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 67.

Coleman, Thomas (1), a Puritan divine, was born at Oxford, England, in 1598. He was vicar of Blyton, and subsequently rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill, London, and died in 1647. He published sermons and theological treatises (1643-46). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coleman, Thomas (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Kettering in 1798, and was studiously and religiously inclined from childhood. He was refused admission to Hoxton Academy on account of the loss of one of his eyes, yet he persevered in the work of self-improvement. In 1822 he became pastor of the Independent Church at Wollaston, Northamptonshire, and in 1831 at Ashley and Wilbarston. Failure of health in 1867 compelled him to resign. Subsequently he became totally blind, yet, from the tenacity of his memory and his disciplined habits of thought, he continued to preach almost to the end of his life, frequently conducting the whole service himself. He died at Market Harborough, Dec. 30, 1872. Mr. Coleman is spoken of as being "a strenuous student." His historical acquisitions, especially, were very considerable. He published, Memorials of the Independent Churches in Northamptonshire;—The Two Thousand Confessors of 1662;—The English Confessors after the Reformation to the Days of the Commonwealth; also other works, chiefly expository, as well as contributing many articles to denominational periodicals. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 318.

Coleman, Thomas Clarke, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Jefferson County, Ga., Feb. 8, 1794. He was left an orphan when but a few months old; was converted about 1810; licensed to exhort in 1826, to preach in 1832, and in 1838 entered the Georgia Conference. For about twenty years he labored on circuits, and in mission fields in Georgia and Florida. Failure of health then obliged him to retire from all stated services, and he spent the following years in great bodily suffering. He died July 25, 1875. Mr. Coleman had scarcely any early educational advantages. His wife taught him to read. His mental habits were fixed before he entered the ministry, and he never acquired the capacity for sermonizing; yet he was a preacher of rare success through the power of his exhortations and prayers. He was all aflame with zeal and devotion. His life was exemplary, full of pathos, sympathy, and deep devotion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 173.

Coleman, William (1), an English Baptist minister, was born in 1776. His first settlement in the ministry was at Leasness Heath, Kent, where he was ordained in 1809. Here he remained from 1809 to 1823, and then removed to Colnbrook, Bucks, where he was pastor from 1823 to 1845. In 1846 he accepted a call to the Church at Bexley Heath, Kent, where he died, Oct. 4, 1848. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1849, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Coleman, William (2), a Canadian Methodist minister, was a Cornishman. He was converted at nineteen; emigrated to Canada in 1831; was a lay evangelist for six years; entered the ministry in 1837, retired in 1872, and died at his home at Scarborough, Ont., May 27, 1879, aged seventy-one years. Mr. Coleman was a man of thorough consecration and of strong and constant piety. See Minutes of the Toronto Conference, 1879, p. 15.

Coleman, William A., a Baptist minister, was born of Episcopal parentage, near St. John, N. B., November, 1816. He united with the Baptist Church at Portland, Dec. 25, 1840; was ordained at North Esk in 1845; labored in several fields, baptized one thousand and fifty persons, and died at Sackville, March 7, 1877. He was characterized by executive ability, judgment, dignity, calmness, and humility. See Minutes of Baptist Convention of N. S., etc., 1877; Bill, Fifty Years with the Baptists, p. 537.

Colendal, Heinrich, a German theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Cologne, April 15, 1672. He was successively missionary, professor of theology at Osnabrück, royal chaplain at Dresden, preacher and rector at Cologne. He died Jan. 23, 1729. His principal works are, Confutatio Catholicum inter et Lutheranism (Cologne, 1710); Osnabrugensis Rusticus Edoctus (ibid. ed.).: Nullus Sacerdotii Lutheranism (ibid. 1713). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coleoni, Celestini, an Italian historian and theologian of the Capuchin order, a native of Bergamo, lived in the early half of the 17th century. His principal works are, istoria Quadripartita di Bergamo (Bergamo and Brescia, 1617, 1619, 3 vols.): Vita S. Patritii, etc. (Brescia, 1617): De Matrimonio Græce Virginis (ibid. 1719): Vita Firmi et Rustici (ibid. 1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colenso, John William, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born at St. Austell, Cornwall, Jan. 24, 1814. He took all but the highest mathematical honors at Cambridge in 1836; was successively a master at Harrow (1838), a resident fellow and private tutor at St. John's College, Cambridge (1842), rector of Forncett St. Mary, near Norwich (1846), and was consecrated bishop of Natal on the creation of that see in 1853. Great excitement was caused by his publication of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, newly Translated (1861), in which he denied the doctrine of eternal punishment. But a still greater agitation was caused by his Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined (in seven parts, 1862-79), in which he questioned the authenticity of the Pentateuch. This called forth innumerable replies and criticisms, and even severe Church discipline. The bishop of Capetown, who, by the various letters patent, was metropolitan of the Church of England in South Africa, summoned the bishop of Natal to his tribunal on a charge of heresy, and deposed him from office. The judicial committee of the privy council set aside, on constitutional grounds, the sentence of deposition. The trustees of the Colonial Church Bishops' Fund nevertheless withheld bishop Colenso's salary, and he sued for it before Lord Romilly, master of the rolls. That judge declared that heresy would be a justification for withholding the salary, and that, if the charge were preferred, it would be his duty to try it in accordance with the law of the Church of England. But the charge was not preferred, and, of course, the Capetown deposition could not be held a justification. Thus the bishop of Natal continued to enjoy his salary and the property of his see, and with a good conscience, for it was the opinion of his friends that a charge of heresy could not have been maintained against him under the standards of the Church of England. He died at Natal, June 20, 1883. Besides a series of mathematics for schools, and some minor works, bishop Colenso published, Lectures on the Pentateuch and the Moabite Stone (1873): the New Bible Commentary Critically Examined (1871-74). He also translated the New Test. and part of the Old Test. into the Zulu language, and published a Zulu grammar with dictionary. (B. P.)

Coler, Jakob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Grütz, in Voightland, in 1537. He studied at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where in 1564 pastor at Lauban, in Upper Lusatia, and in 1573 at Neukirch, where he held a colloquy with L. Crenzheim and M. Flacius, concerning original sin. In 1575 he was made doctor of theology and professor of Hebrew at Frankfurt; in 1577 he was called to Berlin as member of consistory; became in 1600 superintendent of the Gilstrow district in the duchy of Mecklenburg, and died March 7, 1612. He assisted Hutter in the edition of his famous Hebrew Bible, and wrote, De Immortalitate Animæ: —De Eozorcismo: —De Libero Arbitrio. See Küller, Wolaviographia; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coler, Johann Christoph, a German Protestant theologian and bibliographer, was born Sept. 7, 1691, at Alten-Gottern, near Langensalza. He studied at Wittenberg, and was made adjunct to the philosophical faculty in 1716. In 1720 he became pastor at Brücken, but four years later went to Weimar, as teacher at the gymnasium. In 1725 he was appointed pastor of St. James's, in 1731 court preacher, and died at Weimar, March 7, 1736. His principal works are some academical dissertations: De Ephraemo et Joanne Damasceno (Wittenberg, 1714): Historia Gothofr. Arnoldi (ibid. 1718): Acta Literaria Academiae Wittebergensis (ibid. 1719): Bibliotheca Theologica (Leipz. 1724-86): Anthologia, seu Epistolæ Varii Argumenti (ibid. 1725): Acta Historico-ecclesiastica, an ecclesiastical gazette, written in German (Weimar, 1734). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coler, Johann Jakob, a German theologian, was born at Zurich in the 16th century. He was one of the pupils of Theodore Beza, and wrote An Anima Rationalis sit ex Traduce (Zurich, 1586). The success of this little treatise was very great, and Rodolphe Goclenius printed it a second time in his collection of writings upon the origin and nature of the soul, De Homini Perfectione (Marburg, 1694). We are also indebted to Coler for Præfatio in Epistolam Hutteri, with a collection of letters from Hutten (Nuremberg, 1604). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coleridge, John, an English clergyman, father of the poet, was vicar of Ottery St. Mary, in Devonshire, and died about 1781. He published A Critical Latin Grammar: —Miscellaneous Dissertations Arising from the 17th and 18th Chapters of the Book of Judges (1768). He is said to have been a man of learning and research. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coleridge, William Hart, a bishop of the Church of England, was appointed to the see of Barbadoes at its erection in 1824, and resigned the bishopric in 1841. Upon the establishment of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, he was chosen its first warden, possessing eminent talent for the education of missionaries. He died at Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, Dec. 21, 1849, in the sixtieth year of his age. His scholarship was unquestionable. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1850, p. 160.

Coles, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Luton, Bedfordshire, in 1782. He was ordained Nov. 5, 1813, pastor at Poplar, Middlesex, and remained there until 1818. His next settlement was at Workingham, Berkshire, where he remained from 1819 to 1839. Besides performing his home duties, he labored extensively in the neighboring villages. On completing his term of service, he retired from ministerial labor. He died in London, Jan. 9, 1842. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1842, p. 24. (J. C. S.)

Coles, Thomas, an English Baptist minister, was born in the parish of Hawling, Gloucestershire, Aug. 31, 1779. Soon after joining the Church of which the Rev. Benjamin Beddome was the pastor, he entered the college at Bristol, where he studied for a time, and then became a student in Marischal College, Aberdeen, where he graduated A.M. In Scotland, he devoted himself with great zeal to the spiritual welfare of the young. He was ordained at Bourton, Nov. 17, 1801, where he remained during his entire ministerial life, nearly thirty-nine years, "highly esteemed by his brethren, and very useful in the public denominational institutions of the county." He died Sept. 23, 1840. See Report of English Baptist Unions, 1841, p. 33. (J. C. S.)

Colette, Saint, a French nun and reformer, whose family name was Boilet, was born at Corbie, in Picardy, Jan. 13, 1380. From infancy she was remarkable for her piety. After having lived successively at the house of the Beguines, the sisters of the third order of St. Francis, then in a hermitage, she entered the order of the nuns of St. Clare, and conceived the thought of working a reform. Benedict XIII, Pedro de Luna, the acknowledged pope at Avignon, approved her design, and invested her with the necessary power to accomplish it. She failed in France, but succeeded in Savoy, Burgundy, the Netherlands, and Spain. She died at Ghent, March 6, 1446, and her canonization was pronounced March 3, 1807, by Pius VII. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coletti (or Coleti), Giovanni Domenico, an Italian scholar of the Jesuit order, brother of Niccolò, was born in 1727. He was for ten years missionary to Mexico. On his return to Italy he resided at the College of Bagnacavallo, and retired to his family after the suppression of his order. He died at Venice in 1799. His principal works are, Vita de S. Juan Apostoli (Lima, 1761):—Dizionario Storico-Geografico dell' America Meridionale (Venice, 1771):—Notizie Istoriche della Chiesa di San Pietro in Sylvis di Bagnacavallo (ibid. 1774):—Memorie Istoriche intorno al Cav. Cesare Ercolani (ibid. 1776):—Luciferi Episcopi Calarutani Vita, cum Notis, Operibus Prefixa (ibid. 1778):—Hispelantes Inscriptiones Emendatæ (ibid. 1780):—De Nova Ocaris Voce et Officio (ibid. 1781):—Notæ et Sigla quæ in Nummis et Lapidibus apud Romanos Obinebant Explicatæ (ibid. 1785):—Lettera Sopra l'iscrizione Pemmoniana dell' Altare di San Martino di Cividale Friuli (ibid. 1789):—Triclinium Opiterginum (ibid. 1794), also a large number of MSS., preserved by his family. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coletti (or Coleti), Jacopo (or Giacomo), an Italian scholar of the Jesuit order, lived at the close of the 18th century. On the suppression of the Jesuits, he returned to his family and devoted himself to study and ecclesiastical labors. His principal works are, Dissertazione Sugli Antichi Pedagogii (Venice, 1780, inserted in the Opusculi Ferraresi):—De Situ Stridonis, Urbis Natalis S. Hieronymi (ibid. 1784). Coletti also worked on a continuation of the Illyricum Sacrum of Daniele Farlati, and the publication of the work of Lucifero, bishop of Cagliari, by his brother Giovanni Domenico. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coletti (or Coleti), Niccolò, a learned Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Venice in 1680. He resigned the direction of a library and printing establishment which he had formed at Paris, in order to devote himself entirely to the study of history and ecclesiastical antiquities. Coletti died in 1765. He published a new edition of the Italia Sacra of Ughelli, purged of several errors, and continued it from 1648, where the author had left it, down to the 18th century. This edition, commenced in 1717, was completed in 1738, ten vols., in fol. Coletti likewise worked on a new edition of the Collection des Conciles of Labbe, which he enriched with notes and valuable additions. He also wrote, Serie Episcoporum Cremonensium Aucta (Milan, 1749):—Monumentu Ecclesie Venetæ S. Moisi (1758). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coley, Charles H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, resided, in 1857, in Madison, Ga., while yet a deacon, and subsequently, in 1859, became rector in that place of the Church of the Advent. In 1861 he was assistant minister of Christ Church, Savannah, a position in which he remained until 1868, when he became rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Shelbyville, Tenn.; in 1870 was rector of St. Mark's Church, Brunswick, Ga.; in 1872 officiated in Christ Church, Savannah; and in 1873 became rector of Trinity Church, Demopolis, Ala. He died March 26, 1874, aged forty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Coley, James M., a Baptist minister, was born at Cazenovia, N. Y., in 1806. He pursued his studies in the literary and theological institution at Hamilton, where he graduated in 1828. Subsequently he spent one year (1833-34) at the Newton Theological Institution, and was ordained at Charlemont, Mass. For two years he was pastor at Beverly, which place he left in February, 1836. His other settlements were in Binghamton and Carmel, N. Y., Norwich, Conn., Albany and Waverly, N. Y. His labors at Albany were especially blessed. On giving up the pastoral office he removed to Auburn, Ill. A few years after, he went to California for his health, and died at San José, Jan. 8, 1883. He was an able preacher, of commanding presence, and an uncommonly impressive delivery. See The Watchman, March 29, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Coley, Samuel, a Wesleyan minister, was born at Birmingham, England, Feb. 17, 1825. He was converted when about six years of age, joined the Wesleyans at twelve, began to preach at sixteen, and after a three years' residence at the theological school at Richmond, received an appointment to the Hastings Circuit in 1847. He filled some of the most important stations of the Church. In 1873 he was appointed theological tutor at Headingly. He resigned this position in 1880, and in August of the same year settled at Warwick, and died Oct. 30 following. "As a preacher he stood in the first rank of the most popular men of the day." His theological lectures "were models of clearness in the exposition of truth." He published comparatively little. His Life of Thomas Collins is one of the best of Christian biographies. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 20.

Colfridus. See COLFRID.

Colga (or Colchu; Irish, Colchu), is the name of several early Irish saints:

1. COLGA, "the Wise," lector of Clonmacnoise, was a man of eminent piety and learning, and acquired the name of chief scribe or master of all the Scots. He was appointed to preside over the great school of Clonmacnoise; was a special friend and correspondent of Alcuin, at Charlemagne's court, and composed the Scopy Devotionis, or Besoms of Devotion, a collection of most ardent prayers in the form of litanies, and full of the warmest devotion to God. He died about A.D. 796, and is commemorated on Feb. 20 (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 228 sq.; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 55).

2. COLGAR, or COLGANUS, was of the powerful family of the Hy-Fiachrach, in Connaught. He is chiefly known in connection with St. Columba. He flourished about A.D. 580, and probably died in his native land, according to St. Columba's promise (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 328).

3. COLGIUS, or COLCIUS, son of Cellach, was another disciple and associate of St. Columba. According to the Irish annals he died about A.D. 622 (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 328; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 381, 382).

4. COLGA, abbot of Lusk, in Leinster, flourished about A.D. 694, and was one of the chief prelates who attended the synod at Armagh, convened by Flann Fehhla and St. Adamnan about A.D. 697 (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 140).

5. COLGA, or CAOLCHU, of Lui-Airthir, is commemorated Sept. 24 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 257).

Colgan, THOMAS, a missionary of the Church of England, came to America in 1726 to take charge of the Church in Rye, N. Y., under the direction of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts; but afterwards became assistant to the Rev. William Vesey, rector of Trinity Church, New York city, and remained in that position until 1732, when he became minister of the Church in Jamaica, L. I. He died there in 1755. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 16.

Colhard, CHRISTIAN, a German poet and theologian, who lived in the early part of the 18th century, wrote, Ara Eucharistica (Frankfort, 1704, 1728):—Epistolæ Familiæ Carminè Elegiacæ (Berlin, about 1720):—Epistolographia Metrica (ibid. 1724). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coli, GIOVANNI, an Italian painter, was born at Lucca in 1634, and studied under Pietro da Cortona. Some of his works are in the churches of Rome. The most celebrated were the frescos in the tribune of the Church of San Martino, in Lucca. The whole cloister of the monastery of the Carmelites was painted by him. He died in 1681. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colldi. See CULDRES.

Coligny (or Coligne), ODET DE, a French prelate, son of marshal de Châtillon and Louise de Montmorency, was born July 10, 1517. When hardly sixteen years of age he was appointed one of the cardinals who were to elect the pope. He went to Rome to take his place in the consistory, and assisted in the election of Paul III, who made him archbishop of Toulouse in 1584, and relieved him from the obligation of residing at Rome. He was raised to the episcopal see of Beauvais in 1535, and took a great interest not only in the affairs of his country, but also promoted arts and sciences. In 1550 he was called to Rome to assist in the election of pope Julius III. In 1554 he gave to his diocese the Constitutions Synodales, which were intended to suppress certain abuses. The firm attitude of the Parisian parliament against the house of Guise, in 1558, which sought to bring France under the yoke of the inquisition, delivered Coligny from a snare, since he was designed to be one of the three inquisitor-generals. Without pronouncing himself openly for the new faith, to which his brothers already adhered, he put himself politically on their side and against the Guises, assisted at the assembly held in Fontainebleau in 1560, and finally broke with the Church of Rome in 1561 by celebrating at Beauvais the Lord's Supper in accordance with the Protestant rite. A tumult which soon broke out endangered his life. He gave up his ecclesiastical dignities, and assumed the title of count of Beauvais. During the first religious war he accompanied his brothers and Condé to Orleans, and after the peace of Amboise he returned to the court of France. In the meantime he had been reported to the inquisition at Rome as a heretic, and on his refusal to appear before the tribunal, the pope hurled at him a bull of excommunication, March 31, 1563. He was henceforth called by his family name, Châtillon, although he himself retained his title of cardinal Coligny. In 1568 he negotiated the peace which followed the siege of Chartres. The violation of the peace by Catharine de' Medici necessitated the retreat of Condé and Coligny to La Rochelle. Châtillon's life, as well as that of Condé, being endangered, he succeeded in sailing to England, where he hoped to serve the cause of his brothers and of liberty. He publicly married Elizabeth de Hauteville. Queen Elizabeth treated him with due respect, and his influence often neutralized the measures of the French ambassador, Lamothe-Fénélon. After the peace of 1570, the latter changed his attitude towards the cardinal, and even entered into direct relations with him in the hope of securing his co-operation. Châtillon, upon an invitation of Gaspard de Coligny to return to France, made his preparations for the journey, but died Feb. 14, 1571, under suspicion of being poisoned, which a post-mortem examination justified. He was buried at Canterbury. In Odet de Coligny the French Protestants lost one of their firmest supporters. See De Bouchet, Pr. de Christ. de la Maison de Coligny, p. 347-442; Brantôme, Homines Illust. s. v. "Le Cardinal de Châtillon;" Dupont-White, La Ligne à Beauvais; Corresp. Diplom. de Lamothe-Fénélon, i, p. 16 sq.; ii, p. 49 sq.; iii, p. 17 sq.; iv, p. 12 sq.; Delaborde, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Colla. See EOLLA.

Collace is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. ANDREW, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1611; was presented to the living at Garriock in 1615, transferred to Ecclesgreig in 1619, to Dundee in 1635; deposed in 1639 for drunkenness, sacrilege, and disobedience to the General Assembly; was settled at Dundee in 1663, and died Sept. 13, 1664, aged about seventy-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 404; iii, 689, 863, 870.

2. DAVID, was appointed to the living at Drainie in 1633, and ordained, and died June 8, 1681. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 161.

3. FRANCIS, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1610; was presented to the vicarage of Channell-kirk in 1614, and admitted to the living in 1615; signed the protestation for the liberties of the kirk in 1617; was transferred to Gorton in 1625, and died in 1647, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 521, 525.

4. JOHN, was appointed to the living at Fettercairn in 1580; had Newdosh under his care in 1585, and died March 16, 1587. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 866.

Collaceroni, AGOSTINO, an Italian painter, was a native of Bologna, and studied under l'aire Pozzi. He was an eminent perspective artist, and was much employed in adorning the churches at Rome, Bologna, and other cities. He flourished about 1700.

Collado, DIAGO, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Mezzadlas, in Estremadura. He assumed the habit of his order at Salamanca in 1600. After having taught belles-lettres, he embarked for Japan in 1619, and, in spite of persecution, preached the Gospel for several years. In 1625 his superiors sent him to Rome to solicit of the pope more extended powers. While in Europe he published several works, the material for which he had collected in his travels. Urban VIII having at length delivered a brief favorable to the wishes of the missionaries, Collado went to Spain in 1632, obtained of the king letters-patent for the foundation of a convent of his order in the Philippine Islands, and embarked again in 1635. Arriving there, he met with much opposition from the governor, but nevertheless succeeded in carrying out his project. Being recalled to Spain in 1638, he embarked, but the ship was wrecked, and he perished. His works are, Ars Grammatica Lingua Japonica (Rome, 1631):—Dictionarium sive Thesauri Lingua Japonica (ibid.; compendium, 1632):—Historia Ecclesiastica de las Successas de la Christianidad de Japon (Madrid, 1632):—Modus Confitendi et Examenandi Penitentem Japonensem, etc. (Rome, 1631):—

Dictionarium Linguae Sinensis (still unpublished). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Colladon, NICOLAS, a Swiss Protestant theologian of French origin, lived in the latter part of the 16th century. He left Bourges, where he was minister, retired to Geneva, and became, in 1564, rector of the academy of that place. Two years later he succeeded Calvin as professor of theology. The boldness of his preaching brought him into difficulty with the sovereign council of Geneva, and he retired to Lausanne, where he taught belles-lettres. He translated into French Beza's work, De Haereticis Gladio Puniendis (1560); and wrote Methodus Facillima ad Explicationem Apocalypses Johannis (Morges, 1591):—Jesus Nazareus, ex Matthæo, chap. ii, v. 32 (Lausanne, 1586). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Collaert, Adrian, a Flemish designer and engraver, was born at Antwerp about 1520, studied in his native city, and died there in 1567. The following are his principal works: The Last Judgment; The Israelitish Women Celebrating the Destruction of the Egyptian Host in the Red Sea; The Culling of St. Andrew to the Apostleship. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Collaert, Hans, a Flemish engraver, son and scholar of Adrian, was born at Antwerp about 1540. He visited Rome for improvement, afterwards returning to Flanders, where he executed a number of plates dated from 1555 to 1622. The following are the principal: St. John Preaching in the Wilderness; Moses Striking the Rock; and the subjects from the lives of Christ and the Virgin. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collar. The neck-cloth worn by the clergy does not date earlier than the beginning of the 18th century. The ruff of the time of Elizabeth fell into desuetude before the falling collars of the time of James and Charles I.

Collas, a learned French missionary and astronomer, of the Jesuit order, was born at Thionville about 1731. He taught mathematics at the University of Lorraine, and in 1767 went to Peking, where he acted as mathematician to the emperor of China. He died Jan. 22, 1781, leaving several very important sketches, inserted in a collection of the Mémoires upon the Chinese, viz.: État des Réparations et Additions Faites à l'Observatoire Vâti depuis Longtemps dans le Maison des Missionnaires Français à Peking, and others. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Collatines. See OBLATES.

Collatio is a term for the reading from the lives or collationes of the fathers, which St. Benedict (Regula, c. 42) instituted in his monasteries before compline. Such compilations as the collationes of John Cassian were read. Ardo Smaragdus, however, says that this service was called collatio because the monks questioned each other on the portions to be read. The Benedictine practice is to hold this service in the church, and this is probably in accordance with the founder's intention, for he evidently contemplated the collation being held in the same place as compline (Ducange, s. v.).

Collation is (1) the free assignment of a vacant canonry or benefice; (2) reading of devout books from the pulpit by the reader of the week, followed by an exposition from the superior in chapter; (3) a sermon after a funeral; (4) a lecture on the catechism established in 1622; (5) the monastic supper. During the first four centuries there was but one full meal taken daily by monastics, and that was supper (cæna). When the mid-day meal was adopted, a slender repast of bread, wine, and dry fruit, not worthy of the name of supper, was taken after vespers, during the reading, or "collation," of the Scripture or fathers—and so the name was given to the meal, and adopted by laymen and priests. The jentaculum, or breakfast, consisted of a basin of soup.

Collatius, PETRUS APOLLONIUS, an Italian priest and poet, a native of Novarra, lived at the close of the 15th century. He wrote, De Exersione urbis Jerusalem Carmen Heroicum (Milan, 1481; republished under the title Apollonius, de Excidio Hierosolymitano, Paris, 1540; Antwerp, 1586), a poem on the destruction of Jerusalem under Vespasian:—Heroicum Carmen de Duello Davidis et Golia, Elegia et Epigrammata (ibid. 1692; republished several times). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colle, RAFFAELINO DAL, an Italian painter, was born at Colle, near Borgo San Sepolcro, in Tuscany, about 1490, and was a pupil of Raphael. Later in life Colle resided at Borgo San Sepolcro, where he kept a school of design. He died at Rome in 1530. His works are to be found at Urbino, at Perugia, at Pesaro, and at Gubbio. The best are, The Resurrection, and an Assumption, in the churches at Borgo San Sepolcro. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Graves's ed. of Bryan's Dict. of Painters, s. v.

Collect is (1) a church appointed as the starting-point and place of assembly of a procession going to a station, as, for instance, the collect was at Santa Sabina, on the Aventine, when the station was fixed at the basilica of St. Paul; (2) a prayer so called, because collected into one form out of many petitions, or from the people being joined in as one, or because offered for the whole collective Church, or a particular Church. Most collects end "through Jesus Christ," because the Father bestows his gifts through the mediation of Christ only. The five parts of a collect are the invocation; the reason on which the petition is founded; the petition itself; the benefit hoped for; and ascription of praise, or mention of the Lord Jesus, or both. The collects in the mass were composed by pope Gelasius. At St. Alban's, in the 12th century, they were limited to seven. The collects were included in the Collectarium, and the collects at the end of the communion service, matins, and even-song, etc., fulfil the definition of micologus, as the concluding prayer in an office, in which the priest gathers up and collects all the prayers of the people, to offer them to God. Out of the eighty-three used in the English Church, fifty-nine are traceable to the 6th century.

Collecta. See CORNELIA.

Collecta, in liturgical phraseology, is (1) the collecting of alms or contributions of the faithful. From Leo the Great we learn that such a collection was sometimes made on a Sunday, sometimes on Monday or Tuesday, for the benefit and sustenance of the poor. These collections seem to have been distinct from oblations. (2) The gathering together of the people for divine service. Jerome (Epist. 27) states that the sound of Alleluia called monks to say their offices (ad collectam). Pachomius (Regula, c. 17) speaks of the collecta in which oblation was made; he also distinguishes between the collecta domus, the service held in the several houses of a monastery, and the collecta major, at which the whole body of monks was brought together to say their offices. In this rule, collecta has very probably the same sense as Collatio. (3) A society or brotherhood. So in the 15th canon of the first council of Nantes (Hincmar, Capitula ad Presbyt. c. 14).

Collectarium is a book of collects or short prayers, anciently called a "coucher." The latter word appears to be thus derived: collectarium, collectier, colctier, couletier, couchier, coucher. The term "coucher" is frequently found in English mediæval MSS., and occasionally in church inventories and churchwardens' accounts.

Collectio is a name, in the Gallican missals, for certain forms of prayer and praise. The principal of these are the Collectio post Nominu, which follows the recitation of the names on the diptychs; the Collectio ad Pacem, which accompanies the giving of the kiss of peace; the Collectio post Sanctus, which immediately follows the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and the Collectio post Eucharistiam, after communion.

Colledge, THOMAS, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wirksworth, July 6, 1804, of pious parents. He joined the Church at the age of seventeen, and at twenty-three began preaching. In 1832 he entered Rotherham College, and at the close of his course became pastor at Reeth, Yorkshire. Thence he removed to Riddings, where he died, Aug. 23, 1875. See (Lond.) Congregational Year-book, 1876, p. 323.

College of Augurs was the institution of sooth-sayers among the ancient Romans. See AUGUR.

Colleges of Piety were associations for the study of the Bible and the promotion of personal piety among certain of the Lutherans in the 17th century. See PIETISM.

Collegia de Propaganda Fide. See COLLE-GIA PONTIFICA; PROPAGANDA.

Collegium Dendrophorum (the College of the Dendrophori, from δένδρον, a tree, and φέρω, to carry), were a class of heathen (probably priests) whose duty it was to carry branches of trees in processions in honor of the gods.

Collen, a Welsh saint of the 7th century, was patron of Llangollen, in Denbighshire, and is commemorated on May 20 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 302).

Colleoni, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, was born at Bergamo about 1495. His paintings in the Church of San Antonio dell' Ospitale, at Bergamo, were destroyed by fire. There is one in San Erasmo, near Bergamo, which represents The Virgin and Infant with Magdalene and Saints, and is one of his most esteemed works. See Spomer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Colleschi, FRANCESCO, a learned Italian theologian, who died in 1746, wrote, Dissertazione della Letteratura de' Sacerdoti Antichi, in the Raccolta Caloger, vol. xxxiv:—Dissertazione della Religione degli Indiani. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collet, PIERRE, a French theologian and doctor of divinity, was born at Terney, near Montoire (Loir-et-Cher), Sept. 6, 1698. From his youth he was employed at the house of the brothers of Saint-Lazare, and taught theology in several houses of his order. He was afterwards principal of the Collège des Bons-Enfants in Paris, and died there Oct. 16, 1770. He wrote a large number of works, among them, De Quinque Jansenii Propositionibus (Paris, 1730):—Traité des Dispenses en Général (ibid. 1742, 1746, 1752, 1758, 1759, 1777, 1788, 1828; Avignon, 1829):—Institutiones Theologiae (Paris, 1744, 1756):—Institutiones Theologiae Moralis (ibid. 1758, which is the fifth edition, the dates of the others being unknown):—Institutiones Theologiae Scholasticae (Lyons, 1765, 1767, 1768; Paris, 1775):—Vie de Saint-Vincent-de-Paul (Nancy, 1748; Paris, 1818, with some writings from St. Vincent de Paul):—Lettre d'un Théologien au R. P. A. de G. (Antony of Gasquet) (Brussels, 1763):—Traité des Devoirs de la Vie Religieuse (Lyons, 1765; Paris, 1773):—L'Écolier Chrétien (ibid. 1769):—Le Dévotion au Sacré Cœur de Jésus (ibid. 1770):—Traité des Exorcismes de l'Eglise (ibid. eod.):—Instructions sur les Devoirs des Gens de la Compagne (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Collett, THOMAS, an English Congregational minister, was born at Lostwithiel, Cornwall, Feb. 8, 1797.

He joined the Church in early manhood; received his ministerial training at Hackney Academy; began his ministry at Witney, Oxfordshire; and finally settled at Dawlish, on the south coast of Devon, in 1824. In June, 1866, Mr. Collett resigned his pulpit, but continued to reside among the scenes of his lifelong labors, beloved by all who knew him, until his death, June 10, 1869. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1870, p. 281.

Colley, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Tollerton, near Easingwold, Yorkshire. He united with the Methodists in 1761; and, having received Episcopal ordination, was in that year invited by Wesley to officiate in the Methodist chapels in London, which he did. In 1762 he was "carried away by the enthusiasm of George Bell and Thomas Maxfield." He was soon restored, however, by John Manners; and in July, 1763, was engaged in the work at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Thereafter, until his death in 1767, he was a faithful and godly worker. Although he deeply regretted his slip, he was ever after subject to strong temptations; and, as Wesley (who believed his backsliding cost him his life) says, "he went heavily all his days." See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Wesley, Journal, Nov. 8, 1767.

Colley, THOMAS, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Smeaton, near Pontefract, Yorkshire, in 1742. He was brought up in the Established Church; religiously awakened before he reached his majority, and joined the Methodists, among whom he was zealous, active, and much esteemed. About 1764 he united with the Friends, and in 1768 began his ministry. In 1779, in company with Philip Madin, of Sheffield, he visited the West India islands, and performed considerable Christian labor there. Some years after he travelled extensively in North America. Subsequently he itinerated much in his native land, and was very useful in his vocation. He died in Sheffield, June 12, 1812. See Piety Promoted, iv, 29, 33. (J. C. S.)

Colli, ANTONIO, an Italian painter of the Roman school, flourished about 1700, and studied under Andrea Pozzi. He painted the great altar in the Church of San Pantaleo. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Collie, WILLIAM, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1718; became schoolmaster at Drainie in 1732, and assistant minister at Duffus; was presented to the living at Drainie in 1741, and ordained. He died April 29, 1768, aged about seventy years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, i, 161.

Collier, ARTHUR, an English metaphysician and divine, was born at the rectory of Langford Magna, near Sarum, Oct. 12, 1680, and was educated at Salisbury Grammar School and Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1704 he was presented to the benefice of Langford Magna, where he continued until his death, in 1782. In religion he was an Arian, and also a High Churchman, on grounds which his associates could not understand. The following are some of his works: Treatise on the Logos, in seven sermons (1732):—New Inquiry after Truth, on the non-existence of an external world:—Specimen of True Philosophy. See Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collier, Ephraim Robins, a Baptist minister, who died in 1840, graduated at Harvard College in 1826, and had rare classical tastes and excellent scholarship. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 378.

Collier, Ezra W., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass., about 1832. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1849, and at New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1854. He was noted in his student life for close application, literary culture, and scholarly enthusiasm. His first settlement was with Manhattan Reformed Church, New York city (1854-56). For the next ten years he was pastor in Freehold, N. J.

His health being greatly impaired he removed to Cox-sackie, N. Y.; but after a year was obliged to relinquish all active duties. He lingered in great feebleness until his death in 1869. He was one of the most brilliant and devoted of the younger ministers of his Church, and heroic in the utterance of his views, a true scholar, and a Christian gentleman. His studies took a wide range—beyond mere professional requirements. In 1865 he edited a volume of posthumous Sermons by his brother, Rev. Joseph A. Collier, to which he prefixed an interesting biographical sketch. (W. J. R. T.)

Collier, Francis, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of twenty under the preaching of John Nelson; commenced his ministry at Derby in 1796; travelled twenty-three circuits, becoming a supernumerary in 1837 at Taunton, and died June 26, 1851, aged eighty-two. He was an able preacher, and stood high in the connection. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851.

Collier, F. G., an English Congregational minister, was born at Hartlepool, Feb. 6, 1847. He was educated at the Lancashire Independent College, and ordained at Wigan in 1871. He accepted the pastorate of New Chapel, Horwich, which, after four years, he was forced to resign on account of failing health. He died at West Kirby, Cheshire, March 30, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 273.

Collier, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Stockport, Oct. 31, 1770. He was converted at the age of fourteen; admitted into the ministry in 1795; was prostrated on the Bradford Circuit, but still labored; became a supernumerary in 1811, first residing in Bury, subsequently in Exeter and at Kingsdown, Bristol; resumed his ministry at Haverford-West in 1813, and travelled several circuits. His last was Nottingham, where he died, May 27, 1842. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842; West. Meth. Mag. 1850, p. 337 sq.

Collier, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1650; was presented to the living at Firth and Stenness in 1662; transferred to Carrington in 1663; deprived for refusing the test in 1681; and died in Edinburgh Nov. 13, 1691, aged about sixty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti-canae, i, 270; iii, 396.

Collier, John (2), an English Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Little Houghton, Northamptonshire, in 1803. He united with the Church in 1821; was received by the Conference for the ministry in 1829; toiled for thirty-five years on some of the most laborious circuits; became a supernumerary in 1864; and died at Torquay, Feb. 27, 1870. Mr. Collier was instrumental in saving many souls, and was earnest, faithful, and amiable. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1870, p. 26.

Collier, Richard, a Lutheran minister, was a native of Dowlak, Ireland. Arriving in America in his youth, he settled in Easton, Pa., and for many years was engaged in teaching. In 1833 he was licensed by the New York Synod; in 1834 was ordained pastor at Spruce Run, N. J., and served there twenty-seven years. He died in New York city, Jan. 1, 1861. See Lutheran Observer, Jan. 18, 1861.

Collier, Thomas, an English Baptist minister, was born about 1600. For some time he preached with great success in the island of Guernsey, although his enemies spoke in bitter terms of him. In 1645 Mr. Collier, in order to vindicate himself, published Certain Queries or Points, now in Controversy, Examined, in which he maintained, like Roger Williams, that magistrates have no power whatever to establish Church government, or to compel any persons to observe the government of Christ. He was the author of several other works of a controversial character. See Haynes, Baptist Cyclop. i, 178. (J. C. S.)

Collier, William, an English divine, was born in 1742. He was for many years a tutor in Trinity College, Cambridge; rector of Orwell, Cambridgeshire; and Hebrew professor from 1771 to 1790. He died Aug. 4, 1803, at which time he was senior fellow of Trinity College. Mr. Collier published, by subscription, Poems on Several Occasions, with Translations from Authors in Different Languages, Dedicated to Prince William of Gloucester (1800, 2 vols. 12mo). See The (Lond.) Annual Register, 1803, p. 516; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Colliette, Louis Paul, a French antiquarian of the middle of the 18th century, was curate of Gricourt, near St. Quentin, and wrote, La Vie de St. Quentin (St. Quentin, 1767):—Mémoires Ecclésiastiques (Cambrai, 1771-72, 3 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Colliflower, William F., a minister of the (German) Reformed Church, was born in Washington County, Md., Feb. 14, 1814. He received his education in the Reformed High School and Theological Seminary at York, Pa.; was licensed to preach by the Classis of Maryland in 1836; soon afterwards entered upon the ministerial work in Virginia, being ordained and installed as pastor of the Mill Creek charge. He labored successively in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and died in Frederick, Md., April 30, 1882. Mr. Colliflower was a man of fair talents, great energy, and sincere piety; popular and successful as a preacher. (D. Y. H.)

Collin, Friedrich Eberhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Worms, Dec. 25, 1684. In 1709 he was appointed preacher at Dertingen; in 1724 was called as deacon to Zeulenroda, and in 1725 to Lobenstein, where he died, June 15, 1727. He wrote, Eigentliche Gestalt eines Christen (Giessen, 1711):—Das Werk des Glaubens in Kraft (Wertheim, 1719):—Grosser Ernst des Wahren Christenthums (Halle, eod.):—Warnung Christi vor den Falschen Propheten (Frankfurt, 1728):—Gemeinschaft der Schmach Christi (ibid. 1724):—Kampf und Sieg der Ersten Blutzengen Christi nebst Seinem Leben (Berlin, 1744). See Nachrichten von Rechtschaffenen Predigern (Halle, 1775), vol. i; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Collin, Jean, a French theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at St. Junien, and lived about the middle of the 17th century. He was almoner to the king, and preached with success at Val-de-Grace, and in the principal cities of the kingdom. He published, among other works, Le Prélut de Saint-Grégoire (Paris, 1640):—Histoire Sacrée des Principaux Saints du Diocèse de Limoges (Limoges, 1672). He left also a large number of MSS., a catalogue of which was published by abbé Nadaud. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collin, Nicholas, D.D., a Swedish missionary, was born in 1745. He received a classical education in his native country, and intended to join the army, but as he grew to manhood his attention was turned towards the ministry. He arrived, May 12, 1770, in the Delaware river, as a sort of assistant at large to the rectors of the Swedish churches in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. He is claimed as a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, because the parishes with which he was connected as a missionary all united with that body; but he was ordained in Sweden, and to the Swedish Church he always considered himself as owing allegiance. His assistant ministers were always of the Episcopal Church, and he used its liturgy. In consequence of the recall of Rev. John Weisell to Sweden, Dr. Collin was appointed rector in his stead in 1773 at Raccoon, Pa., and Penn's Neck, N. J., and remained there until July, 1786, his residence being at Swedesborough. In 1778 he urged his own recall upon the archbishop of Upsal, Sweden, but the king desired that the Swedish missionaries should remain in America until the result of the war should be known; so that it was not until 1783 that he received permission to sail for Sweden. In that year, however, he did not consider it wise to leave his field of labor, and at his suggestion he was permitted to remain, and to assume charge of the churches of Wicaco (now a part of the city of Philadelphia), Kingessing, and Upper Merion. In July, 1786, he removed from Swedesborough to Philadelphia. During seven years of his residence at the former place he was provost (or superintendent) over all the Swedish churches in Pennsylvania. He died in Philadelphia, in October, 1831. Dr. Collin was a man of considerable learning, being acquainted with at least twelve languages. For many years he was a member of the American Philosophical Society. The only work which he left is a MS. translation of Acrelius's History of New Sweden, undertaken in 1799 at the request of the Historical Society of New York. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 277.

Collin, Nicolas, a French theologian, was born about the commencement of the 18th century. He was canon-regular of the strict Observantists of the Premonstrant order, and prior of Rengeval. He died at Nancy in 1788, leaving Observations Critiques sur le Traité des Dispenses (Nancy, 1765; Paris, 1770):—Du Signe de la Croix (Paris, 1775):—De l'Eau Bénite (ibid. 1776):—Du Pain Bénit, etc. (ibid. 1777):—Des Processions de l'Eglise Catholique (ibid. 1779):—Du Respect aux Eglises (ibid. 1781). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collin, Richard, a German designer and engraver, was born at Luxemburg in 1626. He visited Rome while young, and studied under Sandrart; but afterwards returned to Antwerp and Brussels, where he was appointed engraver to the king of Spain. The following are some of his principal works: Ester before Ahasuerus; Christ Bearing his Cross; St. Arnold.

Collina, one of the inferior rural deities, supposed by the Romans to reign over the hills.

Collina, Abondio, a learned Italian Camaldule, was born at Bologna in 1691. For ten years he was professor of geography and nautical science at the Institute of Sciences, and of geometry at the university of his native city. He died in December, 1753, leaving Antiche Relazioni dell' Indie e della China (Bologna, 1749):—a translation of a part of Voyages de Deux Arabes, published in French by abbé Renaudot. Collina wrote numerous poems and dissertations. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collina, Bonifacio, an Italian scholar of the order of Camaldules, brother of Abondio, was born at Bologna in 1689. He taught philosophy at the university of his native city, and died in 1770. He published a large part of his writings under the title, Opere Diverse (Bologna, 1774), in which we find academical memoirs, tragedies, and scraps of prose upon religious subjects. He also wrote several Lives of the Camaldule saints. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Collings, John, D.D., an eminent English non-conformist divine, and voluminous writer, was born at Buxstead, in Essex, in 1623; educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; and died at Norwich, Jan. 17, 1690. He wrote many books of controversy and practical divinity, the most singular of which is his Weaver's Pocket-book. In Poole's Annotations on the Bible, Collings wrote those on the last six chapters of Isaiah, the whole of Jeremiah, Lamentations, the four Evangelists, the epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, Timothy, Philemon, and the Revelations. See Chalmers, Bib. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Collings, William, an English Baptist minister, was born in Walworth, Aug. 8, 1814. He was baptized March 2, 1836, and began at once to preach. In 1842 he commenced his pastorate at Kingston-on-Thames, and remained until 1856, when he accepted a call to the Church in Gloucester, and was successful in bringing it up from a depressed state to one of strength and prosperity. He died Sept. 10, 1869. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1870, p. 190, 191. (J. C. S.)

Collington, John, an English clerical writer of the last part of the 16th and the first part of the 17th centuries, was a native of Somersetshire; educated at Lincoln College, Oxford; made priest on the Continent; returned to England, and was cast into the Tower of London; condemned, afterwards reprieved, set free, and sent out of the country. He returned, and for thirty years zealously advanced his own (Roman Catholic) religion. Though in restraint, he was alive in 1611, and an old man. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 106.

Collins, an English martyr, was a prominent lawyer in London, burned at Smithfield in 1538, for rebuking the priest. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, v, 251.

Collins, Abel, a minister of the Society of Friends, died at North Stonington, Conn., Sept. 17, 1834, aged sixty-four years. See The Friend, viii, 20.

Collins, Augustus Baldwin, a Congregational minister, son of general Augustus Collins, was born at Guilford, Conn., May 24, 1789. He studied at Yale College, but did not complete his course. Rev. Drs. Andrew Yates and T. M. Cooley were his tutors in theology. In 1817 he was acting pastor at Montgomery, Mass., and in the following year was ordained pastor at Andover, Conn., from which charge he was dismissed in 1827. In the beginning of 1828 he was installed as minister at Preston, where he served until 1847, when he became acting pastor at West Stafford. He was regularly installed there May 10, 1848, and left April 19, 1852. About two months after he entered upon his duties as acting pastor at Barkhamsted. In 1858 he held the same position at Wolcott, also at Long Ridge, in Stamford. After 1852 he resided at Norwalk, without charge. He died there, March 16, 1876. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 413.

Collins, Barnabas V., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated from Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., and in 1842 from the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J. He was licensed by the Classis of New York the same year; served the Church at West Farms, N. Y., until 1845; Ponds, Bergen Co., N. J., until 1867, and thereafter was without a charge till his death, in 1877. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 218.

Collins, Benjamin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sussex County, N. J., in 1785. In 1819 he joined the Philadelphia Conference, in which he remained energetic and faithful until his death, in August, 1831. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 162.

Collins, Britton Estol, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 2, 1801. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1824, and remained two years; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in April, 1828; received under the care of the Huntingdon Presbytery, April 8, 1830, and ordained as an evangelist June 16 following. His first pastoral charge was at Millerstown, then in the bounds of Huntingdon Presbytery, he being installed there in October, 1832. He resigned his charge in 1839, and in October of same year was called to Shireleysburgh. This call he did not accept, but agreed to act as stated supply, in which relation he continued till October, 1853, when he retired. During the remaining years of his life, so long as he was able to preach, he spent his time in missionary labor in different parts of the presbytery—chiefly in the churches of Moshannon, Unity, and Mapleton, successively. The last of these owes its existence largely to his liberality and indefatigable labors. He died April 12, 1876. Mr. Collins was a man of humble and undoubted piety; of great simplicity of character; a diligent, faithful, and self-denying pastor; universally respected and loved. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 22.

Collins, Charles, D.D., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in North Yarmouth, Me., April 17, 1813. He received an elementary education at Portland, and the Maine Wesleyan Institute; after several years of school-teaching entered Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., and before he was twenty-five years of age graduated, taking the first honors, and was elected as the first president of Emory and Henry College, near Abingdon, Va. During the years of his student life he had embraced religion, and dedicated all his energies to it and education, and having united with the Holston Conference, labored abundantly and effectively in the pulpit during his service in Emory and Henry College. His controversial papers against Romanism, in 1844, exhibit his talent and ability in polemic theology; as do also his tracts, published in 1848, entitled Methodism and Cultrianism Compared. He was also at this time editor of the Southern Repository and College Review, and was a regular contributor to the Ladies' Repository, and various church papers and periodicals. In 1852 he was elected president of Dickinson College, and filled that position eight years, during which time he declined the presidency of Centenary College, La., and of Central College, Mo.; the chancellorship of the University of Missouri, of Michigan, and of Southern University, Greensborough, Ala. In 1860 he was transferred to the Memphis Conference, and took charge of the State Female College at Memphis, Tenn., becoming sole proprietor of the buildings and grounds, and placing it under the patronage of the Memphis Conference. In the service of that college he closed his life and labors, July 10, 1876. Dr. Collins was amiable, grave, sympathetic, studious, learned; a popular, able writer; an humble, earnest preacher, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1876, p. 210; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Collins, Daniel, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Guilford, Conn.; graduated from Yale College in 1760; studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Bellamy; was ordained pastor in Lanesborough, April 17, 1764, and died Aug. 26, 1822, aged eighty-three. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 498.

Collins, Eliasha, a Baptist minister, was born in Halifax County, Va., Oct. 20, 1788. He was converted in 1815; was baptized April 23, 1823; licensed Dec. 6, the same year; studied with Rev. Alner W. Clifton, and was ordained Nov. 5, 1825. His first pastorate was with the Salem Church, near the Prince Edward County line. He became one of the earliest advocates of temperance in the country. In 1835 he removed to Tennessee, where, for a time, he found himself in an uncongenial atmosphere. A large majority of Baptists were opposed to missions, and forbade his preaching in their houses. Gradually the opposition gave way, and he became at different times pastor of the McLemoresville, Bible Union, Lexington, and other churches. He died near Lexington, in September, 1854. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 181-184. (J. C. S.)

Collins, Elizabeth, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born Jan. 4, 1755, in Upper Evesham, N. J. In 1779 she was appointed a minister, and travelled through many of the states, doing efficient work for the Master. The most striking characteristic in her life was her intense interest in and concern for the poor. She died Feb. 1, 1831. See Annual Monitor, 1834, p. 99.

Collins, George D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Medford, N. J., July 9, 1845. He was converted in 1865; studied two and a half years in Pennington Seminary; served one year as assistant on Columbus Circuit, and in 1872 was admitted into the New Jersey Conference, and stationed at Dennisville.

He served in 1873 and 1874 at Groveville, where one hundred and fifty were added to the Church; from 1875 to 1877 at Union Street Church, Trenton, where two hundred were converted; in 1878 at Washington, South River, where he had some success, and was returned in 1879. He labored until April 20 of that year, when he was prostrated with fever, then attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs, and died Aug. 8 following. Mr. Collins was pre-eminently a man of one work, giving all his time and energies to the ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 91.

Collins, Hiram B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Vincennes, Ind., May 4, 1829. He was left fatherless in childhood; received a careful religious training; spent some years as a teacher; was received by the Methodist Episcopal Church by letter from the Presbyterian Church in 1858; was given license to exhort the same year, and in the following was admitted into the South-eastern Indiana Conference, wherein he served with zeal and fidelity until his death, Sept. 4, 1864. Mr. Collins brought into the ministry a well-developed intellect, refined taste, superior literary attainments, an energetic character, and a heart in living sympathy with the interests of humanity and religion. He was a sound theologian, an excellent preacher, and a faithful and successful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 162.

Collins, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., June 11, 1789. He was converted in 1810; served in the war of 1812 under general Harrison, being known as a praying soldier; received license to preach in 1819, and in 1823 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference. He became supernumerary in 1859, and superannuated in 1862, and died May 26, 1870. Mr. Collins was a plain, earnest, able, useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 19.

Collins, Isaac Foster, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Wolcott, Wayne Co., N. Y., Aug. 24, 1819. He was converted in 1838, removed to Arkansas in 1840, and in the following year entered the Arkansas Conference, and was appointed to teach and preach among the Cherokee Indians. In 1843 he was sent to the Lower Cherokee mission; in 1844 was set off with the Indian Mission Conference, and in 1845 was sent among the Choctaw Indians, to teach in Morris Seminary. In 1846 he located and went to Michigan; began regular work the next year in the Michigan Conference; in 1853 returned to the Arkansas Conference, and was appointed among the Cherokees; in 1854 was transferred to the Missouri Conference, and employed on the Omaha mission. On the formation of the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, in 1856, he became one of its members, and, on its division, he fell within the bounds of the Kansas Conference, and died a member of its active ranks, April 26, 1862. Mr. Collins was decidedly a true friend, an honest man, an exemplary Christian, and a thorough, uncompromising Methodist preacher. He was dignified in appearance, humble in spirit, and very neat in person. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 22.

Collins, Isaac Wright, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Crawford County, Pa., Aug. 25, 1833. He was educated at Westminster College, New Wilmington, and studied theology in the Allegheny Seminary. He was licensed to preach by Lakes Presbytery in 1862, and became pastor successively at Neshaunock and West Salem, Wis. He died May 20, 1865. He was an earnest, pious, and zealous laborer in the Master's vineyard. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 259.

Collins, James, an English Methodist minister, was born in Devon, England, Feb. 20, 1841. He was converted in early life. While yet young he removed to Canada, and settled in the Pickering mission, where he became a local preacher among the Bible Christians, and was recommended to the conference of 1867. He labored on the Hampton, Cobourg, Hungerford, Wiar-ton, Lindsay, Fenelon, and Berrytown stations. He died March 6, 1875. He was a diligent student, an earnest preacher, a man of unquestioned piety, and a successful minister of the gospel. See Minutes of the Conference, 1875.

Collins, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1631; presented to the living at Campsie in 1639; after long opposition, was ordained in 1641, and was murdered about Martinmas, 1648. See Fæsti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 63.

Collins, John (2), an English Independent minister, came over to America with his father in his youth; in 1649 was a fellow of Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass., and returned to England when Oliver Cromwell was lord protector. He became chaplain to general Monk. He was silenced but not ejected in 1662, and became pastor at Lime-street Independent Church, London. He was one of the first six persons chosen to deliver the Merchants' Lecture at Pinner's Hall in 1672. He died in London, Dec. 3, 1687. He was a minister of uncommon ability, and an eloquent preacher, so that few persons went from his preaching unaffected. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 225-229.

Collins, John (3), an English Independent minister, son of the foregoing, was born in London about 1673. He studied at the University of Utrecht; returning to England, was ordained co-pastor at Lime Street, with the Rev. Robert Bragge, in 1698, and was chosen one of the Merchants' lecturers. In 1702 he assisted at the ordination, in Mark Lane, of Dr. Isaac Watts. He was a good preacher, a friend of Matthew Henry, who informs us that he fell dead suddenly at his study door, March 19, 1714. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 240, 241.

Collins, John (4), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Charlestown, R. I., Dec. 12, 1716, his father being also a minister in the same denomination. He became an eminent preacher among the Friends, and for many years sat at the head of the New England Yearly Meeting. He had a thorough acquaintance with the disciplinary affairs of the society, and "was much engaged, and took much pains, in endeavoring to have the Africans or negroes freed from slavery, and often testified against that wicked practice." He died at Stonington, Conn., Oct. 1, 1778. See R. I. Biographical Cyclop. p. 100. (J. C. S.)

Collins, John (5), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sussex County, Del., in April, 1764. He grew up to be a man of great bodily strength, and fierce and revengeful passions; but married a woman of remarkable amiableness, and shortly afterwards was converted. He immediately began exhorting and preaching, and in 1803 entered the Philadelphia Conference, wherein he labored without intermission until within a few weeks of his death, which occurred March 30, 1827. Mr. Collins had some very objectionable qualities in his character, still he labored with untiring zeal and did much good. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1827, p. 542; Methodist Magazine, x, 289.

Collins, John (6), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Somerset County, Md., Feb. 16, 1769. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Lewes in 1791. After graduating at Princeton College, he assumed the presidency of Washington Academy, in his native county. In 1797 he purchased an estate in New Castle County, Del., whither he removed, and became and continued to be pastor of the Presbyterian Church in St. George's until his death, April 12, 1804. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Collins, Joseph Lansfield, an English Congregational minister, was born at Stowmarket, Suffolk, in 1848. He was converted and joined the Church in his youth, and in 1863 entered Cheshunt College, where he spent three years. He was two years in the pastorate at Ipswich, and in January, 1869, accepted a call to the Church at Finchingfield, where he remained until his death, March 31, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 290.

Collins, J. B., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in 1821; converted in 1839, and united with the Church in Morristown, Vt. Four years after, he commenced his ministerial labors, removed to Clinton County, N. Y., in 1845, and shortly after settled in Franklin, where he was ordained. After several years he removed to St. Lawrence County, and labored in that section and in Jefferson County until 1877. He preached successively in Morristown, Depauville, Philadelphia, Keeseville, and other places. In 1877 he took charge of the Church in Dickinson Centre; in 1880 he became pastor of the Church in Underhill Centre, Vt., and preached a part of the time at East Cambridge. He died in March, 1883. See Morning Star, July 25, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Collins, Levi, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Somers, Conn., Feb. 12, 1777. After receiving a careful academic education, he graduated at Yale College in 1802. He was ordained by the Holland Association in 1832. On account of ill-health he did not take a pastoral charge, but spent most of his time in teaching. He was principal of Monroe Academy, Mass., for eight years, and died at Belvidere, Ill., Dec. 10, 1859. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 159.

Collins, Nathaniel (1), a Congregational minister, graduated at Harvard College in 1660, was ordained at Middletown, Conn., Nov. 4, 1668, and died Dec. 28, 1684. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 183.

Collins, Nathaniel (2), a Congregational minister, graduated at Harvard College in 1697, was ordained at Enfield, Conn., the same year, and died in 1756, aged seventy-nine years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 183.

Collins, Nicholas, an English Methodist preacher, was born at St. Breward, Cornwall, Dec. 28, 1806. He was converted at twenty; joined the Bible Christians; was a useful local preacher several years; entered the ministry in 1833, and for six years did good work among the people. In 1839 his health failed, and he died at Limehead, July 7, 1841.

Collins, Robert H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kent County, Del., May 12, 1833. He was converted near Memphis, Mo., in 1858; licensed to preach in 1859, entered the Des Moines Conference in 1863, and was afterwards transferred to the Missouri Conference. His health failing in 1874, obliged him to become a superannuate, and he died Jan. 26, 1875. Mr. Collins was a consistent Christian gentleman, an unusually good preacher, and an excellent pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 46.

Collins, Robert S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, son of Rev. McKissey Collins, was born in Greenville District, S. C., Aug. 11, 1811. He removed to western Tennessee in 1823, where he experienced religion in 1829; received license to preach in 1831, and in 1833 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference. In 1834 he was transferred to the Mississippi Conference; in 1839, located; in 1840 re-entered the conference, and died June 9, 1848. As a man, Mr. Collins was high-minded and honorable; as a Christian, eminently meek and gentle; as a preacher, systematic, able, impressive, popular, and useful; and in his domestic relations exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1848, p. 183.

Collins, Samuel (1), a scholar of the 17th century, was the son of Baldwin Collins, who was born at Coventry, a pious preacher, very bountiful to the poor, and whom queen Elizabeth constantly called father Collins. Samuel was born and educated at Eton; became fellow of King's College, Cambridge; afterwards provost and regius professor there, being a man of admirable wit and memory, and the most fluent Latinist of the age. He retained his professorship throughout his life, read his lectures twice a week for forty years, declined the bishopric of Bristol, and died in 1651. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 209.

Collins, Samuel (2), a Congregational minister, was born at Columbia, Conn., in 1747. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1775; was ordained pastor in Sandown, N. H., in 1780; in 1788 was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hanover Centre, and in 1795 removed to Craftsbury, Vt., where he was pastor of the Congregational Church until 1804. He died Jan. 7, 1807. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 157.

Collins, Samuel (3), an English Baptist minister, was born at Culworth, Northamptonshire, Dec. 22, 1798. He was received into the Church at the age of twenty, and manifested a desire to preach; in 1826 went to supply the pulpit at Grundesburgh, and after preaching one year was chosen pastor of the society, in which relation he continued for nearly fifty years. He took an active part in the organization of the Suffolk County Home Mission in 1831, and was its secretary for more than forty years. He originated, in 1833, the Gospel Herald, a low-priced Baptist magazine, and edited it for twenty-five years. He was unable to preach during the last three years of his life, and died June 17, 1881. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1882, p. 298.

Collins, William (1), an English Baptist minister, studied under the famous Dr. Busby at Westminster School; travelled on the continent for increased knowledge; had valuable offers in the Church of England, but accepted a joint pastorate with Dr. N. Cox at the Baptist Church (now New Broadstreet), London, in 1675. He was also distinguished as a physician, and signed the Baptist Confession of Faith drawn up and issued in 1688. He occupied a prominent and useful position in London, and died Oct. 30, 1702. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 181-185.

Collins, William (2), an English painter of very considerable merit, was born in London in 1788. In 1821 he was elected a royal academician; in 1837 visited Italy, and in 1840 produced Our Saviour in the Temple. Some of his paintings have been sold at a very high price. He died in London, in February, 1847. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Collins, William F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Northumberland, Saratoga Co., N. Y., Aug. 16, 1811. In 1834 he entered the New York Conference, and for thirty-six years, without interruption, ardently pursued his sacred calling, turning many to righteousness. He died March 21, 1870. Mr. Collins was a man of more than ordinary intellect, a very practical, spiritual preacher, and an indefatigable pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 105.

Collinson, SEPTIMUS, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1739. He took his degree of M.A. in 1767; in 1796 became provost of Queen's College, Oxford; and in 1798 was elected Margaret professor of divinity there. In his office of professor he labored with unexampled efficiency and zeal. The lectures on the Thirty-nine Articles, which he delivered in that capacity, evinced deep research, sound judgment, and great moderation. Dr. Collinson was a liberal benefactor to all public institutions of acknowledged utility. He died in 1827. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, February, 1827, p. 128.

Collinsworth, JOHN, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia, Feb. 22, 1786. He embraced religion in his thirteenth year, and in 1837 was admitted into the South Carolina Conference. In 1816 he located, on account of ill-health; re-entered the effective ranks in 1827, and died at his post, Sept. 4, 1834. Mr. Collinsworth was laborious and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1835, p. 345; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 443.

Collios (or Collus), FRANCESCO, an Italian theologian, was born near Milan towards the close of the 16th century. He was grand penitentiary of the diocese, and died at Milan in 1640, leaving De Sanguine Christi Libri Quinque (Milan, 1617):—An Christus Oblatum sibi in Circumcisione Præputium Rursus in Resurrectionem Acceperit:—De Animabus Paganorum Libri Octo (ibid. 1622, 1623.) See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Collison, George, an English Independent minister and educator, was born in Beverley, Yorkshire, Jan. 6, 1772. He received a superior education for that period, and when about seventeen years of age was articulated to a solicitor. In 1792, having experienced religion, he entered Hoxton College, in 1797 became assistant-tutor in that institution, and on Sept. 14 of the same year was ordained pastor of the Independent Church at Walthamstow, which office he held jointly with his tutorship. In 1801 he relinquished his engagements at Hoxton, and in 1803 became tutor in the Hackney Theological Seminary, which was just then founded. He resigned his pastorate at Walthamstow in 1837, but held his office in Hackney until his death, Feb. 6, 1847. Mr. Collison was a man of great purity of character, a sound divine, and eminently catholic in spirit. He was one of the founders of the London Missionary and Religious Tract societies, and an ardent supporter of all similar institutions. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1847, p. 137; 1848, p. 1.

Collison, John Wesley, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born near Armagh, March 11, 1853. He was converted at the age of seventeen, joined the Methodist Society, and became a prayer leader, tract distributor, and a local preacher. After passing through the usual course of study he was duly admitted to the ministry. He died at Clontarf, near Dublin, July 27, 1880. His life was short, but eminently successful as a preacher of Christ and winner of souls. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 54.

Cölln, WILHELM VON (or William of Cologne). a celebrated old German painter, was born at Herle, near Cologne, and was settled as early as 1370 at the latter place. His principal works are the picture of the tomb of Cerno von Falkenstein, in St. Castor's Church at Coblenz, painted in 1388; the large altarpiece of the Church of St. Clara at Cologne, in twenty-six parts, representing the Life and Passion of Christ, which is now in the cathedral. He has a Crucifixion and an Infant Jesus in the Wallraf Museum at Cologne.

Collobium. See COLOBUUM.

Collocatio designates a custom among the ancient Greeks and Romans of laying out the corpse of a dead person on a bed or couch, and placing it outside the house (afterwards at the threshold), to give ocular proof that the person was really dead, or, perhaps, that the death had not been by violence. A honey-cake was laid beside the corpse as a gift to Cerebus, and painted earthen vessels were arranged beside the bed, and buried with the corpse. The ceremony lasted two days.

Collombet, FRANÇOIS ZÉNON, a French Catholic writer, was born at Sièges (Jura), March 28, 1808. In 1827, wishing to embrace the ecclesiastical calling, he was sent to the Seminary of St. Irénéeus at Lyons; but his progress in theology not being great, he renounced the project of entering orders. Having formed an intimate friendship with one of his co-disciples, M. Gregoire, he prepared, in connection with him, various works. He died at Lyons, Oct. 16, 1853, leaving numerous translations and other productions, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Collop-Monday is a name for the Monday after Quinquagesima Sunday; so called because on that day the faithful began to leave off the use of flesh-meat—"collop" being a name descriptive of a piece of meat or flesh.

Collord, ISAAC, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New York city, June 25, 1794. He labored at sailmaking in his youth, became a member of the John Street Methodist Church in 1810, removed to Cincinnati in 1811, and with his father engaged in the tanning business; served in the war of 1812, received license to preach in 1818, and in 1819 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1848 he became superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death, March 8, 1875. Mr. Collard lived an eventful, zealous, faithful life. He was eminently genial and companionable. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 222.

Collow, JOHN, a Scotch clergyman, was called to the living at Penpont in 1736, and died Jan. 12, 1766. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 669.

Colluthians were an heretical sect of the 4th century, founded by Colluthus (q. v.), a presbyter of Alexandria. His tenets resembled those of the Manichæans (q. v.), holding that God did not create the wicked, and that he was not the author of the evils that befall men. Colluthus was deposed by the Council of Alexandria (324), and died before 340, after which the sect rapidly disappeared.

Colluthus is the name of several persons in the early Church:

1. A martyr under Maximian in the Thebaid, commemorated on May 19.

2. A presbyter and founder of a sect at Alexandria early in the 4th century. He assumed to exercise episcopal functions, but the Council of Alexandria, under Hosius (A.D. 324), decided that he was only a presbyter, and consequently Ischyra and others ordained by him were to be accounted mere laymen (Athanas. Apol. Contr. Arian. 12, 75-77, 80, 106, 152). Colluthus was regarded as a schismatic rather than a heretic. Epiphanius mentions in general terms (Hæc. 69, 728) that Colluthus taught some perverse things, and founded a sect, which was soon dispersed (Tillemont, vi, 231).

3. A monophysite, extracts from whose writings were read at the Lateran Council, A.D. 649.

Collyer, Isaac J. P., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Seekonk, Mass., May 19, 1814. He was converted and licensed to exhort in his youth, and in 1844 entered the New England Conference, in which he labored until his death, May 7, 1872. Mr. Collyer was remarkable for his noble, manly form and bearing; the strength, independence, quickness, penetration, and earnestness of his mind; his strong imagination, practical good sense, and ardent piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 53.

Collyer, William, an English Baptist minister, was born at Ivinghoe, Bucks, in 1793. About the year 1814 he gave his heart to God, but was not baptized until Aug. 29, 1822, and was received into the Church Oct. 6, following. In 1824 he began to assist his own pastor in the Ivinghoe Church, and at the death of the latter took the oversight of the flock. About 1831 he was urged to accept ordination as regular pastor, which at first he declined, but on Easter Tuesday, April 1, 1834, he was ordained pastor of the Particular Baptist Church at Ivinghoe. His labors were eminently successful for many years. He died June 9, 1879. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1880, p. 291.

Collyer, William Bengg, D.D., LL.D., F.S.A., an English dissenting minister, was born at Blackheath Hill, near London, April 14, 1782. He studied at Homerton College under Dr. J. Pye Smith, and became pastor of a dissenting church at Peckham, now a suburb of London, before he was twenty years of age, which post he occupied with great honor and usefulness to the end of his life. At his ordination in 1801 the church numbered only one hundred and ten members, but it soon increased in membership, and in 1818 Hanover Church was built; for about twelve years he was pastor of Salter's Hall Chapel, which afterwards became a Baptist Church. For half a century Dr. Collyer was the most popular dissenting minister in London, attracting large audiences to his church. He died in London, Jan. 9, 1854. His lectures were published at intervals, from 1809 to 1823, and embraced Scripture Prophecy, Facts, Miracles, Parables, Doctrines, Duties, Comparisons. In 1812 he printed a collection of hymns for the use of his congregation, nine hundred and seventy-nine in all, fifty-seven of which were his own. In 1837 he published Services Suited to the Marriage Service, to which were attached eighty-nine hymns by himself. See New York Observer, June 10, 1880; Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 210. (W. P. S.)

Collyrides were a species of cakes of kneaded dough, which were anciently offered to the gods as sacred gifts, from the notion, entertained by the heathens of all ages, that the gods delighted in the same things that were pleasing to men. See COLLYRIDIAN.

Collyva is an oblation used in the Greek Church in commemoration of the resurrection of the dead. It consists of cakes made principally of boiled wheat and currants, the surface of the top being ornamented with the edible grains of the pomegranate, almonds, etc., and is presented on a plate before the chancel of the church. They are brought on certain days by the friends of those who have died within a year or two. The friends claim that the soul of the deceased comes down during the service and eats a grain or two of the wheat.

Colma (or Columba), an Irish virgin-saint of Leitir, and her sisters, were pupils or foster-children of St. Comgall of Bangor. She is commemorated Jan. 22 (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 401, 402).

Colman is a very common name in Irish hagiology. In the table of the Mart. Doneg. are given 97 Colmans, and in the index 118. Colgan enumerated more than 130; and Usher says there are upwards of 230. We notice here only those best known. They all seem to have flourished about the 6th or 7th century.

1. The son of Comgellain, was a man deeply versed in legal and ecclesiastical learning, and a great friend of St. Columba. He died in the year of the eclipses, A.D. 625 (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 238).

2. Son of Daire, bishop of Doire-mor, is commemorated May 20 and July 31. He was a friend and neighbor of St. Pulcherius. Colman must have flourished in the beginning of the 7th century (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 169; c. 2, 173, 593; c. 22; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, i, 401, 402; ii, 210 sq.).

3. Son of Duach, of Cill-mac-Duach, commemorated Feb. 3, was a man of great virtue and miracles. He followed Christ from his youth, and at length retired to a hermit-cell, near the place where afterwards the Church of Kilmacduagh was built. The day of his commemoration there is Oct. 27 (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, 245 sq.; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 341 sq.; Dublin Penny Journal, i, 200).

4. Son of Eochaidh, is commemorated Jan. 1. There are several other Colmans in the calendars having this patronymic, two being celebrated on Sept. 6, and a fourth on Oct. 27. The present Colman is first mentioned as driving St. Columba for a whole day in a cart without a linchpin, and is said to have been the founder of the monastery which in the native dialect is called Snamluthair. He must have been a young man in the days of St. Columba (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 26).

5. Son of Fintan, is commemorated Dec. 14 in Mart. Doneg., but others call him son of Finnbar, and about A.D. 703 the Irish annals give the obit of Colman, son of Finnbar, abbot of Lismore (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 793). See No. 25.

6. Son of Lenin, of Cluain-uamha (Cloyne), commemorated Nov. 24, is regarded by Lanigan among the saints of the second order in Ireland, and believed to have flourished in the 6th century. He was brother of St. Brigida (q. v.), daughter of Lenin, and was one of the saints belonging to the family of St. Foilan. He seems at first to have been a poet attached to the court of Æth Caemh, king of Cashel, about the middle of the 6th century, and after his conversion to have attended St. Jarlath's school at Clonfuis, where he was next in order of sanctity to St. Brendan of Clonfert. He died about A.D. 604. His character as a poet appears in the very elegant metrical Life of St. Senan, which he composed, and of which we have now but a fragment; the substance of it is incorporated into Colgan's second Life of St. Senan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 104, c. 2, 588; c. 22, 589; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 41 sq., 212 sq.; Todd, St. Patrick, p. 208; Ware, Irish Antig. p. 144).

7. Son of Lugaidh, priest of Cluain Bruchais, is commemorated July 12. He was a grandson of Laeghaire, king of Ireland, and is given among those of that race who embraced the faith (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, iii, c. 8). He lived not later than the middle of the 6th century.

8. Son of Murchu, has had attributed to him and his two brothers (Colman, the oldest, being a bishop, and the others priests) the authorship of a hymn in praise of Michael the archangel; it is given in the Book of Hymns, and edited by Dr. Todd. He seems to have belonged to Connaught, and for a time, at least, was engaged in missionary labors on the Continent before becoming abbot of Morville, where he died, A.D. 785 (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii, 165 sq.).

9. Son of Roi, of Reachraim, is commemorated June 16. His mother, Eithne, was the mother also of many other saints, such as St. Columba, St. Maedoc of Ferns, and St. Comgan of Glen-Uissen. He is also called Colman the Deacon, and received from St. Columba the church which that saint had built at Reachraim (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 171; Reeves, Adamnan, pp. lxx, 164; and Ecc. Antig. p. 292).

10. Son of Ronan, is commemorated March 30. Colgan places him among the disciples of St. Columba.

11. Son of Tighernach, is commemorated Jan. 3. He is classed among the disciples and relatives of St. Columba. He was the brother of St. Begbile, St. Conandil, and St. Cuan Caein (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 15; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 195).

12. Son of Ua Laoighae, is commemorated May 15. He was a bishop at Tulach-mic-Comghaill. He was a contemporary of St. Columba, and is twice mentioned in the life of that saint. St. Colman died probably some time between the death of St. Fintan and St. Columba (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 177, 229 sq.).

13. Surnamed Mac-Uí-Tealduibh, is commemorated Feb. 8 and Dec. 12. This is Columbanus, one of the bishops to whom pope John IV, A.D. 640 (while yet but pope-elect), addressed the well-known letter urging the Scots to observe the true Easter, and avoid the Pelagian heresy (Bede, Ecc. Hist. ii, c. 19). He was bishop of Clonard, and according to the Irish annals died about A.D. 654 (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 412; Reeves, Ecc. Antig. p. 149 n.).

14. Of Ardbo, is commemorated Feb. 21. He was the son of Aedh, and descended from Colla Uais, monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the 4th century. His church was on the margin of Loch Eachach, in the north-east of Ireland (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 55).

15. Abbot of Cam-Achadh (where he is commemorated March 31), and of Cammus (commemorated Oct. 30). See No. 24.

16. Of Cill-mic-Eoghain, is commemorated Oct. 1. This saint was surnamed Cille. He was the son of Eugenius, son of Murdoch, and descended from the family of the Oirghialli (Oriell) in Ulster (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 265; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 713, c. 4).

17. Of Cill-Ruaidh, is commemorated Oct. 16. He is only mentioned in connection with St. Aillhe, who died, according to Irish annals, after the beginning of the 6th century.

18. Of Cluain-Eairid (Clonard, in Meath), is commemorated Feb. 9. Among the saints, prelates, and illustrious men in the school and church of Clonard, Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 406, c. 5) cites from the Four Masters, A.D. 700, the death in that year of Colman-us-heirc, abbot of Clonard. He must not be confounded with No. 13.

19. Of Combraire, at Uisneach, is commemorated Sept. 25. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 259) says Bronach, daughter of Milinc, son of Buan, with whom Patrick was in bondage, was his mother.

20. Of Druim-mor (Dromore), is commemorated June 6 and 7. This saint is likewise known as Colmac, probably, too, as Calmaig. In the Irish martyrologies he is usually called Mocholmog, bishop of Dromore. The dates of his birth and death are unknown, but he evidently flourished in the very beginning of the 6th century, and is not to be confounded with Colman Ela, who flourished half a century later. About 500, he founded the noble monastery of Dromore. He compiled, like others of his time, a rule for his monks. He was buried in Dromore. As Colmac, Colmoc, and Calmaig, he appears to have several dedications in Scotland. In the Scotch calendars his feast is June 6, and in the Irish, June 7 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 149; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, i, 424, 481 sq.; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i, 100 sq.; and St. Patrick, p. 181).

21. Of Glendalough, was the son of Uithecar. His festival is Dec. 12. He died A.D. 660, and was contemporary with several other Colmans in the third class of Irish saints (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 4; Forbes, Kul. of Scott. Saints, p. 304).

22. Of Glen-Delmaic, is commemorated Nov. 12. The history of this Colman is very obscure, but his memory is preserved in the dedication at Clara or Clarragh, in Kilkenny.

23. Of Lindisfarne and Inis-bo-finn, being connected with two countries, has a double commemoration, in Scotland on Feb. 18, and in Ireland on Aug. 8. He was consecrated, A.D. 661, as bishop Finan's successor in the see of Lindisfarne. He attended the council of Whitby in 664 on the Easter controversy, where he represented the Scottish party, and was defeated. See WILFRID. Accompanied by all his Scottish or Irish monks, and about thirty of the English, St. Colman returned to his parent monastery of Hy. Soon after, A.D. 668, he sailed to the west of Ireland, and dwelt on the island called Inishbofin. Owing to a dispute between his disciples, he built another monastery at Mayo, where he placed his English monks, while he and the others remained at Inishbofin, where he died Aug. 8, A.D. 676, and where the ruins of his church are still to be seen in the town-land of Knock (Bede, Ecc. Hist. iii, c. 25; iv, c. 4; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 59 sq.; Neander, Gen. Church Hist. [Edinb. 1849] v, 28 sq.; Forbes, Kul. of Scott. Saints, p. 303, 304).

24. Of Linn-Uachaille, or Lann, is commemorated March 30. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 792, 793), who has collected all the scattered notices regarding this saint, says that his mother was Lassara, and he was a native of Ulster. He had two or three churches, in which he is commemorated as above, and also Oct. 30. He died March 30, A.D. 699, according to the Four Masters. This saint is often called Mocholmoc (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 146; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 91, 289; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 300 n.).

25. Otherwise called Mocholmog, of Lismore, is commemorated Jan. 21. His father was Finbarr. Colman flourished in the reign of Cennfaeladh, king of Ireland, who died A.D. 769. After the death of St. Jarula, or Hierlog, Jan. 16, A.D. 699, Colman succeeded him as bishop and abbot of Lismore, whither scholars were attracted from all quarters. Colman died Jan. 22, A.D. 703 (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 154, 155; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 145-147; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 397 sq.).

26. Also called Alainn, is commemorated Dec. 14. His identity is uncertain.

27. Otherwise known as Dubhchuillem, of Dun in the Rennua, and of many other places, is commemorated Nov. 24. He flourished A.D. 570, and was contemporary with saints Kevin, Mobhi, Clairenech, Colman of Doiremor, Colman Ela, etc. He must be distinguished from Colman of Cloyne, whose festival is on the same day (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 193, col. 1).

28. Surnamed Eula, Ela, or Colmanellus, is commemorated Sept. 26. He was the son of Beognai. By his mother, Mór, he was a nephew of St. Columba. He was born in Glennaichle, now Glenelly, A.D. 555. He founded the monastery at Lann-Eala, in Ferceall (now Lynally). He probably died A.D. 611 (O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 285; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 304 sq.). Many places in Ayrshire and Argyllshire were dedicated to his memory (Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 805).

29. Otherwise named Finn, is commemorated April 4. In the days when it was customary to join companions under one leader for Christian teaching and practice, we find Colman Finn in the litany of St. Aengus (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 486 n°; Reeves, Adamnan, p. 800). He died A.D. 771, according to the Four Masters, who call him "Colum Finn the anchorite."

30. Also called Imromha, of Fathan Beg, in Inis Eoghain, is commemorated July 8. Among the abbots and saints of the Church of Fahan, where Colgan says there was at one time a noble monastery, and now there is only a parish church, there is cited, without date, "S. Colmanius cogn. Imromha, etc." He is placed in the list before St. Murus or Mura, who must have died some time before A.D. 658, as that is the date given for the death of Cellach, St. Mura's successor (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 37, 38).

31. Surnamed Itadich, or "The Thirsty," is commemorated March 5. His name does not appear in the calendars, yet his faithfulness is duly chronicled in the Life of St. Patrick, by Evinius and Jocelyne. In his strict observance of the rule of fasting he would not quench his thirst in the harvest-field, and died in consequence at Trian Conchobuir about A.D. 445 (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, i, 819).

32. Also called Mór, son of Luachan, is commemorated June 17.

33. Surnamed Muilinn, "of the Mill," is commemorated Jan. 1. He is said to have been of Doire Chaochain (now Derrykeighan). In St. Aengus's tract on the Mothers of the Irish Saints, his mother is given as Bronach, the daughter of Milchu, son of Buan, with whom St. Patrick was in captivity. This Bronach is also given as the mother of St. Mochaol, or Caelan, who died A.D. 497, and others, which is the only clue we have to the period when he lived (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg., p. 3; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 18).

34. Surnamed Priscus, A.D. 800, is not to be found in the calendars, but Hector Boethius gives a Colmanus Priscus, who, with St. Medan, St. Modan, and St. Euchinus, was preacher among the Picts and Scots (Scotor. Hist. lib. viii, fol. 151 a, ed. 1575). He was patron saint of the Church of Llangolman and of Capel Colman, in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 190).

35. Also called Stellain, of Tir-da-Glas (now Terryglass, in Tipperary), is commemorated May 26. Little appears to be known regarding him. He died A.D. 624 (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 247 n°; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 24).

36. Otherwise named Ua Cluasaigh. This Colman is of unknown parentage. He was Fer-Leghinn, or lecturer in the theological school at Cork, and is best known as the tutor or master of St. Cumin Foda of Clonfert. He wrote a panegyric on his pupil. It is quoted by the Four Masters at A.D. 661. He composed a hymn, intended as a protection against the plague; it is given, with translation and notes, in the Book of Hymns edited by Dr. Todd. He died during a pestilence in Ireland, about A.D. 661 or 662 (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i, 86, 93; ii, 121 sq.; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 271, 272).

37. Also styled Ua Fiachrach, of Senbotha (now Templeshambo, in Wexford), is commemorated Oct. 27. He was the son of Eochaídh Brec, and was related to Niall of the Nine Hostages. This Colman was a contemporary of St. Colman Macduach, and of St. Maidoc of Ferns, who flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. His monastery was situated at the foot of Mount Leinster. The year of his death is unknown (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 2, 5; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg., p. 287).

38. Also designated as Ua Eirc, was abbot of Clonard, and died A.D. 700. His chief feast was Dec. 5, but he appears to have been also commemorated Feb. 9 (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 406, c. 5; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg., p. 327). See No. 18.

39. Likewise styled Ua Lúthain, "doctor," A.D. 725, is commemorated July 25. Colgan calls him bishop of Lismore and a famous doctor, and says he died about A.D. 725, which is the year given in the Four Masters as the date when "S. Colman O'Liadain, a select doctor, died."

40. Of Uamhach (Huamacsensis), scribe of Armagh, died in 725, and is commemorated Nov. 24 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg., p. 317).

41. Commemorated Oct. 1, is supposed to be Colman of Cill-mic-Eoghain, who is of the race of Colla-da-Chrioch. See No. 16. Colgan numbers among the saints of the family of Oirghialli (Oriell), and race of Colla-da-Chrioch, St. Colman, surnamed Kille, son of Eoghain, etc., and gives his feast as Oct. 1.

Colman, Ebenezer, a Congregational minister, was born at Ashby, Mass. In 1815 he graduated from Brown University; subsequently studied theology at Rindge, N. H., under the tutorship of Rev. Seth Payson, and after three years was ordained pastor at Tiverton, R. I. His fields of labor comprised much of Rhode Island and New Hampshire until 1842, when he removed to western New York, where he remained until 1855. The last three years of his ministry were spent with the Church at Lamolite, Ill. He resided in Detroit, Mich., during the last year of his life, and died there, June 15, 1859, aged sixty-nine years. His preaching is said to have been solemn and convincing. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 84.

Colman, Henry, a Unitarian minister, was born in Boston, Mass., Sept. 12, 1785, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1805. He was ordained and installed minister of the Second Congregational Church in Hingham in 1807, where he remained until 1820. From 1825 to 1831 he officiated as pastor of a new Unitarian society in Salem, and afterwards moved to Deerfield, where he devoted himself to farming. He was appointed agricultural commissioner of the state of Massachusetts, and after passing considerable time in making a tour of inspection in that state, and in preparing several reports, spent six years (1842-48) in Europe. The results of his observations during this time were published on his return. In 1849 he revisited Europe in the hope of benefiting his health, but died in London soon after his arrival, Aug. 14, 1849. He published a great number of single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 213.

Colman, James, a Baptist missionary, was born in Boston, Mass., Feb. 19, 1794. He was ordained there Sept. 10, 1817, having received his appointment as a missionary the May previous. He arrived at Calcutta April 15, 1818. After remaining for a time in Rangoon, he removed to Chittagong, and thence to Cox's Bazaar, Nov. 12, 1821. He died of jungle fever, July 4, 1822. Mr. Colman was a young man of sincere piety, and consecrated to his work. (J. C. S.)

Colman, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Holt, Norfolk, in 1805. He united with the Church in London in his sixteenth year; entered the ministry in 1829; retired from the active work in 1867; resided first at Hardway, Gosport; went to St. Helen's in October, 1871, and died there, Nov. 17 ensuing. He clearly explained and earnestly enforced the doctrines and duties of Christianity. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1872, p. 17.

Colmar, Johann, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Nuremberg, June 19, 1684. He studied at Altdorf, where, in 1709, he became magister, on presenting his De Sinicorum et Peripateticorum Circa Gradum Necessitatis Honorum Externorum ad Summam Benivolentiam Disputationes. Having completed his studies at Jena, he was appointed, in 1715, inspector of the alumni at Altdorf. In 1719 he was called to his native place as rector of the hospital-school, and died April 2, 1737. He wrote, Antihomicon seu de Causa Negati Lutheranos Inter et Calvinianos Unionis Successus Disquisitionis Methodo Mathematica Instituta (1714);—Disp. de Summa Judeorum Astorgia, ad Mich. ii, 5 (1716);—De Affectuum Causis (1719). See Willa, Nürnberg'scher Gelehrten-Lexikon; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Colmar, John, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to the West Indies in 1816, where he labored until his sudden death, on the island of Tortola, Sept. 15, 1818. Colmar was a young man of genuine piety. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1819.

Colmar, Joseph Ludwig, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Strasburg, June 22, 1760. Having received holy orders, he was appointed professor at the royal college of his native place. In 1802 he was made bishop of Mayence, and died Dec. 15, 1818. Besides sermons and pastoral letters, he published Sententia S. Ignatii pro Quolibet die Mensis Distributa (Mayence, 1809-12). See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 261 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 113, 147. (B. P.)

Colmenares, Diego de, a Spanish historian, was born at Segovia in 1586. He entered the priestly order while very young, and was for a long time rector of the Church of St. John of Segovia. At the age of thirty-four he resolved to write the history of his native city, and spent fourteen years in collecting the necessary information. At last, in 1634, he published his book, the first of the kind written in Spain. It was entitled Historia de la Insigne Ciudad de Segovia y Compendio de las Historias de Castilla (Segovia, 1634). He died in 1651. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colmas, an early Scotch saint, is said by Cameron and Dempster to have been a bishop of the Orkney Islands, and is commemorated on March 9 and June 6. But the name probably belongs to two or more individuals, and may be the same as the Colmach, Colman, and Colme of the Scotch calendars, and of the litany of Dunkeld (Forbes, Kal. of Scottish Saints, p. 305, 306).

Colobium (κολόβιον) was a tunic with very short sleeves only, and fitting closely about the arm. The tradition was that Sylvester, bishop of Rome, ordered that deacons should wear dalmatics in offices of holy ministry, in place of the colobia, which had previously been in use. From this circumstance of the colobium being regarded as the special vestment of a deacon, it is sometimes called lebiton (i. e. lebiton) or lebitonarium, a word which reappears in ecclesiastical Greek of the 5th and later centuries (Λεβιτών). The monastic colobium in Palestine, if not elsewhere, had upon it a purple "sign," probably a cross, used, perhaps, as a mark of service under Christ. Examples of the Greek colobium may be seen in the ancient mosaics of the 4th century, in the church of St. George at Thessalonica.

Cologna, ABRAHAM DA, an Italian rabbi, was born at Mantua in 1755. Having devoted himself from youth to the study of Jewish theology and philosophy, he was made a member of the College of the Dotti at Mantua, and in 1806 was called to Paris as ecclesiastical member of the body of distinguished Israelites assembled by Napoleon. In 1808 he was appointed one of the three grand rabbis of the central consistory; in 1812 its president, and in 1826 left Paris to assume the office of first rabbi at Trieste. He died there in 1832. Cologna was one of the principal collaborators of the Israélite Français, a periodical, published for some time at Paris. He also left a pamphlet upon the work of M. Bail, Les Juifs au Dix-Neuvième Siècle, and another on the same work, addressed to Sylvester of Sacy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cologne, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Coloniense or Agrippinense), were provincial synods as follows:

I. Said to have been held A.D. 346, to condemn Euphratas, bishop of Cologne (for denying our Lord's divinity), who was, however, at Sardica as an orthodox bishop the year after (Pagi ad an. 346, n. 6; Mansi, Concil. ii, 1371-1378). Baronius and Cave think the council spurious. Sirmond supposes that Euphratas recanted; others that he was acquitted; others that there were two successive bishops of Cologne so named.

II. Another council is reported to have been held in 782, under Charlemagne, but this was apparently a political council; nothing is known of it ecclesiastically (Labbe and Cossart, Concil. vi, 1827, from Eginhard).

III. Held April 1, 887. In it the ancient canons were confirmed, and censures pronounced against those who pillaged the property of the Church, oppressed the poor, and married within the forbidden limits. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 896.

IV. Held March 12, 1260, by Conrad, archbishop of Cologne. In it were drawn up fourteen canons of discipline for the clergy, and eighteen for monks. Among the former:

1. Is directed against those of the clergy who kept mistresses: forbids them to be present at the marriage of their children, or to leave them anything by will.
2. Declares that all clergy should know how to read, and to chant the praises of God, and orders such as cannot do so to provide a deputy.
3. Orders that in churches belonging to canons, if there be no dormitory, one shall forthwith be built, and that the said canons shall occupy it, that they may always be ready to assist at matins; also forbids them to eat or sleep out of the confines of their church, i. e. the dormitory.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 784.

V. Held in 1266, by Engelbert, archbishop of Cologne. Fifty-four canons were drawn up, which are chiefly against the plunderers of the Church, and those who killed, injured, and defrauded ecclesiastics. The last orders that the names of sacrilegious persons shall be kept in a book, and constantly read out. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 835.

VI. Held in 1280, by Sifridus (Sifroi), archbishop of Cologne. Eighteen canons were drawn up.

1. Relates to the life and conversation of the clergy, and forbids them to play at games of chance; directs them to say daily the office of the Blessed Virgin.
2. Relates to the state, etc., of the religious, and forbids monks or nuns to have any sort of property.
3. Treats at length of the sacrament of the altar, and directs that before celebrating the communion the priests shall have said matins and prime, and have confessed, if they have the opportunity.
4. Treats of the sacrament of penance.
5. Of orders.
6. Of matrimony.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1107.

VII. Held about the year 1300, by Wichbold, archbishop of Cologne; twenty-two canons were published.

2. Orders deans to deliver in writing a list of all non-resident incumbents in their deaneries.

15. Orders all priests in the diocese to excite their parishioners to contribute towards the fabric of the cathedral of Cologne.

17. Orders that the clerks appointed to ring the bells shall not be illiterate persons, but, if occasion require, able to assist the priest at the altar.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1439.

VIII. Held March 9, 1310, by Henry, archbishop of Cologne, and three bishops; twenty-nine canons were published.

11. Directs that the epistles and gospels shall be read only by persons in holy orders.

16. Directs that those persons whose office it is to ring the church bells shall know how to read, in order that they may be able to make the responses; and also that they shall wear the alb during divine service.

17. Directs that the rural deans shall provide that all their churches be furnished with proper ornaments.

21. Forbids to pronounce a curse against any person in the church, or to sing the Media Vita against any one, without the bishop's leave.

23. Directs that in future the year shall commence at the festival of Christmas, according to the use of the Roman Church.

Others forbid parishioners to receive the holy communion, at Easter, at the hands of any but their own curates; order nuns to keep close to their cloisters, and monks to observe strictly the rule of poverty.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1517.

IX. Held in 1423, by Thierry, archbishop of Cologne; eleven canons were decreed.

Among other things, it was ordered that clergymen convicted of incontinence should be deposed, if, after due warning, they did not amend their scandalous life; that priests alone shall be named to preach indulgence and to collect alms; that canons and other clerics refrain from talking during divine service, under penalty of losing allowance.

The ninth canon is directed against the doctrines of Wycliffe and John Huss.

See Labbe, Concil. xii, 360.

X. Held in 1452, by cardinal Cusa, legate à latere for Germany.

Here it was decreed that a provincial council should be held at Cologne every three years, so that a synod should occur annually in one of the three dioceses; that all Jews, of both sexes, should have their dress marked with a circle, in order to distinguish them; that the clergy should keep their hair cut short; also, that processions with the holy sacrament should not be permitted to take place too frequently, and then that all should be done with extreme reverence.

See Labbe, Concil. xiii, 1878.

XI. Held in 1536, by Hermann, archbishop of Cologne, assisted by his suffragans, and several others. The acts of this council are divided into fourteen articles, each article containing several decrees relating to the discipline of the church.

Art. I. Consists of thirty-six canons, and treats of the duties of bishops, especially in ordaining and visiting. Among other things: 4. Buying and selling of benefices, and worldly motives in giving them, are denounced as detestable; also, 32. Pluralities are condemned, and those who have the pope's license for a plurality of benefices are bidden to inquire of their consciences whether they have God's license also.

Art. II. Relates to the offices of the Church, etc., and contains thirty-two canons. Bishops are exhorted to reform their breviaries where they are defective, and to purge out all false or doubtful legends, which have been inserted (ne scimus qua incuria) instead of passages from Holy Scripture; directions are given that the breviary be recited with reverence and attention, and that the mass be celebrated with proper devotion. 15. Defines the proper use of organs, which, it states, are intended to excite devotion, and not profane emotions of joy. With regard to the morals and conduct of the clergy, it states (22) that pride, luxury, and avarice are the principal causes of their evil reputation; and (in 23, 24, 25) that they ought to abstain from great feasts and good living, and from drunkenness and other like vices.

Arts. III, IV, and V relate to cathedral and other churches, and those who serve them, to the mendicant friars, etc., and contain in all fifty-seven canons. Canons are ordered to live canonically, as their name imports, to remember the original intention of their institution, which was, that they should dwell together, etc.; if they fail on any occasion to be present at mass after the epistle, or at the hours after the first psalm, they shall be deprived of their allowance. Non-residence is forbidden. Persons having cure of souls are exhorted to be careful to exhibit a pattern to their flocks.

Art. VI. Relates to the preaching of the word of God, and contains twenty-seven canons; states that the preacher ought constantly to read in and meditate upon the Holy Scriptures; to accommodate his discourse to the understanding of his hearers; to avoid profane eloquence and worldly declamation, and everything tending to the ridiculous; shows how the clergy are to instruct the people upon controverted subjects, and to repress vice. Canon 26. Directs that the decalogue and creed shall be plainly recited immediately after the sermon.

Art. VII. Relates to the sacraments of the Church, and contains fifty-two canons. It reckons seven sacraments; directs that the clergy should instruct the people that the visible part of a sacrament is but the sensible sign of the effect produced upon the soul; it treats of each of the seven sacraments in detail. Among other things, it declares that, in order to be admitted to the communion, it is necessary to have a pure conscience, a heart truly penitent, and a lively faith, to realize the truth of Christ's body offered and his blood poured forth in that sacrament. With regard to the communion in both kinds, canon 15 directs the priest to teach those of his parishioners who are hurt at the denial of the cup, that the layman, who receives the bread only, receives as fully and completely both the body and the blood of our Lord as the priest does, who receives in both kinds; that the Church, out of reverence to the sacrament, and for the salvation of the faithful, hath thought proper so to order it, and that, consequently, the laity, being assured that they do receive both the body and blood of Christ, should submit to its judgment.

Art. VIII. Containing seven canons, is upon the subject of the maintenance of the clergy; it forbids any fee for the administration of the sacraments or for burials; it also enjoins the restoration of tithes by those laymen who had usurped them.

Art. IX. Containing twenty-one canons, speaks of the usages and customs of the Church; directs that fasting, being an ordinance of the Church, may not be neglected, and declares that to eat sumptuous breakfasts on days appointed to be observed with fasting, is not obedience to the spirit of the Church's injunction; it also explains the appointment of Rogation days, and declares that Sunday is to be observed and kept holy; that on that day it is the duty of the faithful to hear mass and the sermon, and to sing the psalms and hymns; forbids fairs to be held on that day, and the frequenting of taverns.

Art. X. Contains sixteen canons, and relates to monastic discipline.

Art. XI. Contains eight canons, relating to almshouses, hospitals, and similar establishments; states that it is the bishop's duty to look after the repair of those which have fallen into decay, and to provide for the spiritual care of those persons who dwell in them.

Art. XII. Contains nine canons, relating to schools, libraries, etc.

Art. XIII. Relates to contests about ecclesiastical jurisdiction, etc., and contains four canons.

Art. XIV. Relates to episcopal and other visitations, and contains twenty-four canons.

See Labbe, Concil. xiv, 484.

XII. Held in 1549, by Adolphus, archbishop. Several statutes were made for the reformation of the Church; the six principal methods recommended are the following:

1. It was ordered that the education of the young should be confined to those persons only whose purity of faith and life was known, and who had undergone an examination by the ordinary, or by persons approved by him. That no suspected or heretical works should be allowed in colleges or universities.

2. It is declared that the examination of candidates for orders, and of persons to be instituted to benefices, belongs to the bishop alone, or to persons authorized by him; and that those who desire to be ordained shall give public notice of the same.

3. The clergy are ordered to inflict the penalty enjoined by the canons upon those whose sins have deserved it, and not to remit it for money. Pluralities are forbidden.

4. The end of episcopal visitations is declared to be the correction of vice, and the restoration of purity of life and discipline. Bishops are exhorted to take but few followers with them in their visitations, to avoid burdening their clergy.

5. The necessity of holding ecclesiastical synods is shown, in order to preserve the faith and discipline of the Church in their integrity, and to maintain parity of morals, to insure the reformation of abuses.

6. Treats of the re-establishment of ecclesiastical discipline.

These statutes were approved by the emperor's letters-patent. See Labbe, Concil. xiv, 627. — London, Man. of Councils, a. v.

Cologne, DANIEL and WILLIAM OF. See CÖLLN.

Colomb, JEAN, a learned French theologian, was born at Limoges, Nov. 12, 1688. He entered the Benedictine order in 1707, and died in 1778. Having become collaborator of Rivet, he continued, after the death of that scholar, the Histoire Littéraire de la France. He also wrote Histoire de l'Abbaye de Saint-Vincent du Mans (still in MS.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colomba, Saint (1), a Christian virgin, called the first martyr of Celtic Gaul, suffered at Sens under Marcus Aurelius, according to one authority, but according to other and more probable accounts, under the emperor Aurelian, about 273. In the 7th century she was an object of great veneration at Paris, and Dagobert caused a magnificent shrine to be placed in the Benedictine church at Sens, in honor of her. This was destroyed when the church was pillaged by the Calvinists. She is commemorated as St. Columba on Dec. 31. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colomba, Saint (2), a Spanish martyr, was born at Cordova. While very young she was placed under the care of her sister, Elizabeth, in the monastery of Tabenna. Being driven from this place, together with the other nuns, by the Moors, she took refuge at Cordova, and, when arraigned, boldly declared herself a Christian, and was beheaded Oct. 17, 853. Her body, which was thrown into the Guadalquivir, was recovered by the Christians and interred in the Church of St. Eulalia at Cordova. An order of St. Columba was founded in 1379 by John I, but it did not survive its founder. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colomban. See COLUMBANUS.

Colombano, ANTONIO MARIA, an Italian painter, a native of Correggio, flourished from 1596 to 1616. There are fifteen pictures mentioned as executed by this artist, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin and the infancy of Christ.

Colombel, NICOLAS, a French painter, was born at Sotteville, near Rouen, in 1646, studied under Lesueur, and subsequently visited Rome for improvement. He was elected professor of the Royal Academy of Paris in 1705. Among his best productions, at Versailles, are Moses Saved by Pharaoh's Daughter and Moses Defending the Daughters of Jethro. He died at Paris in 1717. See Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colmbière, CLAUDE DE LA, a French Jesuit, was born at Saint-Symphorien, near Lyons, in 1641. He was two years court-preacher to the duke of York, afterwards James II of England, but was eventually banished, and retired to Paris, in Burgundy, where he died, Feb. 15, 1682. He was a famous preacher, and became noted for his "devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus," a sentiment which the notorious Marie Alacoque carried to the extreme of fanaticism. His Sermons were published (Lyons, 1757, 6 vols.), also a few treatises on practical religion.

Colombini, Giovanni, a painter of the Venetian school, was born at Treviso about 1700, and studied under Sebastiano Ricci. His chief works are in the convent of the Dominicans at Treviso.

Colombini, San Giovanni, a noted Italian ecclesiastic, was a member of a distinguished family in Siena, and a magistrate there. It is said that one day, being obliged to wait for his repast, his wife gave him as a means of diversion the Lives of the Saints to read. This so impressed him that he resigned his civil office, proceeded to distribute a great part of his goods to the poor, turned his house into a hospital, and collected a number of disciples, who received from the people the name Jesuates, because they often spoke the name of Jesus in a loud voice. Urban V approved this novel institution, under the order of St. Augustine. These Jesuates were originally laymen, and applied themselves to the preparation of medicaments, but in 1606 they received permission to take sacred orders. They were suppressed in 1669 by Clement IX. Colombini died July 31, 1367. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colomiès (Lat. Colomesius), PAUL, a learned French Protestant, was born at La Rochelle, Dec. 2, 1638. He studied philosophy and theology at Saumur, learned Hebrew under the celebrated Cappel, allied himself at Paris with Isaac Vossius, and accompanied him to Holland. In 1681 he went to England, and became librarian to Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; lost this place in consequence of the disgrace of his protector, and died of chagrin at London, Jan. 13, 1692. He wrote, Gallia Orientalis (Hague, 1665):—Exhortation de Tertullien aux Martyrs (ibid. 1678):—Rome Protestante (Lond. 1675):—Theologorum Presbyterianorum Icones (1682):—Parallèle de la Pratique de l'Eglise Ancienne et de Celle des Protestants de France (ed.):—Bibliothèque Choisie (La Rochelle, ed.: Amsterdam, 1699):—Ad Guilielmi Cave Chartophylacem Ecclesiasticum Paralipomena: Accedit de Scriptis Photii Dissertatio, et Passio S. Victoris Massiliensis (Lond. 1686, 1689; Leips. 1687):—Lettre a M. Justel, etc. (Lond. 1686). John Albert Fabricius published the greater part of the works of Colomiès in a volume entitled Colomesii Opera, Theologi, Critici, et Historici Argumenti, Junctim Editi (Hamb. 1709). Colomiès was also the editor of the following: S. Clementis Epistola dua ad Corinthios, Interpretibus Patricio Junio, Gottifredo Wendelino, et Joh. Bap. Cotelero (Vienna, 1682), and others. See Biog. Universelle, a. v.

Colomme, JEAN BAPTISTE SÉBASTIEN, a French theologian, was born at Pau, April 12, 1712. He was superior of the Barnabites, and died at Paris in 1788, leaving Dictionnaire Portatif de l'Ecriture Sainte (Paris, 1775; first published under the title Notice sur l'Ecriture Sainte, ibid. 1773):—Manuel des Religieuses (ibid. 1779):—Éternité Malheureuse (transl. from the Latin of Drexelius, ibid. 1788). He also wrote a translation of the Opuscula of Thomas à Kempis (ibid. 1785), and an enlarged edition of the same, entitled Vie Chrétienne, ou Principes de la Sagesse (1774; Avignon, 1779). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colon, BERNARD, a learned French theologian of the Benedictine order, who died in 1709, wrote Traité des Vers Latins (Paris, 1664), and several memorial sermons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colonatus. In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 191) there are two entries at July 8, but Dr. Todd shows that they both belong to the same person, namely, to St. Cilian (q. v.) and his companions, who evangelized Würzburg, and suffered there. Colonatus is said to have been honored in the Enzie, Banffshire (Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 306). See COLMAN.

Colonia, André de, a French theologian of the Minorite order, who was born at Aix, in Provence, in 1617, and died at Marseilles in 1688, wrote some theological and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colonia, Dominique de, a French scholar and antiquarian, was born at Aix, in Provence, Aug. 25, 1660. He became a Jesuit, and resided at Lyons for fifty-nine years, where he taught successively the lower studies, rhetoric, and elementary theology. He died at Lyons, Sept. 12, 1741, leaving many works, among which we cite Antiquités de la Ville de Lyon:—Pratique de Piété (Paris, 1717):—La Religion Chrétienne Autorisée par le Témoignage des Anciens Pères (ibid.

1718; ibid. and Besançon, 1826):—Bibliothèque Janséniste (ibid. 1722, 1731, and elsewhere under different titles). In the Journal de Trévoux various memoirs by Colonna are found. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Colonna. See MACARIUS.

Colonna, Ascanio, an Italian prelate, was born about 1560; was made cardinal in 1586, afterwards viceroy of Aragon, and died at Rome, May 17, 1608, leaving De Monarchia Siciliae, which is a critique upon the treatise of Baronius, Monarchia Siciliensis, and is found, with the response of Baronius, in the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Siciliae of Grævius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colonna, Egidio. See AONIUS.

Colonna, Francesco, an Italian scholar, was born at Venice about 1449. While young he entered the Dominican order, was professor of grammar and belles-lettres in the convent of that order at Treviso in 1467, and in 1473 was made doctor of theology at Padua. He died in 1527, leaving a very singular work, a kind of allegorical romance, entitled Hypnerotomachia Poliphili, intended to show that human passions are but dreams (originally published at Venice in 1499; an inferior edition, ibid. 1545; transl. into French, Paris, 1546, also 1554, 1561; improved version, by Vernille, ibid. 1600; literal translation by Le Grand, ibid. 1804; Parma, 1811; English transl. Lond. 1592, not complete). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colonna, Giacomo (1), an Italian prelate, was made cardinal by Nicholas III, and afterwards chief counsellor of the papal court, while his relatives were loaded with similar honors by Nicholas IV. But Boniface VIII stripped the Colonna family of their privileges, and Giacomo retired to France. He is believed to have taken part in the conspiracy of Sciarra Colonna, in concert with Nogaret, against the pope. The dignity of cardinal was restored to him by Clement V, Dec. 17, 1305, and the bull against the Colonnas was recalled at the intercession of Philip the Fair. Giacomo died in 1318. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colonna, Giacomo (2), an Italian prelate, lived in the early part of the 14th century. Pope John XXII appointed him bishop of Lombez in return for the courage he manifested in publishing at Rome the excommunication pronounced against Louis of Bavaria. As a protector of Petrarch, Colonna contributed much to bring about the coronation of that poet at Rome in 1341, and Petrarch addressed to him a canzone. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colonna, Giovanni, an Italian prelate, was made cardinal by pope Honorius in 1216, and was present as legate at the taking of Damietta by St. Louis. Falling into the hands of the Saracens he was condemned to be sawn asunder, but his courage won the admiration of his captors, and he was set at liberty. He founded the hospital of the Lateran at Rome, and died there in 1255, leaving Historia Sacra, which is in MS., besides some Letters on the Holy Land, to be found in Ughelli. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colonna, Giovanni Paolo, one of the greatest Italian musical composers, was born in 1640. He received his education at Rome, where Carissimi, Benevoli, and others were his teachers. He then made Bologna his residence, where he soon became the head of the musical school, and died Nov. 28, 1695. His compositions are for the most part of a religious character. The most important he issued in twelve collections, published at Bologna. The first appeared as Op. 1, under the title Salmi Brevi a 8 Voci (1681), and the last as Op. 12, under the title Psalmi ad Versus (1694). See Biog. Universelle, s. v. (B. P.)

Colonna, Pompeo, an Italian prelate, was at first bishop of Rieti. Turbulent and passionate, he gave himself up to his fondness for arms, and took an active part in all the revolutions of the Roman court, but was nevertheless a patron of literature. He had the legateship of the March of Ancona, the bishopric of Aversa, the archbishopric of Montereale, and was viceroy of Naples. He died at Naples, June 28, 1582, leaving De Laudibus Mulierum, a poem, in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colorbasians. See COLARBASUS.

Colorites were a congregation of Augustinian monks, founded in the 16th century by Bernard of Rogliano, in Calabria. The name is said to have been derived from Colorito, a hill in the district of Naples, on which there is a church dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The order was not fully established until 1591, and a few years later they avowed submission to the general of the Augustinians. Their habit consisted of a dark-colored gown and a mantle that reached only to the knees.

Colors, ECCLESIASTICAL. The following details are from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.:

"In some foreign churches the dignity of fests was attempted to be shown by a graduated scale of colors. A curious analogy has been traced between the three common chord notes, the third, fifth, and eighth, and the three primary colors of the solar ray; also of the seven notes of the major diatonic scale and the colors of the solar spectrum, so that various instruments have been ingeniously represented as colors—the oboe as yellow, the flute white, the trumpet scarlet, etc.

"Jerome mentions that one dress was worn in sacred ministrations, and another in ordinary life; and pope Stephen III enjoined the ecclesiastical vestments to be used only in church. Possibly about the 6th century the fashion of vestments became fixed. Salvian, Paulinus of Nola, and pope Celestine, in 428, allude to the adoption of a distinct dress by priests. In France it was the practice in the 5th century; and the monks, by the adoption of a habit, promoted the movement. At Constantinople, in the 4th century, the Catholics wore black, and the Novatians white, out of doors. Chrysostom celebrated in white, which he mentions as the church-dress. In the early times of the church white was used, certainly in the 4th century, as appears from the writings of Jerome, Gregory of Tours, Isidore of Seville, and Fortunatus. Anastasius speaks of it in the lives of Popes Leo III and IV, Gregory IV, and Sergius II; and in the monics at St. Paul's Without, at Rome, white robes, sometimes adorned with bands of violet or gold, appear, as worn by the early popes. From the 9th century red, blue, and green were gradually permitted in vestments, but prescript colors were not generally adopted until the 11th or 12th century, white being retained for the amice, alb, surplice, and the cope and chasuble on feasts of the Nativity, Epiphany, All-Saints, and St. John the Baptist. They are first mentioned by the author of the 'Treatise on Divine Offices' about the 11th century, and afterwards, in the 12th century, by Durandus, bishop of Mende, and Innocent III. The Greeks, about the same period, adopted these colors, reserving red, however, for fast-days and memorials of saints. The Greek Church requires white at Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter; blue or violet in Passion Week, in Advent, Lent, and at burials; and white and green at Pentecost. No doubt the common color for altar-cloths—which is red, and the ordinary color of the Salisbury rite—was observed in England, owing to the Saxon use being prescribed for the whole southern province in 1541. The national custom differed greatly from the Roman, as in the use of red instead of violet on Sundays in Lent, and from Septuagesima to Easter, on Ash-Wednesday, Maundy-Thursdays, Good-Friday, and the Great Saturday, or Easter eve, on Sunday in Trinity, and in processions; while gold color was used instead of white on confessor's days.

"Festivals were usually distinguished by white, as emblematical of the purity of the life of saints, although sometimes by red, as symbolical of the heroism of the death of martyrs. Catechumens wore white robes during the octave after their baptism. The pope wears white; and on great days the bishop's chair was draped in white to represent divine truth. The dead were wrapped in white, in memory of our Lord's winding-sheet. Violet, mentioned by Durandus, in addition to white, red, black, and green, was used on common days, and in Advent, Lent, and on vigils, as the penitential color nearest to black. Violet, worn on Embers and vigils, being a mixture of black for sorrow and red for love, betokens penitence, grief for sins, inspired by the love of Christ. Our Lord wears violet sometimes, as a type of the Man of Sorrows. Nuns wore violet; so did Benedictine abbots until recent times, and penitents in primitive times. Violet was the color of the parchment used for church books in the time of Jerome, and at a later date. Violet typified truth, deep love, and humility. Jacinth represents Chrislian prodence: purple royalty and justice. At burials, maces for the dead, and on Good-Friday, black is worn. By the Salisbury rite, crocus or safron, gold color, is prescribed on feasts of the confessor, as emblematical of the preciousness of their faith; but at Laon on Good-Friday, in allusion to the envy of the Jews. Pale yellow, as in the dress of Judas, signifies deceit. Red, by the Salisbury rite, was enjoined on Ash-Wednesday, Sundays in Lent, and the three latter days of Holy Week, as the symbol of sin (Isaiah i. 18): as the sign of majesty and might on Sundays (Isaiah lxiii. 1); and of blood, in the commemoration of the passion, death, and burial of our crucified Lord; and so on Good-Friday at Bourges, Sens, Mans, and by the Ambrosian rite. The latter requires it also on Corpus Christi, as the great mystery of Christ's love, and, like the Church of Lyons, on the Circumcision, in memory of the first shedding of his blood, and the first act of his love; whereas the Roman use employs white on the former day, in allusion to the mystery of faith; red on Pentecost personifies the divine love of the Holy Spirit; and in funeral services of the Greeks, and the ancient rites of France, and by the pope on Good-Friday, as showing that love is the cause of their sorrow. Red is the ordinary color of the Salisbury and Ambrosian rites, as green is of the Roman. Red was used in Lent, being the vigil of the Passion, from Septuagesima to Easter eve, at Bourges, Nevers, Sens, and Mans. Black chasubles with red orphreys were used from Passion-Sunday to Easter at Paris, and at funerals in parts of Germany and Flanders. Red and white were the Dominical colors in England. Martyrs were buried in a scarlet colobium or dalmatic, the symbol of charity and blood-shedding. Blue (indicum, blodium) was worn on the Continent, like violet, on All-Saints' Day, in Advent, and on Septuagesima, and on feasts of St. Mary, as in England, in Spain, and Naples. It was probably used at Salisbury on ferials in Advent. Our Lord and the Virgin Mary wear red and blue. Blue, the color of heaven, was the emblem of piety, sincerity, godliness, contemplation, expectation, love of heavenly things."

Colossæ. We give a few additional particulars of this place from Kitt's Pict. Bible, note to Col. iv.:

"Though a town of considerable note, it was by no means the principal one of Phrygia; for when that great province was ultimately divided into Phrygia Pacatiana and Phrygia Salutaris, it ranked but as the sixth city of the former division. The town was seated on an eminence to the south of the Meander, at a place where the river Lycus began to run under ground, as it did for five furlongs, after which it again rose and flowed into the Meander. This valuable indication of the site of Colossæ, furnished by Herodotus (l. vii. c. 80), establishes the truth of the received conclusion, that the ancient city is represented by the modern village of Khonas. The approach to Khonas, as well as the village itself, is beautiful, abounding in tall trees, from which vines of most luxuriant growth are suspended. In the immediate neighborhood of the village are several vestiges of an ancient city, consisting of arches, vaults, squared stones, while the ground is strewn with broken pottery, which so generally and so remarkably indicates the sites of ancient towns in the East. That these ruins are all that now remain of Colossæ there seems no just reason to doubt."

The town now contains about four thousand inhabitants, and has a khan. The ruins, which lie three miles north of the town, are of the Roman period, but they contain no inscriptions. See Murray, Hand-book for Asia Minor, p. 326.

Colossianus. See FIRMUS.

Coloumelle, LANDULFE DE, a French chronicler, was canon of Chartres after his uncle Ralph, about 1330. He wrote a chronicle from the foundation of the world down to his own time, entitled, Breviaire Historial; twice published in full in Latin (Poitiers, 1479; Paris, eod.). Labbe printed some fragments in the first volume of his Library of Manuscripts, among others, the eulogies on Philip the Fair, king of France, and his two sons, Louis the Stubbard and Philip the Long. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Colpias (Wind) was, in Phœnician mythology, the primeval deity of the wind, who, with his wife Baan, or night, begot Æon and Protagonus, the first mortal men.

Colquhoun, James, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1635; was called to the living at Whithorn in 1664; transferred to Penningham in 1665. Having persecuted some of his parishioners, he was ousted by them in 1689, when he went to Ireland, got a benefice there, and died at an advanced age. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 743, 748.

Colquhoun, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, received a bursary of theology at the Glasgow University in 1735; was licensed to preach in 1739; presented by the king to the living at Baldernock in 1745, and ordained; and died July 21, 1772. He published a sermon in 1766, The Apostles the Light of the World. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 843.

View of Khonas, thought to be the modern representative of Colossæ.

Colquhoun, John (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Luss in January, 1748; educated at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh; licensed to preach in 1780; called to the living of St. John's, Edinburgh, in 1781, and died Nov. 27, 1827. He was never absent from his charge excepting on sacramental occasions; his duties were discharged with zeal, and his life was one of sincerity and simplicity. He wrote, A Treatise on Spiritual Comfort (1815):—On the Law and Gospel (1816):—On the Covenant of Grace (1818):—Catechism for Directing Young Communicants (1821):—On the Covenant of Works (ed.) :—View of Saving Faith (1824):—Collection of the Promises of Scripture (1825):—View of Evangelical Repentance (ed.) :—Sermons on Doctrinal Subjects (posthumous, 1836). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 109.

Colquhoun, Malcolm, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1794; appointed minister at the Gaelic chapel, Dundee, in 1796, and ordained; and died March 19, 1819, aged sixty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 700.

Colquhoun, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Argyle in 1478, and was so in 1495. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 288.

Colson, Ebenezer, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Plainfield, Mass., about 1805. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and at twenty-four entered the Oneida Conference. In 1844 he joined the Genesee Conference, in which he labored as health would permit, until his death, Dec. 16, 1864. Mr. Colson was a true man, deeply pious and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 184.

Colston, Edward, an English philanthropist, was born at Bristol, Nov. 2, 1630. Having amassed a fortune in Spanish trade, he spent nearly all of it in establishing charitable institutions, such as schools and hospitals, in Bristol and other cities of England. He died Oct. 11, 1721.

Colston, William Hungerford, D.D., a Church-of-England divine, was born in 1774. He graduated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, in 1796; was for fifty-seven years rector of West Lydford, and for the same period an active magistrate and a deputy-lieutenant of Somersetshire, and also rector of Clapton. He died at Bath, Oct. 8, 1856. See Hardwick, Annual Biography, 1856, p. 230.

Colt, Adam, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, regent in the Edinburgh University, was admitted to the living at Borthwick in 1595; presented to the new erection in 1596; transferred to Inveresk in 1597; was one of the royal commissioners, and nominated a minister for Edinburgh; was at the general assemblies of 1601 and 1602; in 1606 was selected as one of eight, for a conference at London previous to the establishment of episcopacy; detained in London ten months, then returned, and confined within his parish; resigned the charge in 1641, and died soon after his last sermon, March 24, 1643, "having much reputation for learning, wisdom, and piety; for grace and gifts, faithfulness and success." See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 266, 285, 286.

Colt, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1635; admitted to the living at Langnewton in 1642; conformed to episcopacy, and continued in February, 1665. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 486.

Colt, Milton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Oswego County, N. Y., in 1810. He received an early religious education; was converted in his twentieth year; licensed to preach in 1830, and in 1833 entered the Pittsburgh Conference. He ended his short but highly successful career Jan. 1, 1886. Mr. Colt was remarkable for his energy and piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1887, p. 484.

Colt, Oliver (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, Regent of Humanity in the Edinburgh University, was appointed to the living at Holyrood House, Edinburgh, in 1611; transferred to Foulden in 1614; presented to the vicarage of Lammerton in 1616, and died before 1630. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 88, 438.

Colt, Oliver (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1621; was licensed to preach in 1627; appointed helper to his father at the living of Inveresk in 1632, and ordained; was a member of the General Assembly in 1638; presented to the living in 1641, in succession to his father; had protection from earl Montrose during the war in 1645, and took shelter in Dundee from the invading army of England in 1651. He died Dec. 30, 1679, aged eighty-one years. He was a man of marked diligence, piety, persuasiveness, and integrity. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 286.

Coltart, James, a Scotch clergyman, tutor in the family of colonel McLean, was licensed to preach in 1810; presented to the living at Finty in 1822, and ordained; and died June 11, 1840. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 355.

Coltellini, Michele, a Ferrarese painter, flourished about 1517. His principal works are at Ferrara: in San Andrea, The Virgin and Infant, with saints; in the sacristy of the Augustines, a picture of St. Monica, with four saints of that order; and in Santa Maria, St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata.

Colton, Asa Smith, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Champion, Jefferson Co., N. Y., Oct. 26, 1804. He received his preparatory education at Guilford, and graduated at Hamilton College in 1827. He then taught one year at Freehold, N. J.; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in November, 1828, where he remained nearly two years; then studied one year with the Rev. Thomas H. Skinner, D.D., in Philadelphia; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 30, 1830, and taught three years in Philadelphia. Having united with the Protestant Episcopal Church, he was admitted to deacon's orders, Aug. 4, 1833, and ordained a presbyter, Aug. 27, 1839. He taught in Morristown, N. J., from 1834 to 1836; preached and taught in Bordentown, from 1837 to 1839; was missionary in Bucks County, Pa., in 1839 and 1840; taught privately at Gulf Mills, Montgomery Co., from 1840 to 1842; was rector of St. Andrew's Church, West Vincent, and St. Mark's, Honeybrook, both in Chester Co., from 1842 to 1845; of Christ Church, Towanda, from 1845 to 1847; at Pike, from 1847 to 1849; of St. Peter's Church, Montgomery Co., St. Paul's, Point of Rocks, and minister of Zion's Parish, Urbana, Ind., from 1849 to 1854; taught and supplied several vacant parishes at Wilmington, Del., from 1854 to 1859; and afterwards resided at Princeton, N. J., preaching occasionally until his death, Aug. 19, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 22.

Colton, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was born at Long Meadow, Mass. He graduated at Yale College in 1710; was ordained pastor of the Church at West Hartford, Feb. 24, 1713, and died March 1, 1749. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 180.

Colton, Caleb C., an English clergyman, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, and became vicar of Kew and Petersham. A passion for gaming so embarrassed him financially that he was compelled to abscond to America in 1828, to avoid his creditors. He next took up his residence at Paris, where he is said to have been very successful at play, clearing £25,000 in less than two years. The dread of an impending surgical operation unbalanced his mind, and he blew out his brains at Fontainebleau in 1832. He published, Narrative of the Sampford Ghost (1810):—Hyppocrisy, a Satirical Poem (1812):—Napoleon, a Poem (ed.) :—Lines on the Conflagration of Moscow (1816):—Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words (1820). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Colton, George, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Benjamin Colton, of West Hartford, graduated at Yale College in 1756; was ordained at Bolton, Nov. 9, 1763, and died in 1812. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 180.

Colton, Henry Martyn, a Congregational minister, was born at Royalton, N. Y. He graduated at Yale College, and remained one year after graduation, pursuing a select course in philosophy and languages. The next three years were spent in the Yale Divinity School, and in November, 1852, he was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Woodstock, Conn. In January, 1855, he removed to East Avon, and supplied the pulpit of the Congregational Church until April, 1857. In this year Mr. Colton established a classical school in Middletown, which continued for eleven years. In September, 1858, he opened the "Yale School for Boys," in New York city, and conducted it till the time of his death, June 2, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1872.

Colton, John, an English divine of the 14th century, was born at Terrington, Norfolk, and became chaplain to William Bateman, bishop of Norwich, and the first master (by appointment of the founder) of Gonville Hall, Cambridge. Leland says he was a man "plus quam mediocriter doctus et bonus," for which qualities it is presumed Henry IV promoted him to be bishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland (or, as Fuller says, correcting 'tis, this was done by Richard II). He was employed at the court of Rome in the schism between pope Urban VI and Clement VII, which occasioned the writing of his learned treatise, De Causa Schismatis, and another book as a sequel, De Remediis Eiusdem. He is supposed to have resigned his archbishopric before his death, which occurred in 1404. See Warren, De Scripturis Hibernicis, p. 129; Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 459.

Colton, Richard Francis, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, became assistant minister of the Church of the Atonement, in Philadelphia, in 1866; the following year was instructor in Hebrew in the Divinity School of that city; in 1870, retaining his place in the Divinity School, he assumed the rectorship of the Church of Our Saviour, Jenkintown, in which offices he remained until his death, in July, 1880. See Whittaker, Church Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 172.

Colton, Simeon, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Long Meadow, Mass., about 1786. He graduated from Yale College in 1806, was ordained at Palmer, June 19, 1811, and dismissed Nov. 13, 1821. For a time he was engaged in teaching at Munson, also in North Carolina, and subsequently became president of a college in one of the south-western states. See Hampden Pulpit, p. 97. (J. C. S.)

Colton, Walter, a Congregational minister, was born at Rutland, Vt., May 9, 1797. He graduated from Yale College in 1822, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1825; was ordained June 5, 1827; was professor of moral philosophy and Biblical literature at the Military Academy, Middletown, Conn., from 1825 to 1830; and editor of the American Spectator, Washington, D. C., in 1830 and 1831. In the latter year he was appointed chaplain of the navy, and ordered to the Mediterranean; while there gathered the materials for his Ship and Shore in Madeira, Lisbon, and the Mediterranean (New York, 1835); in 1835 was assigned to the naval station at Charlestown, Mass.; in 1837 edited the Colonization Herald, and in 1838 the North American, Philadelphia; in 1845 was ordered to the Pacific coast, and July 28, 1846, was appointed alcalde of Monterey, in California, by the American military authorities; established the first newspaper (Alta California), and built the first schoolhouse in California. Having returned to Philadelphia in 1849, he died there Jan. 22, 1851. His Deck and Port, and Three Years in California, were published in 1850, and a volume of Literary Remains in 1851. See Gen. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 64; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coltrin, Cyrus, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Lenox, Madison Co., N. Y., Dec. 10, 1818. He went to Illinois about 1848, having been previously ordained, and labored within the bounds of the Fox and Rock River Quarterly Meetings. In 1869 he removed to Iowa. Broken in health by hardships as an evangelist in a new and sparsely settled country, he died at Waltham, Tama Co., Sept. 13, 1872. See Morning Star, July 8, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Coltrin, Nathaniel Potter, a Congregational minister, was born at Streubenville, O., Feb. 17, 1820. He graduated from Wabash College in 1845; was a member of Lane Theological Seminary one year, in the class of 1849; was ordained (by the Illinois, now the Quincy, Association) at Mendon, Ill., Oct. 18, 1850; was acting pastor at Jacksonville, until April, 1851; at Chandlerville, and Round Prairie (now Plymouth), from 1851 to 1857; at Griggsville, from 1857 to 1861; for a short time chaplain in the army, after which he preached a year at Litchfield, having no church; from December, 1862, to May, 1864, was acting pastor at Wythe; chaplain of the 83d Regiment until December, 1865; during 1866 was without charge; and finally acting pastor at Sandoval and Clement until his death at Centralia, Dec. 26, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Colum. See STRAINER.

Colum (or Colam), is the primary form of the name which becomes also Columbus, Columbia, and, as a diminutive, Colman, Colmoc, Columban, and with the prefixes da and mo becomes Ducholmoc and Mocholmoc, or Mocholmog. See COLMAN. It appears as the proper name of Irish saints, but more or less interchangeable with the other forms.

1. Son of Aedh of Cuil-Damhain, or Cuil-Brinín, is commemorated Nov. 8 and Dec. 11.

2. Of Tirdaglas, is commemorated Dec. 18. He is often called son of Crimthainn, or of Uí Crimthainn, so that the abbots of Tirdaglas were styled the coarbs of Colum Mac-Crimthainn. He was a pupil of St. Finian at Clonard. About A.D. 548, he founded the celebrated monastery of Tirdaglas. He died, with many other saints, of the great epidemic, about A.D. 552 (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 186, 332; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 71; Butler, Lives of the Saints, xii, 269).

3. Cruimthir (priest) Colum, of Domhuach-mor Maighe Imchlaire, is commemorated June 4 in the Mart. Doneg. On this day Colgan places the Columbanus or Columba, presbyter of Kill-Ernain (in Meath, or Limerick), who is said to have been one of those who met St. Patrick as he returned from Rome, and received from him the skin to form the book-satchel, which remained in the Church of Kill-Ernain.

4. A priest of Enach, is commemorated Sept. 22. Colgan places him among the disciples of St. Columba, but this is denied by Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 141, 407).

5. Of Inis-Cealtra, is often mentioned in Irish history, but the details of his life are lost. He had his monastery on one of the islands in Lough Derg, now included in the parish of Inishcealtra, and called the island of seven churches. He died of the great epidemic A.D. 548, and is to be distinguished from St. Caimín (commemorated March 24) of the same place (O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 187).

6. Of Ros-Glanda, is commemorated Sept. 6. See COLMAN (4) son of Eochaidh.

7. Gobha (the Smith), is commemorated June 7. Colgan identifies Columbus Coiliginus (whose soul Columbus in Hy is said to have seen carried by the angels to the heavenly joys for his abundant alms to the poor) with this Colum or Columbus the Smith. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Columba (a dove) is a vessel shaped like a dove. Anciently the sacrament was reserved within a vessel of precious metal made in the form of a dove, which was suspended before the high-altar by a chain from the roof of the church. To this chain was hung a corona-like dish, basin, or disk, enclosed by other chains, on which the dove itself was placed. This vessel opened on the back; while in the body of it was formed a receptacle for the host. The custom of reserving the sacrament in such a vessel was originally common to East and West. Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, A.D. 474, left in his will a silver dove to Amalaricus, a priest. It is recorded of Basil the Great that he reserved the Lord's body in a dove made of gold. The smaller example, illustrated by the engravings here given, is from the celebrated French collection of M. le Comte de Bastard. The "peristerium," however, occurs in several old English inventories of Church ornaments. See Doves.

Figures of doves, as appropriate ecclesiastical symbols, were likewise suspended over English baptisteries, and are sometimes found carved on the canopies of fonts. As symbolic representations of the Holy Spirit, they are likewise carved over altars; and sometimes, as on the brass corona at Thame Church, Oxfordshire, they symbolize the light and glory of God. Examples of this custom are found in illuminated MSS., and such vessels exist in several foreign sacristies, though their use has lately given place to the ordinary tabernacle. See TABERNACLE.

Columba is the name of several early saints besides the bishop of Iona and the virgin martyr. See also COLUMBA.

1. Said to have flourished about A.D. 640, is often given as the first bishop of Dunkeld, and the educator of St. Cuthbert and St. Brigida (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 165). Dr. Reeves, however (Adamnan, p. 6 n., 296-298), says that the only Columba connected with Dunkeld is St. Columba of Iona, whose relics were deposited there, and who was honored as the patron saint on June 9 (Grub, Ecc. Hist. of Scotland, i, 129 sq.).

2. Another Columba was the son of the regulus or lord of Appleby, Congere, Troclyngham, and Malemath, all situated in England, who is said to have been raised from the dead, and baptized by St. Blane (q. v.). He is buried at Dunblane, Perthshire (Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 307).

Columbānus (or Colomban), Saint, was a French poet, and abbot of Trudo (St. Trond). He died about the middle of the 9th century. Among the works of Rabanus Maurus is a poem or dirge on the death of Charlemagne, written by a certain Colomban, who is supposed to have been the abbot of St. Trond. To him is also attributed the poem entitled De Origine atque Primordiis Gentis Francorum (Stirpis Carolinæ). It was written about the year 840, and dedicated to Charles the Bald, and published with the notes of Thomas Aquinas (Paris, 1644). See Histoire Littéraire de la France, iv, 422, and ix; Migne, Patrol. Lat. cvi, p. 1257.

Columbarium (so called from its resemblance to a dove-cote) was a Roman vault with recesses for the funeral ashes. It is an utterly untenable view, that this distinctively pagan arrangement, essentially belonging to the practice of burning the dead, which was held by the Christians in such abhorrence, is ever found within the limits of, or in close connection with, a Christian catacomb. The misconception has arisen from the fact that the Christian excavators in carrying forward their subterranean galleries not unfrequently came into contact with the walls of a heathen columbarium. As soon as this unintentional interference with the sanctity of the tomb was discovered, the fosses proceeded to repair their error. The gallery was abruptly closed, and a wall was built at its end to shut it off from the columbarium. Padre Marchi (Monum. Primit. p. 61) describes his discovery of a gallery in the catacombs of St. Agnes closed in this way with a ruined wall, on the other side of which was a plundered columbarium. This is probably the true explanation of the fact that a passage has been found connecting a large beathen tomb full of columbaria, on the Via Appia, near the Porta San Sebastiano, with a catacomb. See Kösteli, Bekehrth. d. Rom, p. 389; Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, p. 283.

Columbi, Dominique, a French historian and Jacobin monk, who died Oct. 6, 1696, wrote Histoire de Sainte-Madeleine (Aix, 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Columbi, Jean, a French theologian and historian of the Jesuit order, was born in 1592 at Manosque, in Provence. He was successively, in the College of Lyons, professor of rhetoric, of philosophy, of theology, and of Holy Scriptures, and died at Lyons, Dec. 11, 1679, leaving, De Rebus Gestis Episcoporum Valentianorum et Diensis (Lyons, 1638):—Quod Joannes Montlucius non fuerit Hæreticus (1640):—De Rebus Gestis Episcoporum Vicariensis (1651):—De Rebus Gestis Episcoporum Vasionensis (1656):—Commentaria in Sacram Scripturam (Lyons, 1656, vol. i):—De Rebus Gestis Episcoporum Listeriensium (1663). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Columbus, Jonas, a Swedish Protestant theologian, became pastor of Dalecarlia, made a great effort to impress with dignity the acts of worship in that province, and especially the music in the churches. He died in 1669, leaving some poems.

His son SAMUEL died July 8, 1679. He was also a poet, and a collection of his works was published by J. Kemstierna in 1687. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Columcille. See COLUMBA, Saint.

Colvener, GEORGE, a Flemish theologian, was born at Louvain in 1564. He was provost of the college and chancellor of the University of Douay, and died in 1649, leaving, Jok. Nideri Formicarium, with notes (Douay, 1602):—Chronicon Cameracense et Atrabitenae of Baleric (ibid. 1615):—Miraculorum et Exemplorum Memorabilium Libri duo, of Thomas de Cantiprè, with the life of the author (ibid. 1627):—Kalendarium S. V. Marie Novissimum (ibid. 1638). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Colver, NATHANIEL, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Orwell, Vt., May 10, 1794. He had limited facilities for obtaining an early education, but his natural endowments were such that he took an honorable position among the ministers of his denomination. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812, and for some time followed the business of tanning. After he was settled in life, his thoughts were turned towards the ministry. For several years he preached in Vermont and New York, until, in 1836, he was called to the pastoral charge at Union Village, N. Y., where he remained seven years. During this period he made for himself a high reputation, both as a preacher and an eloquent pleader for temperance and anti-slavery. In 1848 he was invited as pastor to Tremont Temple, Boston. For thirteen years he prosecuted his work with eminent success, adding constantly to his reputation as a pulpit orator and a platform speaker. Leaving Boston, he went to the West, spending a year in Detroit, then a year or two in Cincinnati, and finally taking up his residence in Chicago, where—with the exception of a short time when he had charge of the "Colver Institute," an institution at Richmond, Va., where he devoted himself to the work of preparing colored students for the ministry—he spent the remainder of his life. He died at Chicago, Dec. 25, 1870. More than sixteen hundred converts were baptized by him. (J. C. S.)

Colvill (Colville, or Colwil) is the name of a number of Scotch clergymen:

1. ALEXANDER (1), was born in 1620, near St. An-draws; became rector of the University of Edinburgh, and died there in 1676, leaving, among other works of controversy, Hudibras Ecossais, a poem in the style of Butler, directed against the Presbyterians. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

2. ALEXANDER (2), was licensed to preach in 1755; called to the living at Gask in 1763; transferred to Ormiston in 1765, and died Nov. 8, 1813. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 303; ii, 765.

3. GEORGE, D.D., studied theology in the Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1821; presented to the living at Kilwinning in 1824, and ordained; transferred to Beith in 1831, and died May 13, 1852. His son George was minister at Canonbie. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 161, 183.

4. HENRY, was presented to the parsonage and vicarage of Mukhart in 1577, and to the living at Orphir in 1580, and continued in 1595. He was "hunted to a savage death on the Noup of Nesting," July 9, 1596, and Gilbert Pacok was beheaded at the market cross, Edinburgh, for his part of the murder. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 399.

5. JOHN (1), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews about 1561; was presented to the chantry of Glasgow in 1567, and remained the minister at Kilbride when it was separated in 1569. He was accused of neglect and non-residence in 1575; deserted his charge in 1578, but on examination before the synod was acquitted. He was appointed master of requests the same year; was ambassador to queen Elizabeth in 1582; was found guilty of treason in 1584, and imprisoned in Edinburgh; afterwards restored, and named one of the lords of session in 1587, but resigned within a month. Disappointed, he joined the earl of Bothwell in his seditious practices, was driven from the kingdom, became a papist, wrote bitterly against Protestant principles, and died at Paris in November, 1605, in great want and misery. His several published works were chiefly in defence of his own erratic conduct. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 288.

6. JOHN (2), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1635; was admitted to the living at Kirknewton in 1648, and died in February, 1663, aged about forty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 142.

7. JOHN (3), A.M., was regent in the old college, St. Andrews, presented to the living at Mid-Calder in 1663, and died in 1671, aged about forty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 176.

8. PATRICK, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1629; was appointed to the living at Beith in 1645, and ordained; was a member of the General Assembly in 1648; was appointed, in 1654, one of those for authorizing admissions to the ministry; elected moderator of the synod in 1661, which was the last meeting they held previous to the re-establishment of the presbytery after the Revolution. He was a very learned and good man, and died in May, 1662, aged about fifty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 159.

9. ROBERT (1), became minister at Culross in 1593; was one of the forty who, in 1606, consulted about holding the assembly at Aberdeen against the king's authority; signed, with forty-one others, a protest to parliament against the introduction of Episcopacy, and was one of the fifty-five who petitioned parliament in behalf of the liberties of the Kirk in 1617. He continued in 1629 with an assistant, and died in 1680. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 584.

10. ROBERT (2), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1682; was appointed to the living at Barra in 1694; transferred to Glenluce in 1698; resigned in July, 1714, and retired to Stranraer, where he died, June 6, 1729, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 334, 766.

11. ROBERT (3), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1691; became schoolmaster at Jedburgh, and was licensed to preach there in 1695; admitted to the living at Annan in 1696, and ordained; transferred to Yetholm in 1699, and died before March 2, 1731, aged about sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 477, 613.

12. ROBERT (4), was licensed to preach in 1758; presented to the second charge at Dysart the same year, and ordained. A libel was charged against him, to part of which he confessed, and for which he was suspended in 1784, but allowed an assistant. He died Jan. 23, 1788. He published, Britain, a poem (1757):—Caledonium Heroine, a poem (1771):—Atalanta, a poem (1777):—The Downfall of the Papal Confederacy (1788):—Poetical Works (1789, 2 vols.):—Savannah, a poem (1793):—To the Memory of the Hon. William Leslie, a poem:—Extracts from Synod Sermon, etc. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 538.

13. WILLIAM (1), brother of lord Colvill, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1617; was elected minister of Cramond in 1635; changed to the second charge at Greyfriars in 1638; was a member of the General Assembly the same year; promoted to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1639; the same year sent by the Covenanters to the king of France to solicit his aid against the despotic actions of Charles I. He and his papers were seized in England, and he was imprisoned, till released in 1640 by the Scottish army. When the Tron Church was made a new parish, in 1641, he was appointed the first incumbent. In 1645 he obtained protection from the marquis of Montrose, for which he was suspected of treason, in 1648 suspended, and deposed in 1649. In 1652 he was made a prisoner, but was restored to the ministry in 1654; appointed to the Collegiate Church at Perth in 1655; refused a bishopric, and was promoted to the principalship of Edinburgh University in 1662. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 31, 55, 133; ii, 615.

14. WILLIAM (2), took his degree at Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1821; presented to the living at Eaglesham in 1829, and ordained. He died March 12, 1859, aged fifty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 66.

Colvin, ROBERT, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Sanquhar, was tutor in the family of Hope Johnston; was licensed to preach in 1805; presented to the living at Johnston in 1808, and ordained in 1809. He died Sept. 4, 1851, aged seventy-two years. He left two sons, Walter, minister of Cramond, and Robert Francis, minister of Kirkpatrick-Juxta. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 651.

Colvius, Andrew, a Protestant divine, was born at Dort in 1594. He became minister of several Walloon churches, and at length of that in Dort; and in 1620 went to Venice as chaplain to Paul Sarpi, whose work on the Inquisition he translated into Latin (Rotterdam, 1651). He died in 1671. He was an industrious writer in some branches of science, philosophy, and poetry, and published, in 1655, a Catalogus Musæi Andree Colvii.

Colvius, Nicholas, son of the foregoing, was born in 1634, became co-pastor at Dort in 1655, afterwards pastor at Amsterdam, and died in 1717.

Colwell, Charles, an English Methodist preacher, was a native of Cornwall. He entered the English Wesleyan ministry in 1810, became a supernumerary at Falmouth in 1837, removed to Helstone, Cornwall, in 1838, and died June 20, 1860, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Colwell, John W., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born about 1810. He was ordained at Rochester, Mass., Sept. 3, 1841, and was pastor there four years; at Charlestown and Richmond, R. I., in 1846. During the next five years he organized a Church at Cranston. He died April 26, 1852, on board the steamer off the coast of Mexico, near Acapulco. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1853, p. 87.

Colymbion (κολύμβιον) is a vessel used for containing holy water (q. v.) at the entrance of a church. A representation of such a vessel is found in one of the mosaics of the Church of San Vitale at Ravenna, and is here engraved. It is noteworthy that the aspergillum which hangs from the arch above the basin is in shape not unlike those of modern times (Neale, Eastern Church, introduction, p. 215).

Colymbion.

Colyna, DAVID, a Dutch painter, was born at Amsterdam about 1650. There are two very highly esteemed pictures by him, at Amsterdam, representing the Israelites Fed with Manna, and Moses Striking the Rock. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Comaigh (Lat. Comagia), a virgin, is commemorated as an Irish saint May 27. She was the daughter of Eochaidh. Her mother was Aiglema. She had a monastery at Suamhluthair, and also her brother, Colman (q. v.) (Reeves, Adamnam, p. 172 sq.).

Coman (or Comman), son of Ernan, is commemorated as an Irish saint March 18. He was a brother of Cummin Finn, abbot of Hy. He went to Hy as a monk, and was alive in the time of St. Adamnan. His church is Kilchoman, in the Rinn of Islay. The date of his death is unknown.

Comande, FRANCESCO, a Sicilian painter, was born at Messina about 1580, studied under Dendato Guinaccia, and painted in conjunction with his brother, Giovanni Simone. His best pictures are, The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew, in the church of that saint at Messina, and The Adoration of the Magi, in the monastery of Basico. See Spooner, Biog. History of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comasius was a rhetor in the 5th century, who turned monk, and still continued in the monastery collecting "the rubbish" of classical Greek literature, for which he is severely rebuked by Nilus (Epist. ii, 78, p. 153; ii, 257, p. 261).

Comb, ECCLESIASTICAL. A comb of ivory or precious metal, with which the first tonsure was made and the hair was arranged in the sacristy, was one of the ornaments found in ancient sacristies for the practical use of the clergy. Each cleric had his own. The comb was usually buried with the priest on his decease. St. Cuthbert's, of ivory, found in his tomb when opened, remains in the library of Durham Cathedral, and St. Loup's, of the 12th century, at Sens. The latter is jewelled and has symbolical animals. See IVORIES.

Comb, GEORGE, an English Baptist minister, was born at Edinburgh, Feb. 12, 1782. At the age of twenty-six he was converted, and united with the Church at Guildford. He studied for the ministry, in due time took charge of a new Church at Horsell Common, and in 1823 accepted a call to Oxford Street, London, where he remained until his death, Feb. 20, 1841. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1841, p. 37. (J. C. S.)

Combadaurus, a deity of the eastern Asiatics, was a bonze, or Indian priest, while living.

Combalot, THÉODORE, a famous Roman Catholic preacher of France, was born at Châtenay, in the Isère Department, Aug. 21, 1798. At the age of twenty-three he received holy orders, and pope Gregory XVI, before whom he once preached, appointed him apostolic vicar. For a number of years he acted as vicar-general of Rouen, Arras, and Montpellier, and died suddenly at Paris, March 19, 1873. He wrote, Éléments de Philosophie Catholique (Paris, 1833):—La Connaissance de Jésus-Christ (1841; 4th ed. 1852):—Mémoire Adressé aux Evêques de France, etc. (1844), for which he was imprisoned for thirty days:—Conférences sur les Grands de la Sainte-Vierge (1845):—Lettre à M. Guizot, etc. (1858). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Vapereau, Dict. des Contemporains, s. v. (B. P.)

Combé, MARIE MAGDALEINE de Cyz de, a Dutch nun, was born at Leyden in 1656. She was brought up in the Calvinistic belief, and at the age of nineteen married a wealthy gentleman of Holland, Adrian de Combé, from whom she soon afterwards separated. She went to France, joined the Catholics, and by the aid of the abbot, La Hermondieu, rector of St. Sulpicius, obtained a pension of two hundred pounds. In 1686 she formed a religious community called Le Bon Pasteur, which the king took under his protection. The order spread through the province, and was confirmed by letters-patent in 1698, after the death of its founder, which occurred at Paris, June 16, 1692. Boileau published a Vie de Madame Combé (Paris, 1700, 1732). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Comber, Thomas (1), D.D., an English divine, uncle of the dean of Durham, was born in Sussex, Jan. 1, 1575, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow, October, 1597. He was preferred to the deanery of Carlisle in August, 1630, and made master of Trinity College in October, 1631. In 1642 he was imprisoned, plundered, and deprived of all his preferments. He died at Cambridge, in February, 1653.

Comber, Thomas (2), an English clergyman, great-grandson of the dean of Durham, was rector of Oswaldkirk, Yorkshire. He published, Memoir of the Life and Writings of Dean Comber (1779):—Sermons (1807):—History of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew (1810):—Adultery Analyzed (ed.):—A Scourge for Adulterers, Duellists, Gamesters, and Self-murderers (anon., ed.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Combes, Andrew J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Indiana, Nov. 12, 1845. He lived successively in Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska; was converted in 1865, licensed to preach in 1872, and in 1875 entered the Nebraska Conference, wherein he labored heroically until his death, in 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 61.

Combes, Francisco, a Spanish Jesuit and traveller, was born at Saragossa in 1613. He was sent to the Philippine Islands to propagate the Catholic faith. On his way to Rome to represent his province, he died at Acapulco, in 1663, leaving, in Spanish, a History of the Islands of Mindanao (Madrid, 1667). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Combet, CLAUDE, a French Dominican, was born at Lyons in 1614. He was bachelor of the University of Paris, and became a famous preacher. He died at Lyons in 1689, leaving, Oraison Funèbre de Louis XIII (Lyons, 1643):—Oraison Funèbre de la Reine Anne d'Autriche (Vannes, 1666). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Combonus, HIKRONYMUS, an Italian Hebraist, lived in the early part of the 17th century. He belonged to the order of Observantists, and was professor of Hebrew at Bergamo. He wrote, Compendium in quo Quidquid ad Hebræicam Linguam Legendam Pertinet Continetur (Bergamo, 1616). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comdhan. See COMGAN; CONGAN.

Come, Saint. See COSMAS.

Comegern was eighth bishop of Llandaff, contemporary with Ywyr, king of Gwynedd (Stubbs, Register, p. 156).

Comeiras, VICTOR Delpuech de, a French ecclesiastic and geographer, was born at St. Hippolyte-du-Gard, Sept. 11, 1733. He was abbot of Sylvaën, and vicar-general of Beauvais, but was deprived of his position at the Revolution, and died at Paris, March 29, 1805. He wrote vols. xxii-xxxii of L'Abbrégé de l'Histoire Générale des Voyages (Paris, 1780-1801; vols. i-xx were published by La Harpe):—La Voix du Sage (ibid. 1799):—Histoire de l'Astronomie, transl. from Bailly (ibid. 1806). Other writings remain in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Comès. See LEXICONARY.

Comestor (or le Mangeur, i. e. devourer of books), PIERRE, a French theologian, was born at Troyes. He was successively canon and dean of Troyes, then, in 1164, chancellor of the Church of Paris and master of the school of philosophy. He gave up his benefices in order to become canon-regular of St. Victor at Paris. At his death, which occurred in that city Oct. 21, 1198 (others say 1178 or 1185), he left all his goods to the poor. He wrote, among other works, Scholastica Historiæ super Novum Testamentum (written before 1176, and published at Kentling, 1471; Utrecht, 1478; Strasburg, 1483, 1502; Basle, 1486; Paris, 1513; Hagenau, 1519; Lyons, 1526; Venice, 1728; transl. into French in 1494 by Guyart des Moulins, under the title: La Bible Historie; Paris, without date, with engravings):—Catena Temporum (transl. into Gothic-French by Jehan de Rely, under the title, Mer des Histoires; Paris, 1488):—Sermones, under the name of Pierre de Blois (Mayence, 1600, 1605; Lyons, 1677, and often since). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Comfort, David, a Presbyterian minister, a graduate of Princeton, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1798, and soon after became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Kingston, N. J., where he labored during a long life. From 1816 till his death, in 1853, he was a trustee of Princeton College. Mr. Comfort was honored and beloved by all. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Comfort, David D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was received on trial in the North Mississippi Conference in 1880, and died in September, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 104.

Comfort, Silas, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Deer Park, Orange Co., N. Y., May 18, 1803. He was converted at the age of nine, became a class-leader at eighteen, a travelling preacher at twenty, and in 1827 entered the Genesee Conference. Then began in earnest his student life, studying on horseback, by torchlight, amid the confusion of families, always rising at four o'clock. Thus the dead languages, science, general literature, Biblical criticism, and systematic theology were thoroughly explored by him. During his forty-five years in the ministry he served sixteen years as presiding elder, wrote several valuable volumes, and contributed largely to the first periodicals of the Church. In 1835 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference, returned to the Oneida Conference seven years later, and in it labored until his sudden death, Jan. 10, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 105; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Comfort, William C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, received an early religious training, was converted at the age of twenty, and, after exercising his talents as a local preacher a short time, was admitted into the Michigan Conference, wherein he labored many years faithfully until his death, June 15, 1862. Mr. Comfort was a man of decided opinions and uncompromising integrity. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 206.

Comfortable Words, THE. A modern feature in the existing Anglican form for the celebration of the holy communion, first introduced in the second prayer-book of Edward VI., A.D. 1552, consisting of four texts of Scripture, which the priest is directed to address to the people. These words follow the absolution, and precede the preface.

Comforted, THE, one of the two classes (the consolati or comforted, and the federati or confederated) into which the Manichæan congregations were anciently divided. See MANICHÆISM. The Albigenses (q. v.) classified their people in precisely the same way, and the comforted led a life of celibacy and strict austerity.

Comgall (or Congall) is the name of several early Irish saints:

1. An abbot of Bangor, commemorated May 10. He was one of the most prominent leaders of monasticism in Ireland, and is said to have had three thousand monks under him at one time in various affiliated houses. His parents were Setna or Sedna, and Brig or Briga, and he was born about A.D. 517. After teaching for some years, he founded, in 558, his great monastery at Bangor, County Down, Ireland, to which multitudes flocked. Comgall drew up for it and kindred institutions a rule which was one of the most famous in Ireland. His most noted disciples at Bangor were Cormac, son of Diarmaid and king of South Leinster, and St. Columbanus (q. v.). While on a visit to Scotland, he founded a monastery in Heth. Comgall died at Bangor on May 10, 602, and was buried there. In 824 the Danes plundered the city and abbey, and, breaking open his shrine, scattered the contents to the four winds (see Reeves, Eccl. Hist. p. 93-95, 152-154, and Adamnan, p. 213, 317; Usher, Eccl. Antiq. c. 17, in Works, vi, 473 sq.). Comgall is commemorated in the Scotch calendars, but Camerarius places him on Jan. 2, and suggests a Scotch Bangor. See Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, c. 10; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Down. p. 123; Butler, Lives of the Saints, v, 195 sq.; Forbes, Kul. of Scott. Saints, p. 108-110.

2. Son of Eochaidh, commemorated Sept. 4. His monastery was at Both-conais, in Inis-Eoghann. He is said to have received this monastery from St. Cíanan of Duleek. He belongs to the 8th century (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Down. p. 237; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, i, 845; iii, 162).

3. Of Gobhail-linin, commemorated July 28. His monastery was at what is now Galloon. On July 27, Butler (Lives of the Saints, vii, 425) gives a short memoir of St. Congall, abbot of Jabhualhini.

Comgan (Comdhan, or Comman) is the name of two early Irish saints:

1. Of Cluain-Connaidh, commemorated Oct. 13. There is a St. Comganus named among the relatives of St. Columba, who is supposed to be the same as this Comgan. See CONGAN.

2. Of Glenn-Uissen, commemorated Feb. 27. He was the son of Diarmaid, and his mother was Ethne. He founded a monastery in his native province at Ceauw-india, and succeeded St. Diarmaid in the government of the monastery at Glenn-Uissen. He died about A.D. 569, it is supposed (Lanigan, Eccl. History of Ireland, ii, 78 sq.; Reeves, Adamnan, lxx, note).

Comi, GIROLAMO, a painter of Modena, flourished about 1550. He painted sacred subjects, and was much employed by the churches in ornamental work. One of his pictures in San Michele at Bosco is dated 1568. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comiers, CLAUDE, a learned French mathematician, was born at Embrun. He was canon there, provost of the chapter of Ternant, doctor of theology, and apostolic protonotary; also professor of mathematics at Paris, and was considered an able physician and chemist. He had contributed to the Journal des Savants from 1676 to 1678, and had invented several curious machines. Having become blind in 1690, he entered the hospital of Quinze-Vingts, where he took the title of aveugle royal because he had a pension from the king. He died at Paris in October, 1693, leaving La Nouvelle Science de la Nature des Comètes (Lyons, 1665):—Instruction pour Reunir les Églises Prétendues Réformées à l'Église Romaine (Paris, 1678):—Traité des Langues et Écritures (in the Mercure of Sept., Oct. 1684, and Feb. 1685):—Traité des Prophéties (ibid. of Aug., Sept., Dec. 1689, and Sept. 1690):—Lettre à une Dame Nouvellement Convertie à la Religion Catholique (ibid. of Dec. 1691), and many other pieces. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Comin (or Cumin). See COMYN.

Comingo, HENRY G., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Harrodsburg, Ky., Feb. 2, 1809. He was carefully reared by Christian parents; graduated from Centre College, Danville, in 1832; studied two years (1833-34) in Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed in 1836 by the New Brunswick Presbytery, and became pastor, May 24, 1837, in Steubenville, O., where he labored until the close of his life, Dec. 1, 1861. He was a living Christian and an earnest minister of the gospel. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 155.

Comingoe, BRUN ROMCAS, a German Reformed minister, was a native of Germany. He was pastor at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, for forty-nine years, from 1770. Old age and ill-health caused him to resign in 1819. He returned to Germany soon after, and nothing more was heard of him. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 159.

Comitibus, BLAISEUS DE, an Italian theologian, was born at Milan. He was a Minorite, and for fifteen years regent of the order at Prague; then director of the grand seminary, and theologian to the archbishop. He died at Prague in 1685, leaving De Deo Trino et Uno (Prague, 1682):—De Intellectu, Scientia, Providentia, Prædestinatione et Reprobatione (ibid.):—De Creatione, Statu Innocentie, Angelis, etc. (ibid. 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comitin, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French theologian of the Jesuit order, who lived in the latter part of the 17th century, wrote Défense de l'Honneur des Saints (Dijon, 1657):—Initium Sapientie et Finis, Timor et Amor Dei (Châlons, 1662, 1672):—Selectæ de Fide Controversiæ (about 1666). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comitolo, NEAPOLIO, an Italian prelate, was born at Perugia in 1544, of the family of the counts of Colle-Mezzo. He at first followed the profession of law, but afterwards obtained an abbey, and became auditor of the Rota; was appointed bishop of Perugia in 1591, founded a college and several religious societies, and died there, Aug. 24, 1624, leaving, in Latin, a History of the Bishops of Perugia, a collection of the decisions of the tribunal of the Rota, and some liturgical works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comitolo, PAOLO, an Italian theologian of the same family as the foregoing, was born at Perugia in 1545. He was not more than fourteen years of age when he became a Jesuit, and later one of the best casuists of that society. He taught successively rhetoric, the Sacred Scriptures, and moral theology. He died at Perugia, Feb. 18, 1626. His principal works are Catena Illustratum Authorum in Librum Job (transl. from the Greek, Lyons, 1586; Venice, 1587):—Consilia seu Responsa Moralia (Lyons, 1609):—Doctrina de Contractu Universi (ibid. 1615). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comman is a not uncommon name among the Irish saints, and is often exchanged with Colman, Comgan, Coemán.

1. Muc Va Theimhne, commemorated Feb. 27. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 417) distinguishes "St. Comgan Hua-Teanne" from St. Comgan of Glenn-uiseen, who is commemorated on the same day, and gives from the Irish Annals the date of the former's death as A.D. 663. O'Donovan thinks he was the brother of Muirchu Maccuthennuis, who wrote a life of St. Patrick from the dictation of Aidus, bishop of Sletty, and if so he may have been the son of Cogitonus (q. v.).

2. Of Roscommon (Ross-Commain), commemorated Dec. 26. It is thought he died A.D. 742. He is said to have been of the race of Irial, son of Connall Cearnach. He wrote a monastic rule, and in the Annals, about the year 790, there is mention made of the promulgation of "the law of St. Coman" throughout the three divisions of Connaught (O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 343, 349, 395; Todd and Reeves, Murt. Doneg. p. 849; Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, ii, 225; iii, 177).

Commandery (commendat, a benefice), or Preceptory (præceptio, a first share), is a cell of the Templars and Hospitallers for collecting demesne-rents, and a home for veteran members of those orders. The president paid himself first his own pension, and then accounted for the residue. These houses remain at Swingfield, Cliburn, and Worcester.

Commâtrès is a term sometimes used in ancient writers to denote sponsors in baptism.

Commemoration, in its liturgical use, designates:

1. The recitation of the names of those for whom intercession is made in the mass. See DIRTYCH.

2. The introduction of the names of certain saints or events in the divine office. Such commemorations are generally of the cross, of the Virgin Mary, of St. Peter and St. Paul, and for peace.

3. According to the rubrics of the Roman breviary, when a greater festival falls on the day of a "simple" festival, the latter is "commemorated" by the introduction of certain portions of its proper service into that of the greater festival.

4. In the Church of England "commemoration" takes place when two festivals concur, and the office for the greater is used, while the collect only of the lesser is said; or when a festival coincides with a greater Sunday; or a festival of the second class falls on a greater week-day, and the same rule is observed. In Lent, Advent, on ember-days, and greater ferias, a special collect is used.

Commemoration-day, in the University of Oxford, is an annual solemnity in remembrance of the founders and benefactors of the university, when speeches are made, prize compositions recited, and honorary degrees conferred upon distinguished persons. In colleges a form of prayer, prescribed in queen Elizabeth's reign, is used during term, in pious memory of founders and benefactors. The proper Psalms are cxlv, cxlvi, cxlvii; the lesson, Ecclesiasticus xlv. The suffrage is:

"The just shall be had in everlasting remembrance;
He shall not be afraid of evil tidings.
The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God;
Neither doth any torment touch them."

Then follows a collect. At Oxford the commemoration by the university is also called encomium.

Commemoration of the Departed is the solemn remembrance of the faithful in Christ who have passed from hence with the sign of faith, and now rest in the sleep of peace. A prayer substantially containing such a commemoration is found in every ancient liturgy. Prayer for the dead has been pronounced legal by the highest ecclesiastical court in England, but is a relic of Romanism.

Commenda. See DIOCESE; MONASTERY.

Commendatio (παράδοσις), i. e. collect. (1) In the third Council of Carthage it is provided that if a commendatio of the dead takes place in the afternoon, it must consist of prayers only, without the celebration of mass. In the African code, the set forms to be ordinarily used in churches seem to be summed up under the heads preces, præfationes, commendationes, manus impositiones.

(2) But the word παράδοσις is also used to designate the prayers made in the congregation on behalf of the catechumens. Alexius Aristenus (quoted by Suicer, s. v.) explains it, when designating a part of divine service, as "the prayers over the catechumens, whereby we commend them to the Lord."

Commendation is (1) the act of commending: a favorable representation in words; (2) the act of commending the dying to the mercy and favor of God.

Commendatory is one having the grant of a benefice in trust for life, and enjoying the revenues.

Commendatory Letters. The earliest trace of the practice connected with these words is to be found in 2 Cor. iii, 1. St. Paul, it would seem, had been taunted by rivals, who came with letters of commendation (ἐπιστολαὶ συστατικαὶ) from the Church of Jerusalem with the absence of such credentials in his own case, with his attempts to make up for the omission by reiterated self-commendation. The passage shows the practice was already common, and, of course, necessary. Letters of this kind may have been in previous use among the Jews, and thus helped to maintain their unity as a people through all the lands of the dispersion. Other instances of it in the apostolic ages are to be found in the letter given to Apollos by the disciples at Ephesus (Acts xviii, 27), in the mention of Zenas and Apollos in the Epistle to Titus (iii, 18). The letter to Philemon, though more distinctly personal, has somewhat of the same character. The practice became universal, and it may be said, without exaggeration, that no single practice of the early Christian Church tended so much as this to impress on it the stamp of unity and organization. The bishop of any congregation, in any part of the empire, might commend a traveller, layman, or cleric to the good offices of another. The precautions against imposture might sometimes, as in the instance of Peregrinus, told by Lucian—perhaps also in that of the "false brethren" of Gal. ii, 4—be insufficient, but, as a rule, it did its work, and served as a bond of union between all Christian churches.

Those outside the Church's pale, however arrogant might be their claims, could boast of no such proof of their oneness. They were cut off from what was in the most literal sense of the term the "communion of saints." It was the crowning argument of Augustine and Optatus against the Donatists that their letters would not be received in any churches but their own; that they were therefore a sect with no claim to catholicity, no element of permanence. When Paul of Samosata was deposed by the so-called second council of Antioch, the bishops who passed sentence on him wrote to Dionysius of Rome and Maximus of Alexandria, requesting them not to address their letters to him, but to Domnus, whom they had appointed in his place. The letter of Cyprian on the election of Cornelius and that to Stephen are examples of the same kind. The most remarkable testimony, however, to the extent and the usefulness of the practice is found in the wish of Julian to reorganize heathen society on the same plan, and to provide, in this way, shelter and food for any non-Christian traveller who might be journeying to a strange city (Sozomen, H. E. v, 16).

As the Church became wealthier and more worldly, the restrictive side of the practice became the more prominent; it was then what the passport system has been in the intercourse of modern Europe, a check on the free movement of clergy, or monks, or laymen. Thus it was made penal (and the penalty was excommunication) for any one to receive either cleric or layman who came to a city not his own without these letters. Those who brought them were even then subject to a scrutiny, with the alternative of being received into full fellowship if it were satisfactory, or, if it were otherwise, of having to be content with some immediate relief. So the Council of Elvira seeks to maintain the episcopal prerogative in this matter, and will not allow litterae confessoriae (letters certifying that the bearer was one who had suffered in persecution) to take the place of the regular commendatory letters. It would appear that the abuse had spread so far that the "confessor's" passport was handed from one to another without even the insertion of the name, as a check payable to bearer. The Council of Chalcedon renewed the prohibition of the apostolic canon against allowing any strange cleric, even as reader, to officiate in another city without the "commendatory letters" from his own bishop. That of Antioch (A.D. 341) makes special restrictions in regard to the various kinds of letters. That of Arles places those who have received commendatory letters under the surveillance of the bishop of the city to which they go, with the provision that they are to be excommunicated if they begin "to act contrary to discipline," and extends the precaution to political offences, or to the introduction of a democratic element into the government of the Church. The system spread its ramifications over all provinces. It was impossible for the presbyter who had incurred the displeasure of his bishop to find employment in any other diocese. Without any formal denunciation the absence of the commendatory letter made him a marked man. The unity of the Church became a terrible reality to him.

It will have been noticed that other terms appear as applied to these letters, and it may be well to register the use and significance of each.

1. The old term was still retained, as in the Council of Chalcedon, where the prominent purpose was to commend the bearer of the letter, whether cleric or layman, to the favor and good offices of another bishop.

2. The same letters were also known as "canonical" "in accordance with the rule of the Church." This is the word used in the letter from the synod of Antioch, by the councils of Antioch and Laodicea. The Latin equivalent seems to have been the littera formata, i.e. drawn up after a known and prescribed form, so as to be a safeguard against imposture. It was stated at the Council of Chalcedon by Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, that it was agreed by the bishops at the councils of Nicæa that every such letter should be marked with certain letters, in honor of the three Persons of the Trinity. In the West the signature or seal of the bishop was probably the guarantee of genuineness. The first mention of the use of a seal-ring occurs, it is believed, in Augustine.

3. From the use of the letters as admitting clergy or laymen to communion they were known as communicatoria in Latin, and by a Greek equivalent.

4. The littera pacifica appear to commend the bearer for eleemosynary aid. They are to be given to the poor and those who need help, clerics or laymen; especially, according to the Greek canonists, to those who had suffered oppression at the hands of civil magistrates. The word is used also by the Council of Antioch, as applied to letters which might be given by presbyters as well as bishops.

5. There were "letters dimissory," like those of modern times. The word is of later use than the others, and occurs first in the council in Trullo, in a context which justifies the distinction drawn, that it was used in reference to a permanent settlement of the bearer, "commendatory," when the sojourn in another diocese was only temporary.

Commendatory Prayer is a name given to the thanksgiving offered by the bishop in the early Church near the close of the morning service. It is called εὐχαριστία ὁρθρινή (morning thanksgiving), and is in these words: "O God, the God of spirits and of all flesh, with whom no one can compare, whom no one can approach, that givest the sun to govern the day, and the moon and the stars to govern the night; look down now upon us with the eyes of thy favor, and receive our morning thanksgivings, and have mercy upon us. For we have not spread forth our hands to any strange god; for there is not any new god among us, but thou, our eternal and immortal God, who hast given us our being through Christ, and our well-being through him also. Vouchsafe by him to bring us to everlasting life; with whom unto thee be glory, honor, and adoration, in the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."—Bingham, Antiq. bk. xiii, ch. x, § vii.

Commentaries, BIBLICAL. We supplement our article on this subject, in vol. ii, by a notice of the principal expository works that have appeared later.

Lange's Bibeleck, as translated and augmented by the various (chiefly American) scholars, under the general supervision of Dr. Schaff, covers the entire Bible, including the Apocrypha, in twenty-five large octavo volumes, and is the most complete thesaurus of exegetical, critical, doctrinal, and practical comment extant. The additions by the American editors have greatly enhanced its value.

Keil and Delitzsch on the entire Old Test. (transl. in Clark's Foreign Theological Library, Edinb. 25 vols. 8vo) is, on the whole, the best simply exegetical commentary for scholars. The authors have shrunk from no difficulty, but have met every question in a careful, evangelical, and earnest spirit; and have brought to their task the ripest fruits of learning. Their readers, of course, will not agree with them on every point, but they will have reason to weigh well their judgment and their arguments. There is promise of a continuation of the work into the New Test. Delitzsch has published notes on Hebrews (transl. likewise by the Messrs. Clark), and Keil has begun his comments on the Gospels. For the present, however, their work must be supplemented by Meyer on the New Test. (likewise in an English dress, by the Messrs. Clark of Edinb., 20 vols. 8vo, not embracing Rev.). This is perhaps, on the whole, the best exegetical manual for scholars on the New Test., being accurate, moderately rationalistic, and sufficiently copious for most purposes.

The Bible Commentary, or, as it is generally designated, The Speaker's Commentary (republished by the Scribners, N. Y. 10 vols. 8vo), is peculiarly available for both scholars and ordinary readers, as it embraces a large amount of valuable exposition in a comparatively small compass. It is especially good on archaeological questions; is eminently conservative, and particularly commendable for its brief but excellent introductions to the several books.

Wordsworth (The Holy Bible, with Notes, together with his Greek Testament, with Notes, covering, together, the entire canonical Scriptures [Lond. 1856-64, and several later editions, 10 vols. imperial 4to]) is throughout sound and judicious; suggestive but not exhaustive; scholarly rather than profound.

The Pulpit Commentary, by a number of English scholars (similar in this respect to The Bible Commentary above, but more practical and copious), of which about twenty volumes, octavo, have already appeared, and which is intended to cover the whole Bible, has many excellent features, happily combining sound learning and practical piety. It is adapted to general readers.

The Cambridge Bible is a series of small volumes for popular use (especially schools), and yet containing the results of the latest criticisms and researches, prepared by various English divines, and edited by dean Perowne, a large portion of which has already been issued.

Whedon's Commentary is intended for English readers, especially Sunday-school teachers, and is admirably pithy and suggestive. The New-Test. part (N. Y. and Lond. 5 vols. 12mo) has lately been completed by Dr. Whedon himself, and the Old Test. has been intrusted to various scholars, who have already issued three volumes in similar style, and are expected to finish the work in five volumes more.

Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown have combined in a practical commentary on the entire Scriptures, which has been published in several forms in Scotland, and reprinted in Philadelphia in one thick volume. The annotations are brief, but spiritual, and well adapted to ordinary readers.

Cowles has prepared a very judicious series of notes on all the Biblical books (N. Y. 16 vols. 12mo), for pastors, teachers, and general readers.

Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus, together with his Words of the Angels, covers many very important passages of the New Test., and is an almost unique specimen of exhaustive comment in the most evangelical and practical spirit. The whole has been republished by Tibbals & Son, New York, in three compact octavo volumes, with valuable improvements from Clark's translation out of the original German.

Ellicott's Commentary for English Readers (of which the New-Test. portion, prepared by various eminent British clergymen, has appeared in London in three super-royal octavo volumes; and of which the Old Test. is in course of publication on a similar plan) is delightfully fresh and instructive.

Dr. Schaff is also editing an elegantly illustrated commentary on the New Test., prepared by able American scholars, several volumes of which have already appeared, giving the results of criticism and explorations in a popular form.

The issue of the Anglo-American Revised New Test., recently followed by the revised version of the Old Test., has given a powerful stimulus to Bible study, and the International Sunday-school Series of lessons has wonderfully aided in the same direction, especially the comments thereon abundantly issued in books and periodicals.

Among recent expositions on particular books of the Bible, available in an English dress for scholars, we notice as specially valuable, Ellicott's admirable notes on the Pastoral Epistles of Paul (reprinted in 2 vols. 8vo, at Andover); Murphy, on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, and the Psalms (reprinted, ibid.); Godet, on Luke, John, and Romans (transl. in Clark's Foreign Evangelical Library, Edinb.); Luthardt, on John's Gospel (ibid.); Haupt, on 1 John (ibid.); Philippi, on Romans (ibid.); Gloag, on the Acts (ibid.); Glasgow, on Revelations (ibid.); Lightfoot, on the Pauline Epistles (Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, already issued by Macmillan, Lond.); Eadie, on Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Thessalonians (Lond. and Edinb., in part reprinted by Carter, N. Y.); Hodge, on Romans (new ed. Phila. 1871), Corinthians, and Ephesians; Turner, on Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and Hebrews (N. Y. 1852-56); Demarest, on Peter (ibid. 1851-62); Hackett, on the Acts (new ed. Bost. 1858); Perowne, on the Psalms (new ed. Lond. 1870); Gardner, on Jude (Bost. 1856); Moore, on Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (N. Y. ed.); Wright, on Ecclesiastes (Lond. 1888).

An excellent and discriminating review of exegetical writers, in past and recent times, may be found in Terry's Biblical Hermeneutics (N. Y. 1888), p. 608-788.

Commentators, ANCIENT. See INTERPRETATION, BIBLICAL.

Commerce, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF. It would be difficult to find in the Bible a passage that disparages trade, whether with or without a handicraft. In the Old Testament as the calling of Bezaleel and Aholiab puts the highest honor on the skill of the artisan, so the ordinary processes of trade are no less sanctified by connecting them with God and his law (Lev. xix, 35, 36; Deut. xxv, 18-19; Prov. xl, 1; xvi, 10, 28; xxxi, 24; Micah. vi, 11). Nor is it amiss to observe that the Jewish custom, still prevalent, of bringing up every boy, without exception, to a business, trade, or handicraft, appears to be immemorial, and may serve to explain both the calling by our Lord of fishermen as apostles, and his own training as a carpenter (Mark vi, 3), as well as the tent-making of Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla (Acts xviii, 3). No incompatibility, therefore, between the exercise of a trade and the Christian calling, whether among the laity or the clergy, can be coeval with the Church, and all legislation to this effect must belong to what may be termed the secondary, not the primary, era of its development. The places in which the gospel seems to have preferably taken root were busy commercial cities, such as Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus. The age in which Christianity forced itself on the notice of the pagan world, and was honored with imperial persecution, the time of Nero, was also one of great commercial activity. Under the later emperors trade was looked upon as an occupation of inferior dignity. A constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (A.D. 436) required all bankers, jewellers, dealers in silver or clothing, apothecaries, and other traffickers to be removed from provincial offices, "in order that every place of honor and official service (militia) should be cleared of the like contagion." Traders generally, except the metropolitan bankers, were again excluded from the militia by a constitution of Justin. Soldiers, conversely, were, by a constitution of Leo (A.D. 458), forbidden to trade; and a constitution of Honorius and Theodosius forbade men of noble birth, conspicuous dignity, or hereditary wealth, to exercise a trade. The exercise of the smaller trades and handicrafts often differed little from slavery. A constitution of the emperor Constantine (A.D. 329) speaks of freedmen—artificers belonging to the state—and desires them to be brought back, if enticed out of the city where they reside. The bakers seem to have been in an almost lower condition still, since their status is expressly treated as servile. Curiously enough, the swineherds of the capitals, as carrying on a labor for the benefit of the Roman people, were specially exempted from all sordid duties. Iron-workers were to be marked in the arm, and formed also a hereditary caste, the admission to which was regulated with especial care. In the interior of the empire trade was not only restricted by monopolies which under Justinian were carried to a cruel height, but by the reservation of various articles for imperial use, as gold and silver tissue or embroidery, and the dye of the "holy murex." Buying and selling seems to have been in a great measure carried on at fairs and in markets. Fairs were often held on saints' days, though St. Basil condemns the practice; thus, there was a fair in Lucania on the birthday of St. Cyprian; a thirty days' fair free of toll in Edessa at the feast of St. Thomas the Apostle, etc. Notwithstanding the low estimation in which trade was held it seems clear that, until Justinian's time, at least, it was not held civilly incompatible with the clerical office. Hippolytus (3d century) shows us the future pope Calixtus, set up by Carpophorus as a banker, holding his bank in the "Piscina Publica," and receiving deposits from widows and brethren. A law of Constantine and Julian, indeed (A.D. 357), sought to compel trader clerics, among others, to devote their gains to charitable uses. The next passage indicates a custom still more strange to us: that of workshops, and even taverns, being kept for the benefit of the Church. Other enactments indicate to us the extent of the trade which was carried on in the eastern capital on this behalf, and the singular character of a portion of it. In consideration of the cathedral undertaking what in modern French parlance would be termed the "Pompes Funébres," Constantine granted to it nine hundred and eighty workshops, of the various trades of the city, to be held free of all tax; Anastasius added one hundred and fifty more. The guilds of the city complained that the number of tax-free establishments was ruining them. It is clear that in the 6th century a very considerable amount of trade, including the liquor traffic, was carried on on behalf of the Church and its charitable establishments in the capital of the eastern empire. If we turn from the Roman to the barbarian world, the codes of the latter till the time of Charlemagne scarcely contain an allusion to trade.

One form of trade was always forbidden by the Church—that of earning a livelihood by usury. See USURY. In other respects it was long before trade was deemed by the Church itself incompatible with clerical functions, though the fathers might inveigh against it as a form of worldliness. The growth of some general feeling on the subject is, however, to be traced in the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305), which forbids bishops, priests, and deacons to depart from their places for the sake of trade, or to go round the provinces seeking lucrative markets. To obtain their livelihood they may, indeed, send a son, a freedman, an agent, or any one else; and if they wish to trade let them do so within the province. The main object clearly was to preserve to their flocks the benefits of their ministrations, not to put dishonor on trading itself. A collection of decrees of very doubtful authority, attributed to the Nicene council, contains among its "statutes for priests," a provision that the priest shall not be a barber, a surgeon, or a worker in iron, the two former prohibitions turning, probably, on blood-letting in its most literal form, the latter on the providing instruments for bloodshed.

The fourth Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) forbids clerics to go to markets, except to buy, under pain of degradation, but at the same time enacts that "a cleric, however learned in the word of God, shall seek his livelihood by means of a handicraft;" that "a cleric shall provide for himself food and clothing by a handicraft or by agriculture, without detriment to his office;" and that "all clerics who have strength to work shall learn both handicrafts and letters." These enactments indicate that, at all events in this quarter of the Church, a distinction was made between trade and handicrafts, and that the exercise of the former by clerics was restrained, while the latter was enjoined.

By the time of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) the line between "secular" and "religious" employments appears to have become much more sharply marked. The 8d canon speaks of clerics who for filthy lucre carry on secular business, and forbids them to do so—a prohibition which would seem to include every form of trade, but which cannot have been so considered, since the Council of Chalcedon is expressly named as one of the four to whose canons force of law is given by Justinian's code (A.D. 528), which expressly recognises both clerical trading and trading on behalf of the Church.

In the West, however, the feeling against clerical trading became continually stronger; a letter of pope Gelasius I. (A.D. 492-496) to the bishops of Lucania speaks of his having heard from Picenum that very many clerics there are occupied with dishonorable business and filthy lucre, and enjoins them to abstain from unworthy gain, and from every device or desire of business of any kind, or else from the fulfilment of clerical functions. The Council of Tarragona (A.D. 516) enacts that "whosoever will be in the clergy, let him not be careful to buy too cheap or sell too dear, or let him be removed from the clergy." A further provision implies a prohibition both of trade and of usury. The third Council of Orleans (A.D. 588) in like manner forbids clerics from the rank of deacons upwards to carry on business like public traders, or to carry on a forbidden business under another's name. In spite of these enactments, we find in the letters of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-603) mention made of a ship-building bishop in Campania.

The capitularies of Charlemagne (mostly, if not always, invested with the sanction of the Church) deal repeatedly with the subject of trade. The ecclesiastical capitulary of 789 enacts that measures and weights be equal and just, "whether in cities or whether in monasteries, whether for giving or whether for receiving." The Frankfort Capitulary of 794 is one of several which attempt to fix the prices of victuals. The pitch of actual cruelty is reached in the "Capitula de Judæis," where every Jew is forbidden to have money in his house, to sell wine, victuals, or any other thing, under pain of confiscation of all his goods, and imprisonment, till he come into the imperial presence. The utter absence of all notion of a possible right to freedom in trading is well expressed in one of the Capitula published A.D. 808: "That no man presume to sell or buy or measure otherwise than as the lord emperor has commanded."

Markets are not to be held on the Lord's day (various councils of the 9th century), except where they have been held of old and lawfully. Forestalling for covetousness' sake is forbidden (Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 809). The Council of Friuli (A.D. 791) even forbade generally the carrying on of secular business to an immoderate extent.

Presbyters were by one capitulary forbidden to trade, or gather riches in any wise by filthy lucre (A.D. 806). On the other hand the Council of Mayence (A.D. 813) more guardedly forbids clerics and monks to have unjust weights or measures, or to carry on an unjust trade; "nevertheless a just trade is not to be forbidden, on account of divers necessities, for we read that the holy apostles traded," the rule of St. Benedict being referred to as a further authority. Trade was, however, forbidden to penitents, "because it is difficult that between the dealing of seller and buyer sin should not intervene."

The exact meaning of some of the later texts above referred to is rendered somewhat doubtful through the gradual narrowing of the term negotium and its derivatives, from the sense of business in its widest meaning to the specific one of trade. They show, however, that while the vocations of the early apostles were still remembered, and the rule of St. Benedict had raised the dignity of labor itself, the growing Judaistic distinction between "secular" and "religious" acts and matters, so foreign to the true spirit of Christianity, had by the 9th century begun to render the very idea of trade incompatible with the clerical calling, not so much, as in early times, by reason of its distracting the minister from his sacred functions, as on account of a supposed inherent dishonor attached to it. A comparison with civil legislation shows that the distinction is in itself a result of the secularizing of the Church. The ultra-refined officialism of the later Roman empire, which made the sovereign the only source of honor, and excluded the independent trader (one specially rich class excepted) even from the merely civil militia, on the one hand—the rude savagery of the barbarian on the other, which looked upon war and warlike sports as the only employments worthy of a man, and almost utterly ignored in legislation the very existence of the trader—must both, whatever phenomena to the contrary may present themselves in Justinian's code, have reacted profoundly upon the spirit of the Church. The service of God, which soon claimed the title of a militia, must have the exclusiveness of one, whether the term were used in the Roman official sense or in the warlike barbarian one; whatever was incompatible with the dignity of the functionary of an earthly sovereign, of the soldier of an earthly chief, must be incompatible also with that of a minister of God, a soldier in his host. At the same time, the influence of this distinction had not gone so far as to exclude the whole realm of trade from Church solicitude, and it is remarkable to observe in the canons of French councils of the beginning of the 9th century similar enactments against dishonesty in trade to those of the Pentateuch. See COVERTOUSNESS; DECTOR.

Comminerell, JOHANN PAUL, a German theologian, was born at Heilbronn, July 29, 1720. He studied at Tübingen, where he took his degrees in 1739; then travelled through Germany, England, and Holland. On his return he performed various ecclesiastical functions, especially at Carlsruhe. He died at Göppingen in 1774, leaving, Heilige Kanzel Reden über das erste Buch Moses (Carlsruhe, 1783) — Acht Predigten über den Propheten Jesaiam. See HOEFER, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Communistri are the presbyters in the early Christian Church who assisted in the administration of the sacraments. Subsequently they regularly administered the ordinances themselves. See PRESBYTER.

Commistio (or Commixtio). In the Roman missal, after the breaking of the host (see FRACTION), the priest places a particle in the chalice, saying to himself, "May this commixtion and consecration of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ avail to us who receive it unto life eternal." This practice appears to be an ancient one, and to be considered as a kind of consecration (q. v.). It is found in the liturgy of St. James, where the priest, after breaking the bread, places the portion which he holds in his right hand in the chalice, saying, "The union of the all-holy body and precious blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ." The fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), canon 18, orders the commixtion to take place between the Lord's Prayer and the benediction. Cranmer explained the ceremony as signifying the joining together of Christ's body and blood at the resurrection, which before were severed at the time of his passion.

Common House (or Parlor) in a monastery is the calefactory; a common room, with a fire in winter, for the monks.

Common of Saints is a festal service in honor of a particular kind or class of saints, e. g. a martyr, a virgin, or confessor; suitable, consequently, for any festal commemorating one of the class in which the name of the saint commemorated is introduced in the collect and at the other appointed places.

Commoner, at Oxford, a student who is not dependent on the foundation for support, but who pays for his own board or commons, together with all other collegiate charges.

Commoties, in Roman mythology, were nymphs of the Cutilian lake, in the country of the Sabines, where there was a floating island.

Communar was (1) the bursar in a cathedral, who distributed the commons or general caputary fund, and paid stipends; (2) an officer, called the master of the common house, who provided a fire in the calefactory and certain luxuries on festivals.

Communicables is a term used to designate the vessels used in holy communion, which on certain days were carried in procession at Rome.

Communio, in liturgical use, is (1) an anthem in the Roman and cognate missals, said by the celebrant after he has taken the ablutions. It is so called because it was originally appointed to be sung during the communion of the people, and was sung antiphonally after each verse of a psalm, which was continued till the priest gave the signal for the Gloria, when the communion of the people was ended. Afterwards the Communio was looked upon more as an act of thanksgiving to be said after the communion. It varies with the day. (2) An anthem in the Mozarabic missal sung by the choir after the communion has taken place. There are only two forms: one used in Lent, the other during the rest of the year. — Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

Communio Præsanctificatorum, the reception on Good Friday by the priest of the reserved sacrament in the Roman Church, as follows: The celebrant places it on the paten, and then on the corporal. In the meantime the deacon puts wine and the sub-deacon water into the chalice, which, however, are neither blessed nor consecrated on this day. The celebrant next places the chalice on the altar, the deacon covering it with the pall. The celebrant then incenses the offerings and altar, washes his hands, and recites the Orate Fratres and Patet Noster. Then all kneel to worship the sacrament, which the celebrant, without any prayer, divides into three parts, placing one in the chalice. He then communicates himself of both sacrament and chalice (with the particle), and proceeds to receive the ablutions in the ordinary way. See PRÆSANCTIFICATION.

Communion of Children. See INFANT COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, CLERICAL, a term employed by the early Christian writers in opposition to lay communion (q. v.), to denote the full exercise of all the duties of the clerical office. It is also called ecclesiastical communion.

COMMUNION, ECCLESIASTICAL. See COMMUNION, CLERICAL.

COMMUNION, FREE (or OPEN), is a term used in opposition to Close Communion, to denote the admission of all believers to the Lord's table. See COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, HOLY. We excerpt the following particulars concerning the celebration of this rite in primitive times from Walcott, Sac. Archæol. s. v.:

"In early times, after the benediction by the bishop, which followed the Lord's Prayer, the deacon called the people to communion, saying 'Attend'; and then the celebrant said, 'Holy [things] for holy [persons]'; to which the answer was, 'One holy, one Lord Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father, blessed forever, amen;' followed by the Gloria in Excelsis. The eucharistic bread was broken before the ministrations, and in the Greek Church immediately after the consecration. The Latins divided each bread into three, the Greeks into four segments. The latter used two fractions: one before consecration, into three parts, at the words 'He brake it'; and the second, properly so called, when each part was subdivided, before the Lord's Prayer and after the reading of the diptychs. The Mozarabic rite prescribes nine parts to be made, in allusion to the nine mysteries of the life of Christ, the conception, nativity, circumcision, transfiguration, passion, death, resurrection, glory, and kingdom. The fraction was succeeded by the mixture mentioned by the fourth Council of Toledo and that of Orange in 441. After the call 'Holy for the holy,' the congregation communicated, the bishop, priests, clergy, ascetics, women, deaconesses, virgins, widows, children, and then the rest present. The distribution was made by deacons, but in later times the priest ministered the bread, and the deacon the chalice. Deacons sometimes administered the bread, with the restriction that they were not to do so to priests or to the people without the order of a priest. In Spain priests and deacons communicated at the altar, minor clerks within the choir, and the people at the chancel. The Greeks also allowed only the former within the sanctuary. Persons in the East received either prostrate, kneeling, or standing, bowing the head at the ministrations. In the West priests alone received in the latter posture. The words of ministration were at first 'The body of Christ, and the blood of Christ:' to which the faithful replied, 'Amen.' In the time of Gregory the Great they were expanded thus, 'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul;' and in the age of Charlemagne, 'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thee to everlasting life.' Men received in the hollow of the right hand, bare, crossed over the left, throne-like, as Cyril of Jerusalem says: and women in a linen cloth, called the domical, from which they raised the element to their lips. The chalice was administered by the deacon, who held it by its two handles, and at length the calamus was used by the people."

COMMUNION, INFANT. See INFANT COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, STRICT, is the same as Close Communion. See COMMUNION.

COMMUNION OF THE SICK. Although the church is the proper place for a celebration, yet, in cases of necessity, the holy communion was administered, in ancient times, in crypts, at the tombs of martyrs, in a prison, on the celebrant's breast, in the deacon's hands, in a tent, a hut, a house, in the fields, at sea, by a bedside—anywhere, except in the burial-places of the heathen. See VIATICUM.

COMMUNION OF STRANGERS (communio peregrina). Strangers and travellers, in the early ages of the Christian Church, were required to have testimonials of their regular standing in the Church, in order to be admitted to the privileges of communion. Otherwise they were treated as members under censure, although they were permitted to receive support from the funds of the Church when necessary. Clergymen under censure were treated in the same way. Then they could neither officiate nor be present at the celebration of the Lord's supper until they had given the required satisfaction. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, a. v. See COMMENDATORY LETTERS.

Communion-books. See LITURGICAL BOOKS.

Communion-cloth is a long cloth of white linen spread over the altar-rails at the time of communion, held at each end by an acolyte, and supported by each of the faithful who come to communicate, so that no irreverence, by accident or otherwise, may occur to the sacrament.

Communions is a name given to Ps. xxiii, xxxiv, xlii, cxviii, or cxlv, sung during the administration in the Greek Church; and mentioned by Jerome, Cyril of Jerusalem, the apostolical constitutions, and early liturgies.

Community of Goods. See COMMUNISM; MONASTICISM.

Comnat (Comnatan, or Connat), an Irish saint, commemorated January 1, appears among the prelates of Kildare on this day; but of her abacy we know nothing beyond its close. She died abbess of Kildare in A.D. 590 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 5; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 24, 25).

Comnena, Anna, was a Byzantine princess, the daughter of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, illustrious by her birth, and by the circumstances of her life, but more illustrious by her accomplishments, and by the important historical work which she transmitted to posterity. Whether her subject, her opportunities, her talents, her rank, her associations, or her disappointed ambition be considered, her quaint production is calculated to excite and to reward the liveliest interest. The time in which she lived and wrote, the memorable transactions which she witnessed and in which she often participated, the notable personages with whom she came in contact, the troubles, perils, and perplexities by which she was surrounded, the grand and startling events which she recorded, combine to give a peculiar fascination to her Memoirs. In a dark and dreary age, but one of varied and heroic adventure, in the desperate struggle of a great but declining empire, she related, for the instruction of other times, the strange vicissitudes of fortune—the hopes, the alarms, and the efforts of the wild period, when the East, the West, and the North, the exhausted culture of the old, and the rude chivalry of the new civilization were intermingled with the fierce fury of Tartar and Saracenic violence. That she lived in the days of the emperor Henry IV, the countess Matilda, Godfrey de Bouillon, and Kiliidje Arslan, is evidence of the eventful character of the time. That she beheld the passage of the first crusaders, and was, in all probability, acquainted with Peter the Hermit, Bohemond, Tancred, and the other leaders, gives assurance of the highest interest in her reminiscences. That she was brought up in the Byzantine court, familiar with its delusive splendors, its secrets, its vices, its intrigues, and its hazards; that she was herself designated for the imperial crown, may not attest the accuracy or the profundity of her narrative, but certainly confer upon it a breathing charm and a personal reality which may atone for grievous defects. The inflation of her language, the affectations of her learning, the extravagance of her statements, the moral distempers which warp her judgment, may detract seriously from the trustworthiness of her record, and have been amply and too exclusively presented. Serious as are these drawbacks, they do not prevent her biography of her father from being the most attractive in the long list of the Byzantine historians, and also the most instructive.

1. Life.—Anna Comnena was the eldest child of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, by his second wife, the empress Irene Ducensa. She was born at Constantinople, on Sunday, Dec. 1, 1083, the day of her father's return from his repulse of Bohemond at Larissa. She was Porphyrogenita—born in the Purple Palace—and, a few days after her birth, was proclaimed cæsariassa and heiress of the empire, and was betrothed to the boy Constantine, son of the former emperor, Michael Ducas, and the nominal colleague of her father on the imperial throne. She was at once recognised as the image of her father (Alexiad, vi, 8). By this betrothal the Comnenian dynasty assumed some pretensions to be the restoration of the sovereign house of Ducas. The young prince was retained, with his mother, in honorable confinement, and soon died, but not before Durazzo, as is often stated. Anna had three brothers and three sisters. Among the former was Ugly John Kalo-Joannes, about four years younger than herself, who succeeded their father on the throne, and was never forgiven for this intrusion. Her uncles, her aunts, and her cousins, her brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, nephews and nieces, outrun convenient enumeration. Are they not commemorated by Du Cange, in his serviceable Familia Byzantina? "Her mother, Irene, was the grandniece of the emperor, Constantine Ducas, and her father was the nephew of Isaac, the first emperor of the line of the Comneni." She was thus of imperial blood on both sides. The time of her death has not been determined. As she began her history after the death of her husband, wrote under the reign of her nephew, Manuel, and was still writing after thirty years of surveillance, she may be presumed to have lived to a very advanced age. She grew up in the court in close attendance on her mother, and in more intimate and kindly association with her parents than is usual in sovereign households. In her father's frequent absences on military expeditions, she was more a companion of her mother than a child in the family. On more peaceful removals from Constantinople the empress and the cæsariassa accompanied the emperor. This affectionate intimacy developed from very early years the inquisitive spirit, the mental powers, and the political aptitudes of the young girl, and afforded her the best opportunities for a present and minute knowledge of the prominent persons and important occurrences of the times. The drama proceeded immediately before her eyes. She was unquestionably precocious. She was provided with the best instructors and with the best means of instruction. She had great zeal for learning, quick apprehension, and high capacity. She became a prodigy of erudition in the estimation of her contemporaries, and not merely within the circle of the court. It is certainly a mistake to regard the end of the 11th and the beginning of the 12th century as an uncultivated period. The name of the empress Eudocia Macrembolissa; the abilities of Michael Psellus, and of John Italus, the precursor and Byzantine counterpart of Abelard; the number, rank, and enthusiasm of their disciples; the historical productions of the highest dignitaries of the state, disprove any such hasty conclusions. The Ducas, and particularly the emperor Michael and his brothers, were noted for their literary zeal (Alexiad. v. 8). Tastes may be corrupt, pursuits mistaken, mores of thought distorted, but these aberrations do not preclude diligence of culture. Rhetoric and logic and philosophy, the inflated style of zealous for Attic polish, the arid and tangled ingenuity of the schoolmen, the sophistry of the new Platonists or new Pythagoreans, and of later unnamed sects, were the objects of admiration; but these objects were seriously prosecuted. The imperial Anna was among the most eager and successful of such students. She boasts of having mastered both the Aristotelian and the Platonic philosophy. She expresses decided opinions upon the merits and demerits of John the Italian. She displays in her writings an ample if indiscriminate acquaintance with the classics of ancient Greece. Such studies, however, furnished only the skeleton and vesture of her inquiries. Their substance was very different. The actual range of solid information exhibited in the work of her later life, the patient industry with which she sought, and the quick judgment with which she estimated the most important matters of daily concern, may be recognised under all the extravagant finery with which they were disguised. Her acquaintance with the scholars of the day, her court life, her intercourse with her parents, her familiarity with the statesmen and chief actors of the bustling period in which she lived, furnished her with constant and valued opportunities for the most abundant knowledge, and for the quickest appreciation of what transpired around her. Nor were the habitual dangers by which she was encompassed and which threatened the station and the lives of herself, her family, and her multitudinous relations, without influence in sharpening all her faculties and enlarging her range of reflection. It is necessary to reason back from the characteristics of her subsequent life, and of her Memoirs, to her original predispositions. Grapes are not gathered from a bramble bush.

With remarkable aptitudes, with favoring appliances, with exciting and invigorating experiences, Anna grew up to womanhood, and, if the testimony of herself may be accepted, crowned her intellectual accomplishments with rare beauty and feminine grace. The Comneni were long eminent for talent, and were even more distinguished for their personal appearance. Anna partook of both kinds of endowment. There is every reason to conclude that she was entitled to be regarded as singularly handsome. Such charms as she possessed may have been masculine, like her mind and temperament. This may be an entirely erroneous inference. The illuminated miniature of the celebrated countess Matilda, her contemporary, which adorns the coeval MS. of Donizo, represents a small figure with almost infantile features. Whatever may have been the style of Anna's beauty, in this remarkable historian were united the highest rank, fortune, family, energy, decision, personal appearance, intellect, and learning—a marvellous combination in a princess of the Byzantine empire.

As the young Ducas had disappointed Anna's matrimonial expectations by an early death, her father, for some unascertained reason, bestowed her hand upon Nicephorus Bryennius, the eldest son (Zonar. xviii. 22; Du Cange says grandson) of that Bryennius who had pretended to the empire, but had been defeated, captured, and blinded by Alexius. He was probably much older than herself. She expressed a most devoted attachment to his memory in her lonely and desolate widowhood, though she had not restrained the bitterness of her tongue during their married life (Nicet. Chon. i. 3). Of the course and character of their wedded career we have no information beyond the widow's indistinct regrets. Her husband was a man of education and ability. He was much employed in the incessant military transactions of the times. His death was attributed to poison, administered by direction of his wife's able but unscrupulous nephew, Andronicus. His literary culture is shown by the very interesting history of the Comneni, which was interrupted by his death, and which furnished the example and the stimulus for its continuation by his learned relict (Alexiad. Pref. iii). He brought his Memoirs down only to the accession of Alexius. His bereaved spouse records for us the whole reign of her father.

Anna Comnena was married, probably, about the time of Peter the Hermit's passage through Constantinople, on his return from the Holy Land and its desecrated sanctities. It was about two years after her marriage that the turbulent, rapacious, arrogant hosts of the Crusaders swarmed round Constantinople, plundering and devastating the famished provinces through which they pursued their lingering and disorderly way. The years that followed were filled with multifarious adventures, with diversified hazards, with wars, with conspiracies, and with romantic tales of heroic achievements and selfish audacity.

The troubled career and the difficult reign of Alexius Comnenus at length drew to a close. His waning life and his days of suffering were curiously watched by the wife of his bosom and the daughter of his heart. His sick-bed was besieged by them, and his palace guarded by their orders, in order to determine the succession according to their wishes. John, the heir and successor, was excluded from his father's presence. Conspiracy was active within and without the city, to secure the imperial crown for Anna and her husband. It is unfortunate that the MS. of the closing chapters of Anna's work is so mutilated as to leave the account of the death-bed scenes unintelligible. The other authorities assert that the sinking emperor was importuned by wife and daughter to declare the latter heiress to the throne. He died without gratifying this desire; and his affectionate wife addressed words of savage contumely to his departing spirit.

Though the desires of the empress and the princess were thus frustrated, the hopes which had been so long entertained, and the aims so long contemplated, were not renounced. The palace was held under guard. Ugly John, the son and brother, was neither informed of the death, nor invited to the presence of the dead emperor. The partisans of the faction were prepared for the seizure of the throne. Their retainers were assembled, military support was organized, and Nicephorus Bryennius was urged to prompt action, and to make himself master of the city and empire. A masculine energy and daring were exhibited by the empress and caesarissa, which would have been notable in a conquering usurper—Dux famina facti.

The calm resolution and promptitude of John Comnenus, and the irresolution or conscientiousness of Nicephorus Bryennius, defeated these bold and well-matured schemes. Bryennius refused to perform the part assigned to him—whether unwilling to uphold disloyal practices, or warned by the failure and fate of his father or grandfather, or by mingled motives. His wife ascribed his reluctance or delay to faintness of heart, and expressed her scorn in terms of contempt stronger and coarser than the language of Lady Macbeth.

John secured the throne without serious commotion. His mother and sister were pardoned and put under slight and honorable restraint. Nicephorus Bryennius seems to have been unharmed and uncensured. Even the princely fortunes and the wide domains of his rivals were left untouched by the successful emperor. The representations of his follower, his friend, and his able minister, the Turk, John Axuch, who had been captured by the Crusaders at Nice, dissuaded him from his first purpose of confiscating the possessions of the near relatives who had conspired against him.

Anna was soured for life by her defeat, and poured her long lamentations throughout her history (especially Alexiad. xiv. 7). The long-deferred hope, the design nursed in silent anxiety during weary years, were altogether frustrated. The unisisterly dislike of the sovereign was intensified. The wrong that had been prevented seemed an injury received. After the death of her husband, and probably under the reign of her nephew, Manuel, Anna appears to have been compelled to retire, or to seek refuge in a nunnery. There she fanned the ancient flames, cherished the old passions, and relieved her anguish by mingling angry regrets with all her reminiscences—

"In seas of flame her plunging soul is drown'd, While altars blaze, and angels tremble round."

The date of Anna Comnena's death is wholly unknown. Nothing is recorded of her after the decease of her husband, except what is contained in the venomous moanings of her work and in some very brief notices. One son survived her, Alexius, who took his grandfather's family name, Comnenus (Nicet. Chron. ii. 7), and was captured in the Capitanata by the Normans, against whom he commanded. Her memory has been more effectually preserved by the memorial of her father, which she is supposed to have completed about thirty years after his death. It is only stated by her that she was writing at that time (Alexiad. xiv. 7).

2. The Alexiad.—The fame of Anna Comnena has been perpetuated by a single literary monument. This is beyond question the most entertaining and instructive of the Byzantine histories, after those of Procopius and Agathias. Nevertheless, the work has been too little esteemed. It has been oftener cited with a sneer than read with fairness and intelligence. Much of the depreciation and neglect must be ascribed to her own extravagant rhetoric, and to unmeasured admiration of her father, equally in his failures and in his achievements. More may, undoubtedly, be attributed to the contempt with which Gibbon has spoken of the history and its author. The supercilious censure of the great historian has repressed curiosity, and prevented considerate judgment, while it has often discouraged examination. It is forgotten that this Alexiad is a sort of prose epic, according to the false taste of the age, as the Philippid of Gulielmus Brito, and the Gesta Frederici of Gunther Tigrinus, were verse histories of their respective heroes. Yet, whatever censures may be justly passed upon the work, our acquaintance with a most eventful period would be both meagre and distorted without the aid of Anna's discredited labors. A clearer and juster apprehension of some of the most surprising and complex changes in the current of human affairs than has yet been attained may be expected from a cooler, kindlier, and more dispassionate study of her remarkable contribution to the varying story of the Byzantine empire.

The interruption of the history of the Comneni, by the death of Nicephorus Bryennius, induced his disconsolate widow, in her enforced seclusion, to take up the broken thread of the narrative, and to continue it to her father's decease. She had her own abundant recollections of incidents and scenes at which she had been present, of counsels and projects of which she had been cognizant, of conspiracies in which her own fate had been involved. She was familiar with the secrets of the palace, with her husband's labors, with the materials he had gathered, and with the notes which he had prepared. Not content with these sources of knowledge, she diligently pursued, in every quarter, information regarding past events; sought out those who had participated in the grave transactions of the times, or possessed the most thorough acquaintance with them. The zeal for the fulness of historical truth is asserted by herself, but it is also attested by the abundance, the variety, and the minuteness of the knowledge displayed throughout her work. The statements may often be prejudiced, the sentiments affected, the exaggerations frequent, the expression turgid, the rhetorical decorations inappropriate and excessive—but these were the defects of the age. They do not destroy the high qualifications which they conceal by their gaudy splendor. Making due allowance for the grave blemishes which have too much engrossed the attention of critics, the substance that remains is of the highest interest and of the greatest value. The undue depreciations of Anna's Gesta has had a very injurious effect on the estimation of that memorable age, when the seeds of growth and the tares of decay were so widely scattered. It has certainly occasioned such a discoloration of the pictures of the crusades as has led to erroneous conceptions of their origin and conduct. Yet Anna, who has been so injudiciously slighted, was their earliest historian, witnessed their passage, was cognizant of their inception and progress, and was personally acquainted with the chiefs of the first, and, probably, with the sovereigns of the second crusade. Much discernment and more than ordinary skill may be required to detect the true lineaments of the personages and the scenes, under the glaring pigments and prodigal daubing of the pictures; but they may be detected, and their detection will reward the labor expended upon the task. But the first crusade constitutes only a small, though a very prominent, part of the narrative. The career of the emperor Alexius forms the subject of the Alexiad; and in his troubled and constantly imperilled reign there occurred many other greater dangers, and more arduous problems for statesmanship. It is only necessary to mention some of these to show the multitudinous topics of interest recorded by Anna: the war with Robert Guiscard, and the later war with Bohemond; the wars with the Turks, Romans, Hungarians, Slavonians; the revolts and the conspiracies; the heresies of John Italus, of the Paulicians, and of the Bogomilians; the reconstitution of the army, by which a precedent was furnished for the Ottoman Janizaries; the military stratagems and devices; the ambitious schemes of Norman auxiliaries; the reorganization of the state; the debasement of the coinage; the restoration of the finances; the provision for the poor, the great orphan asylum and the poor-house; the plagues and famines and physical disturbances; the ceremonies, the occupations, and the amusements of the court. These and numerous other subjects, exhibiting the civil and social aspects of the fainting and beleaguered empire, receive their fullest exposition in the Alexiad of Anna Comnena. Later chroniclers contented themselves with copying and abridging her relations, and did credit to themselves and justice to their original by repeating her praises. It belonged to a later age to see only the blemishes, and to remain totally blind to the merits of her work.

Comodi (or Commodo), ANDREA, a reputable Florentine painter, was born in 1560, and was the friend and scholar of Cigoli. His principal works are in Rome, among which are the following: The Baptism of Christ, in San Giovanni in Fonte; Christ Bearing the Cross, in the tribune of San Vitale; and the principal altar-piece in San Carlo a Catinari, representing the titular saint kneeling. He died at Florence in 1638. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Comp, JACOB S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Markleville, Pa., June 24, 1845. He experienced religion at the age of fourteen, received license to preach in 1867; graduated from Dickinson Seminary in June, 1869, entered the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and travelled the remainder of that year and all the next on Watsonstown Circuit. In 1872 failing health obliged him to retire from the active ranks, and he returned to the home of his childhood, where he died, Nov. 16, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 26.

Compagnoni, Camillo, an Italian preacher, brother of the bishop of Osimo, was born in 1698, entered the Jesuit order, and distinguished himself by his knowledge and talent as a preacher. He died in 1777. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Compagnoni, Pietro, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at San Lorenzo, near Lugo, March 28, 1802. He received his education first under his uncle; afterwards studied belles-lettres, philosophy, and theology under the famous professor Tommaso Ancarani, who died at Rome in 1830, vicar-general of the Dominicans. Compagnoni, at the age of eighteen, aided by Giovanni Nutoli, published Salmi Penitenziali Davide (Lugo, 1821). After ordination he was made professor of rhetoric and geography in the Lyceum at Lugo, at the same time officiating as preacher. He died Sept. 13, 1833, leaving some minor pieces, for which see Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Compagnoni, Pompeo, an Italian prelate and writer, was born at Macerata, March 11, 1698. He studied first in his own town, and in 1712 at Rome, under Gravina. Having entered holy orders, he became archdeacon of Macerata, and auditor to cardinal Francesco Barberini. He was made bishop of Osimo and Cingoli, Oct. 2, 1740, and died July 25, 1774, leaving, besides some minor pieces, a Memorie della Chiesa d'Osimo (Rome, 1782, 5 vols. 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Compan, Abbé, a French scholar, was born at Arles about 1730. He studied jurisprudence and theology in his native country, and was made advocate to the parliament of Paris. Later he entered upon the ecclesiastical calling, and was one of the clergy of Saint André des Arts. He wrote, L'Esprit de la Religion Chrétienne (Paris, 1763);—Le Temple de la Pitié, et Œuvres Diverses (ibid. 1765, 1769);—Nouvelle Méthode Géographique (ibid. 1770). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Compand (Compan, or Compagno), JEAN, a French priest and religious writer, was born at Dalon, in the diocese of Pamiers, in 1771. He was a pupil at the seminary of Cahors, in charge of the priests of Saint-Lazare, having entered that celebrated order; and after having taught philosophy in several seminaries of the province, he was called to the same position in the seminary of Saint-Firmin, at Paris. Later he was almoner of the Hôtel des Invalides, and eventually superior of the seminary at Toulouse. The Revolution forced him to seek an asylum, first at Barcelona, and then at Rome. After twelve years of exile he returned to the capital of Languedoc, where he accepted a chair of theology, and occupied it until 1830. He died Feb. 7, 1835, leaving Traité des Dispenses de Cul-té (with notes, corrections, additions, and explanations);—Histoire de la Vie de Jésus-Christ (composed at the request of madame Louise, daughter of Louis XV). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Compass, WORSHIP OF THE. The Chinese were accustomed to pay divine honors to the compass by burning little odoriferous balls, and offering meats and sacrifices to it. They threw gilded paper punctually twice a day into the sea to attract its favor and win it to be propitious. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Compassivity is a term used by Romanist writers to express the feelings of a saint on beholding in a vision the sufferings whereby his soul is transpierced with the sword of a compassive pain, thus literally enduring the passion of Christ.

Compere, LEE, a Baptist minister, was born in England in 1789. Soon after entering the ministry he went as a missionary to Jamaica, but ill-health obliged him to return after one year. In 1817 he came to America, and for some time labored in South Carolina, having charge for six years of the mission among the Creek Indians. The transfer of the tribe west of the Mississippi broke up the mission. He followed the tide of emigration, until finally he settled in Yazoo County, Miss., where he labored with considerable success for several years. He lived for a time in Arkansas, then removed to Texas, and died there in 1871. See Catholic, Baptist Encyclop. p. 258. (J. C. S.)

Competentes (i. e. seekers of the grace of Christ) was an advanced class of candidates for baptism, who had received adequate instruction. They acquired this name on Palm-Sunday, when the Creed was delivered to them; on the second Sunday following the Lord's Prayer was explained in their hearing.

Compiègne, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Compendiense), were provincial synods, as follows:

I. Held in 756. At this council, Pepin, king of France, several bishops and lords, together with the legates of pope Stephen, were present. An organ sent by the eastern emperor to Pepin was received. Eighteen canons were published, chiefly relating to questions about marriages:

1. Orders the separation of parties marrying within the third degree.
2. Declares that a wife taking the veil without her husband's consent must be given up to him, if he requires it.
3. Allows a free man who marries a slave under the idea that she was free to put her away and to marry again; also allows the same to a free woman.
4. Declares baptism administered by an unbaptized priest, in the name of the blessed Trinity, valid.

See Labbe, Concil. vi, 1694.

II. Held Aug. 5, 1235, concerning certain articles which, according to the archbishop of Rheims, violated the liberties of the Church. The archbishop and six of his suffragans proceeded to St. Denis, in order to make a second monition to the king, which step induced the lords to prefer a complaint by letter to the pope against the bishops and clergy; this letter is dated September, 1235. The king (St. Louis), by an ordinance, declared that his own vassals and those of the lords were not bound, in civil matters, to answer any charge in the ecclesiastical courts; and that if the ecclesiastical judge should proceed to excommunicate any one in such a case, he should be compelled to remove the excommunication by the seizure of his temporalities. The pope exhorted St. Louis to revoke this ordinance, declaring, among other things, that God had confided to the pope both the temporal and spiritual government of the world. However, the letter seems to have had little effect upon the king, who refused to revoke the edict. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 508.

III. Held in 1277, by Peter, archbishop of Rheims, with eight of his suffragans. They made a decree relating to the insubordinate conduct of the chapters of the cathedral churches of the province, who pretended, among other things, to a right to put a stop to divine service, and to lay the city under an interdict, for the sake of protecting their own immunities. See Labbe, Concil. x, 1031.

IV. Held Jan. 4, 1304, by Robert de Courtenay, archbishop of Rheims, assisted by eight bishops, and the deputies of three absent. They made five decrees:

1. Forbids the levying imposts upon the clergy under false pretences.

5. Restricts the dinner of the clergy of the province to two dishes over and above the pottage or soup, except they have some great person at the table.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1492; Landon, Man. of Councils, s. v.

Besides the foregoing, which were the most important councils held at Compiègne, there are notices of others at the same place, of which we present an account from Richard et Giraud, Bibliothèque Sacrée, vii, 425:

I. Held in 758, at which Tassillon, duke of Bavaria, pledged fealty to king Pepin (Mansi, i, 607).

II. In 833, at which Louis le Débonnaire was subjected to penance (Labbe, vii; Hardouin, iv).

III. In 871, at which Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, excommunicated the followers of Carloman, who had revolted against Charles the Bald (Mansi, i, 1013).

IV. In 877, against idolatry.

V. In 1053, by Renaud, archbishop of Rheims, in favor of certain French abbays (Labbe, x; Hardouin, vi).

VI. In 1256 (Gallia Christ. iii, 89).

VII. In 1270, by Jean de Courtenay, archbishop of Rheims, against encroachments upon Church property (Labbe, xi; Hardouin, vii).

VIII. In 1301, at which seven canons were passed, concerning ecclesiastical jurisdiction (Labbe, xi, 2; Hardouin, vii).

IX. In 1329, by Guillaume de Brie, archbishop of Rheims, at which seven canons were enacted, the third relating to clerical jurisdiction.

Compitalia, among the pagan Romans, was a festival celebrated, especially at cross-roads, with plays and banquetings, in honor of the Lares. At the same time, as an atonement to the female demon, Mania, honey-cakes and onions were offered. All families of Rome at this festival hung on the outside of their houses as many woollen balls as they had slaves, and as many woollen dolls as there were free people in the house, in order that Mania might take these instead of the slaves. It is stated that, originally, at this festival children were sacrificed, which abomination the consul Brutus ended by instituting the above-mentioned substitute.

Compostella, COUNCILS OF (Concilium ad Sanctum Jacobum), were provincial synods:

I. Held May 6, 900, upon occasion of the dedication of the Church of St. James. Seventeen bishops were present, together with king Alfonso, his family, and many others. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 482.

II. Held in 1056, by Cresconius, archdeacon of Compostella. Among other things, it was decreed that all bishops and priests should say mass daily, and that the clergy should wear hair shirts on days of fasting and penitence. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1087.

Comprising Arch is an architectural term for the large exterior arch of a window, which encloses the subordinate lights and tracery.

Compromise, ELECTION BY, is one of the modes of electing the pope. When the cardinals fail to agree upon any one candidate, they sometimes refer the matter to a committee of their own number by way of compromise, binding themselves to nominate as pope the person on whom the arbiters shall fix. See POPE.

Compte, NICOLAS DE, a French monk, who died at Paris in 1689, is the author of several geographical works, and a History of the Jews.

Compton, Robert, an English Baptist minister, was born at Withybrook, Warwickshire, Feb. 21, 1780. He was converted before arriving at eighteen years of age, and united with the Church at Hinckley, Leicestershire. He soon began, as a licentiate, to preach in the neighboring villages. In 1816 he removed to Isleham, Cambridgeshire, and was ordained pastor of the Church there, Oct. 29, 1817. In 1831 his health began to fail, and he died Aug. 8, 1834. See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, 1835, p. 189-191. (J. C. S.)

Compton, Samuel, an English Congregational minister, was born at Gargrave, near Skipton, March 11, 1803. In 1822 he went to Rochdale, joined the Church, and began to assist in conducting cottage-services. He moved to Bury in 1831, to Radcliffe in 1838, to Bradford, Yorkshire, in 1850, and in 1855 to Settle, where he was ordained, having previously labored as home missionary. After twelve years' work at Settle, Mr. Compton retired to Radcliffe, where he died, July 1, 1870. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 309.

Compton, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in London, and emigrated to America in early life with his parents. In 1809 he entered the Virginia Conference, and subsequently became a member of the North Carolina Conference, in each of which he labored, as health would permit, to the close of his life, in November, 1847. Mr. Compton was methodical in his work, eminently a Bible student, an excellent preacher, and highly esteemed. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1847, p. 180.

Compton, William F., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Morgan County, Ala., in 1837. He removed to Texas in 1855, united with the Church South, and in 1870 joined the East Texas Conference. In 1874 he was transferred to the North-west Texas Conference, and labored therein till his sudden death in 1878 or 1879. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 78.

Comstock, Elkanah, a Baptist minister, was born at New London, Conn., and commenced preaching in 1800. His first settlement was in Albany County, N. Y. Subsequently he went to Cayuga County. The New York Baptist Convention appointed him one of its missionaries to Michigan, and he removed to Pontiac in 1824. Having rare gifts for this position, he "made full proof" of his ministry. In 1834 he returned to visit his native place, somewhat broken in health, and died there at the age of sixty-three. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 258. (J. C. S.)

Comstock, Oliver C., a Baptist minister, was born in Oswego County, N. Y., in 1784. He received an academic education, and commenced a course of study with a view to entering the Christian ministry. Subsequently he abandoned his theological studies and turned his attention to medicine, and, in due time, was licensed, and practiced his profession at Trumansburg, N. Y. For two years (1810-12) he was a member of the State House of Representatives, and afterwards was elected a representative from the state of New York to Congress, and was twice re-elected, his whole term of service reaching from May 24, 1813, to March 3, 1819. He retired from the practice of medicine, having decided to return to the vocation of his early choice, and was ordained as a Baptist clergyman. For a time he acted as chaplain of the House of Representatives at Washington. His death occurred at Marshall, Mich., Jan. 11, 1860. See Poore, Congressional Directory, p. 342. (J. C. S.)

Comstock, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Wayne County, O., March 2, 1829. He was converted in 1841, and in 1854 licensed to preach, and received into the North Indiana Conference. In 1858 he was elected professor in Fort Wayne College. After laboring in that capacity two years, he again held regular appointments until 1864, when he once more occupied, for a year, a professorship in the same college, then resumed his place in the active ministry, and continued until his death, June 17, 1872. Mr. Comstock was a man of rare culture, a practical, earnest preacher, an extraordinary pastor, and a Christian of deep and uniform piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 59.

Comstock, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, brother of the foregoing, was born in Wayne County, O., May 2, 1832. He removed with his parents to Indiana, and settled on Eel River; was converted in 1843; studied for the ministry, and was admitted into the North Indiana Conference in 1866. In 1871 his health failed, and he died Dec. 11, 1875. Mr. Comstock was a man of great faith and Christian activity. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 37.

Comus, god of nocturnal revels and festivals, was a Grecian deity, represented as a young man crowned with roses or myrtle, holding in one hand a golden cup, and in the other a platter of fruit.

Comyn (Comin, or Cumin), JOHN, an Irish prelate, was a native of England, and a monk of the Benedictine abbey of Evesham. His education was superior. Sept. 6, 1181, he was elected to the see of Dublin, and was subsequently ordained a priest, at Velletri; March 21, 1182, he was there consecrated archbishop by pope Lucius III. In September, 1184, he was sent to Ireland by the king to prepare for the reception of prince John, earl of Moreton. In 1185 he was one of the English nobles who received John and his train on their arrival at Waterford, and in the same year he obtained from the boy prince, during his sojourn in Ireland, a grant of the bishopric of Glendalough, with all its churches, lands, tithes, etc. In 1186 Comyn held a provincial synod in Dublin, in the Church of the Holy Trinity. He assisted at the coronation of king Richard I, Sept. 3, 1189, and was the witness to that monarch's letters-patent for surrendering to William, king of Scotland, the castles of Rockbork and Berwick. In 1190 this prelate erected a church, dedicated to St. Patrick, in the southern part of Dublin. At the same time he repaired and partly enlarged the choir of the cathedral of Christ Church, and founded and endowed the nunnery of Grace Dieu in Dublin. He died Oct. 25, 1212. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Abps. of Dublin, p. 68.

Conaid, an early British saint, was a companion of St. Sampson. He is called by the French St. Mein, and is probably the same as Mecemius. He is said to have died A.D. 590, and was commemorated June 15 (Cressy, Church History of Britain, lib. xi. c. 26).

Conain. See CONAMHAIL.

Conaing. See CONANG.

Conall, Saint. In the Mart. Doneg. there are seven Conalls, and Colgan says there are nine or ten in the Irish martyrologies:

1. Son of Aedh, is commemorated April 2. He succeeded St. Cairpre as bishop of Coleraine, having before been abbot of the monastery of Cluain-dallain (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 93; Reeves, Ecc. Ant. p. 114 n.).

2. Abbot of Inis-Caile, is commemorated May 22. Colgan calls him the son of Mannis Cœlius, son of Cairberius. A panegyric written upon him by St. Dallan Forgaill, the poet, enables us to fix his date as prior to A.D. 594. He is said to have brought over from Rome, though probably not promulgated for more than a century after his death, a curious law-tract or rule, still extant, entitled the Cain Domnaigh, for the observance of Sunday as a day totally free from labor, with certain unavoidable exceptions (O'Curry, Lect. Asc. Ireland, ii, 32, 33; Butler, Lives of the Saints, v, 345, 346).

3. A bishop, commemorated March 18. At this date Colgan gives a memoir of St. Conall, founder of the Church of Kilconnell. He was made bishop by St. Patrick. Together with St. Etchen, he ordained, unknown to that official, some persons who were unfit for the episcopate, and was severely rebuked for it by his superior. Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, i, 429) doubts the connection with St. Patrick.

4. There is a St. Conall or Connell in Scotland, who gives his name to Kirkconnell, but whom it seems impossible to identify (Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 311).

Conamhail (or Conain), an early Irish and Scottish saint, son of Failbhe, and abbot of Hy, is commemorated Sept. 11. He was the first abbot of Hy, or Iona, that was not of the race of the founder, and was the last under whom the native usage regarding Easter prevailed. He succeeded St. Adamnan, A.D. 704, and died A.D. 710 (Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, iii, 150, 153; Grub, Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, i, 113, 114; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 309).

Conan was fifth of the metropolitan bishops of London in the British period (Stubbs, Register, p. 152).

Conan was also a common Irish name, and assumed several forms, as Cona, Coma, Coman, and with the affectionate or honorary prefixes Do or Da, and Mo, Dachonna, Mochonna, etc. It is given to several early Irish saints:

1. Commemorated Jan. 13. In the Irish calendars, on this day, there are Mochonna, bishop of Leamhchoill, and Mochonna of Inia-Patraig. The second is likely to have lived on the island of Inia-Patrick (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, i, 303-307; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 191, 195, 447; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 15).

2. Dil, of Eas-ruidh, commemorated March 8. He was the son of Tighernach, and nearly related to St. Columba. He is called also Coma, Commun, Condu, Mochonda, and came to be generally and affectionately known as Conan-dil, "Connanus dilectus." He had three brothers, saints Begbile, Colman, and Cuan-Caoim. He flourished about the end of the 6th century, and ruled over a monastery, probably of his own foundation, at Cnolain, on the Erne. He probably was also a bishop, and is numbered among the disciples of St. Columba (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 222, 226; Kelly, Cal. of Irish Saints, p. 89).

3. Bishop of Sodor or Man, is commemorated Jan. 26. From the Scotch hagiographies we learn that St. Conan was bishop in Man, or ancient Ebona, in the beginning of the 7th century, and his influence extended through the Hebrides and great part of Scotland. He died about A.D. 648, and is honored in the Hebrides, Perthshire, and Forfarshire (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 446-449; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i, 377, 378; Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 307, 308).

4. Of Aeg, commemorated Jan. 12. O'Hanlon suggests that St. Conan of Aeg, or Egg, may have given his name to the neighboring island of Cana, among the Hebrides, but beyond the mention of the name and dedication in the calendars there is nothing known of this saint (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 308; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 180, 181).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Conang (or Conaing), an early Irish saint, son of Lucunan, is commemorated Sept. 23. This person is identified with Conaingus O'Daithil, coarb of St. Ailbhe of Emly, and called archbishop in The Life of Mochamocus. If this be so, he died in A.D. 661 (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 34, 35).

Conant, Daniel M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Herkimer County, N. Y., Feb. 19, 1786. He joined the Church at the age of eighteen; removed to Ohio in 1819; began preaching there in 1820, amid the hardships of a wilderness life, and in 1835 was admitted into the Ohio Conference. He became superannuated in 1871, but continued to preach until his decease, Dec. 27, 1873. Mr. Conant was a man of good natural abilities, well versed in Methodism, of genuine cheerful temperament, and untarnished life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 109.

Conant, Gaius, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., Sept. 6, 1776, and graduated from Brown University in 1800. He pursued his theological studies in part with Rev. Dr. Fobes of Raynham, but becoming dissatisfied with his Arminian views, placed himself under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Emmons of Franklin. He was ordained Feb. 17, 1808, pastor of the Congregational Church in Paxton; was installed, in April, 1834, over the Second Congregational Church in Plymouth; remained seven years, and then returned to his old home in Paxton, where he died, Feb. 6, 1862. See Hist. of Mendon Association, p. 279, 309. (J. C. S.)

Conant, John, D.D., a learned English divine, was born Oct. 18, 1608, at Yealmlpton, in Devonshire. He was educated in private schools and at Exeter College, in Oxford, where he was chosen a fellow in 1683, soon after became an eminent tutor, and June 7, 1649, was unanimously chosen rector by his fellows. In 1652 he received priest's orders at Salisbury, and in December, 1654, became divinity professor of the University of Oxford. In October, 1657, he was made vice-chancellor of the university, and held that dignity until Aug. 5, 1660; was deprived of his rectory of Exeter College, Sept. 1, 1662; in 1670 was invited to St. Mary, Aldermanbury, in London, but declined. In 1678 he became archdeacon of Norwich, and in December, 1681, prebendary in the cathedral of Worcester. He died March 12, 1693. Dr. Conant understood thoroughly the Oriental languages, and was well versed in the Syriac. There have been six volumes of his Sermons published (Oxf. 1698-1722). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Conant, Liba, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., March 6, 1797. He studied in his native town, graduated from Brown University in 1819, pursued his theological studies with Rev. Holland Weeks, of Abington, and became pastor at Northfield, N. H., where he remained fourteen years. His subsequent pastorates were in Hebron, for nine years, Canaan, Groton, and Oxford, all in New Hampshire. He spent the closing years of his life in Bristol, where he died, April 8, 1881. See Necrology of Brown University, 1880-81. (J. C. S.)

Conant, Robert Taft, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Barre, Mass., Sept. 1, 1810. He joined the Congregational Church in 1826; graduated at Amherst College in 1836, and at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1841; commenced preaching at Clintonville, N.Y., in 1840, and was ordained there Nov. 4, 1841; removed to St. Lawrence County in 1849, and united with the old Ogdensburg Presbytery in 1850; preached at Oswegatchie, Morristown, Antwerp, Evanston, and Heuvelton. From 1865, he became a teacher in a classical school at Ogdensburg, also preaching occasionally. He died there, Jan. 28, 1879. Mr. Conant was a profound scholar, and an ardent advocate of temperance. He published only some Sermons and articles in periodicals. (W. P. S.)

Conant, Sylvanus, a Unitarian minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., in 1722, and graduated at Harvard College in 1740. He was ordained at Middleborough, March 28, 1745, and remained there until his death, Dec. 8, 1777. He was a man of good talents, of deep piety, and of great circumspection in his personal and official deportment. See Hist. of First Church in Middleborough, p. 31, 32; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 292. (J. C. S.)

Conant, William, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass.; graduated at Yale College in 1770; was ordained pastor of the Church in Lyne, N. H., Dec. 22, 1778, and died March 8, 1810, aged sixty-seven years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 265.

Conant, William M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Aurora, O., Sept. 16, 1824. He was converted under the ministry of his father, Rev. D. M.

Conant, in early youth; studied at Norwalk Seminary and Ohio Wesleyan University, and in 1849 entered the North Ohio Conference. He died in the midst of his labors, Dec. 28, 1871. Mr. Conant was deeply pious, prudent, attractive, loving, exemplary, and eminently conscientious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 72.

Conantius, a Spanish prelate of the 7th century, was bishop of Palencia (Palencia, in Old Castile) from the reign of the Visigothic king Gundemar, A.D. 610, to that of Sisenaud, in 636. He subscribed the decrees of the fourth, fifth, and sixth councils of Toledo. He was dignified, eloquent, and devoted, and was acquainted with ecclesiastical music, composing many new melodies. He was the author of a book of discourses on the Psalms (Cave, Hist. of Lit. i, 582; Migne, Patrol. xvi, 203).

Conânus. See CUMANUS.

CONCA, SEBASTIANO, an Italian painter, was born at Gaeta in 1676, and studied in the school of Solimena. His abilities soon became known, and procured him the patronage of cardinal Otoboni, who rewarded him liberally for a picture of Herod and the Wise Men. He was employed to decorate the Church of St. Clement. His principal works at Rome are Jeremiah, in St. John Lateran, and The Assumption, in San Martino; at Loreto, San Niccolo; at Ancona, San Saverio; and at Foligno, San Agostino. He died in 1764. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Concanen, RICHARD LUKK, a Roman Catholic bishop, was a native of Ireland, but at an early age was sent to receive the white habit in Lorraine, at the convent of the Holy Cross, belonging to the Irish Dominicans, from which, at the expiration of his novitiate, he was removed to Santa Maria Sopia Minerva, Rome. He acquired distinction during his course of study, and, at its termination, he was selected to be professor of St. Clement's, the college of the Irish Dominicans in the same city. He also, for several years, filled a chair in the school founded at the Minerva in connection with the celebrated library instituted and endowed by the munificence of the illustrious cardinal Casanate, one of the qualifications of which was a doctorship acquired by teaching the course of St. Thomas Aquinas. While residing at the Minerva, Dr. Concanen became agent to archbishop Troy of Dublin, and such was the esteem in which he was held in the Propaganda, that he influenced every ecclesiastical appointment made for Ireland and the British colonies. Dr. Concanen was also well known in Rome as a preacher in the Italian language—a rare thing for a foreigner to attempt. He had long taken an interest in the American missions, and it was through his advice that the first convent of the Dominicans was founded in Kentucky in 1805. On account of his health, Concanen declined the see of Kilmaedluagh, Ireland, but was persuaded to accept the bishopric of the newly formed see of New York, to which he was consecrated in Rome, April 24, 1808. After a residence of forty years in Rome, he went to Naples, intending to take passage for the United States. French authorities, then in possession of that port, detained him prisoner as a British subject. These disappointments and hardships, with age (he was now nearly seventy), proved too much, and he died—not without suspicion of poison—at the convent of St. Dominic, Naples, June 10, 1810. Concanen bore with him the pallium for archbishop Carroll, and bulls of institution for three new bishops. It was not until 1816 that a successor to Concanen was appointed, when John Connolly became the first resident bishop of New York. His library and a legacy of $20,000 Dr. Concanen bequeathed to the Dominican convent of St. Rose, Ky. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 90, 353-357; Bayley, Hist. of the Cath. Church in N. Y. (1858), p. 53; Brady, The Episcopal Succession, ii, 168.

Conceição, Agostinho da, a Portuguese theologian of the Franciscan order, was a native of Lamego. He engaged as a sailor and started for Brazil, was shipwrecked, and finally, arriving at his destination, entered upon a religious career, and founded a convent of his order in the city of Cabo Frio, where he died in 1698. He wrote many Sermons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conceição (or Barbosa da Costa), Antonio da, a Portuguese theologian of the Franciscan order, was born at Porto, June 7, 1657. He entered the order in 1673 and distinguished himself by his talent as a preacher. He died April 20, 1713, leaving Clamores Evangelici (Lisbon, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conceição, Appolinario da, an ecclesiastical writer of Portugal, was born at Lisbon, July 25, 1692. He was but thirteen years of age when he went to Brazil, joined the Franciscans as a lay brother, Sept. 3, 1711, and was finally taken into the employ of the general of the order. He was appointed chronicler of the Franciscans in 1740, and died, probably at Rio de Janeiro, about 1750, leaving a large number of works, especially, Pequenos na Terra Grandes no os Memorias Historicis dos Religiosos da Ordem Serapion, etc. (Lisbon, 1732-38).—Claustrero Franciscano Erecto no Domínio da Coroa Portuguesa, etc. (ibid. 1740). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conceição, Duarte, a Portuguese theologian, was born at Villavieja, Oct. 13, 1589. He entered the priesthood in 1614, took charge of several ecclesiastical establishments, and performed various functions. He died Sept. 26, 1662, leaving Collecção de Estatutos Es-tabelecidos em Diversos Capitulos Antecedentes (1646). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conceição, Antonio da, a Portuguese ecclesiastical and theologian, was born at Pombal, May 12, 1522. He was secular canon of St. John the Evangelist, and gained the reputation of a saint. He died May 12, 1601, leaving Quatorze Cartas Espirituaes, published in his Vie, by Luiz de Mertola. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conception, The Miraculous. See MARIOLATRY.

Conception, Antonio de la (called da Siena), a Portuguese biographer and theologian, was born at Guimarães, Portugal. The name of his family was la Conception. He completed his studies at Lisbon and Coimbra, went to the Netherlands, and was made doctor at Louvain. He afterwards went to Brittany, where he remained some time with don Antonio, who assumed the title of king of Portugal. Antonio da Siena afterwards went to Rome. He died in 1586, having published notes upon the Summa of St. Thomas, and some other works, such as the Annals and the Bibliotheca of the authors of his order who wrote upon morality and spirituality (Paris, 1647). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conceptione (or Concezione), MARIA CRUCIFIXA, an Italian nun, was born in Sicily in 1645. She entered the Benedictine convent of St. Rosaire at Palma, took the vows in 1662, and died in 1699, leaving, Della Orribile Bruttezza dell' Anima d'un Sacerdote, etc. (Rome, 1672; Palermo, 1675, without the name of the author, and in 1695 with her name).—Scelta di Lettera Spirituali (Girgenti, 1704); and various other writings which are found in her Life, by Jerome Turanus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conchenn. See COINCINN.

Concilia Martyrum is a term sometimes applied to the Roman catacombs. See ARENARIA.

Concina, Daniele, an Italian theologian, was born at Friuli in 1686. He entered the Dominican order March 16, 1708; distinguished himself by his preaching talent, and received proofs of the esteem of popes Clement XII and Benedict XIV. He died at Venice, Feb. 21, 1756, leaving numerous works, among which we notice, Aninadversiones Critico-Morales in Menda Pontasiana (Augsburg, 1733).—Commentarius Historico-Apologeticus, etc. (Venice, 1736).—Epistolæ Theologico-Morales (ibid. 1744).—In Rescriptum Bened. XIV, Pont. Max. (ibid. 1745).—Usura Contractus Trini Dissertationibus Historico-Theologicis Demonstrata, etc. (ibid.):—Theologia Christiana Dogmatico-Moralis (Rome and Venice, 1749); this work is very highly esteemed:—De Sacramentali Absolutione (Rome, 1755). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Concina, Nicolo, an Italian philosopher, brother of the foregoing, took the habit of a Dominican, was professor of theology and philosophy, and in 1732 taught metaphysics at Padua. In 1748 his health obliged him to retire to Venice, where he died in 1763, leaving Oration in Gymnasio Palarino (Venice, 1732):—Synopsis Tertie Partis Metaphysice (without date):—Juris Naturalis et Gentium Doctrina Metaphysice Asserta (Venice, 1736). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conciolo, an Italian painter of the 18th century. At Subiaco is a picture on panel by him, representing the consecration of a church, inscribed "Conciolus Pinxit, 1219." See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.: Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conclamatio was the cry of lamentation which the ancient Romans made over their dead. As soon as the eyes were closed in death, the relatives of the deceased who happened to be present called upon him by name several times at intervals, repeating ave, hail, or vale, farewell. Hence when any affair was desperate, the phrase was frequently used in reference to this practice, conclavum est, i. e. "all is over." See MOURNING.

Conclavists are the attendants on cardinals when met in conclave for the election of a pope. There are usually two to each cardinal, one of them being an ecclesiastic. If the cardinals be princes, or old or infirm, they are sometimes allowed three. They are shut up as strictly as the cardinals themselves, and though the situation of a conclavist is far from being comfortable, it is much coveted. He must be immured in a little corner of his master's cell, and do every menial office for him. A conclavist may assign the pensions which he has out of benefices for a particular sum, which is determined by the order which the pope-elect grants to him who makes the assignment. The office also gives a man the privilege of being a citizen in any town within the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; besides which, he receives a sum of money from the pope after his election. Each conclavist, before entering upon his office, takes an oath that he will not reveal the secrets of the conclave. Conclavists are sometimes the hired tools of foreign governments to procure the election of a particular individual to the papal chair. See POPE.

Concomitance, in ecclesiastical phrase, is the Romish doctrine that under the form of bread the blood of Christ is also received, although the chalice is not partaken.

Concord, Saint, a priest and martyr, lived about 170. He was son of Gordianus, a Roman priest of great piety. The persecution of Christians under Marcus Aurelius obliged him to withdraw into retirement. The report of miracles which he accomplished soon made him known. Torquatus, governor of Spoleto, made strenuous efforts to cause him to abjure the Christian faith, but Concord remained resolute. After cruelly torturing him, he threw him into a dungeon. Three days later he was offered the choice of worshipping an idol or giving up his life. Scorning the idol, one of the soldiers cut off his head. He is honored on Jan. 1, and the anniversary of his removal is celebrated July 4. The Spanish clergy claim to have the remains of this saint in a monastery of Gerona, Catalonia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Concordia, in Roman mythology, was the goddess of union. She had a number of temples at Rome: one on the Capitoline Hill, rebuilt after having been burned to the ground under Constantine and Maxentius, the ruins of which are still shown. Another temple was built in consequence of a vow which L. Manlius had made in Gaul. A third was dedicated by Cn. Flavius, an ædile, during the Samnite war. Concordia appears on coins as a matron, sometimes standing and sometimes sitting, bearing in her left arm a cornucopia, sometimes an olive branch or a shell. Clasped hands are also her symbol.

Concordia, nurse of St. Hippolytus, and a martyr at Rome, is commemorated Aug. 18, in Usuard's Martyrology.

Concordius is the name of several early Christians. See also CORDIUS.

1. A deacon of the Church of Arles, who was present at the election of Hilary to the see of Rome, A.D. 461.

2. A presbyter and martyr at Spoleto, under Antoninus, is commemorated Jan. 1, in Usuard's Martyrology. See CONCORD, ST.

3. A bishop of Arles (A.D. 374, circ. 409), canonized as a saint, was one of the twenty-two or thirty bishops present at the first council of Valence (A.D. 374). One of the decrees of this council was that those ecclesiastics who, in order to get rid of the burdens of office, accused themselves of mortal sin, should be taken at their word. Under this canon came Acceptus, bishop of Fregus, whom Concordius defended in the council (Tillemont, Hist. Eccl. viii, 551-553).

Concurrence of HOLIDAYS. Festivals are said to "concur" when one feast is succeeded by another feast, so that the second even-song of the former concurs with the first even-song of the latter.

Conda. See CONNA.

Condé, NICOLAS, a theologian of Lorraine, was born at Clermont, in Argonne, in 1609. He became a Jesuit May 2, 1622, and taught rhetoric from 1632 to 1636, and afterwards philosophy until 1639. He was also distinguished as a preacher. He died Oct. 5, 1654, leaving Oraison Funèbre de Louis XIII (Dijon, 1643):—L'Année Chrétienne dans son Parfait Accomplissement (Paris, 1649):—Vie de Charles de Lorraine (ibid. 1652). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Condédu, Saint, a presbyter and recluse (also called Condélus, Condedes, and Candidus), was a native of Great Britain, but migrated into Gaul in the time of Theodoric, son of Clovis, about A.D. 511. After leading a solitary life for a short time near Fontana Wal-arici (St. Valéry-en-caux, or St. Valéry-sur-Somme), and visiting St. Lambert and brothers of the monastery of Fontenelle, he took up his abode upon the island of Belcinaca, in the Seine. Here Condédu built two churches, and he himself was buried in one, but his body subsequently was removed to the monastery of Fontenelle, A.D. 1027. Condédu is commemorated Oct. 21. The date of his death is uncertain (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ii, 58, 316; Migne, Encyclop. Theol. xl, 645).

Conder, George William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Hitchin, Nov. 30, 1821. He was educated at the grammar school in his native town; entered business in London; joined the Church in early manhood; received his theological training at Highbury College, and began his ministry in 1845 as co-pastor at High Wycombe. Afterwards he labored successively two years at Ryde, fifteen years at Leeda, six years at Manchester, and finally four years at Forest Hill, a London suburb, where he died, Nov. 8, 1874. Mr. Conder exerted a powerful influence as pastor, open-air preacher, and lecturer; was a public-spirited townsman, an earnest advocate of education, and a nervous and pithy writer of some charming articles for the young. He was also the composer of a few notable hymns. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 317; (Lond.) Evang. Mag. 1875, p. 95.

Conder, John (1), an English Independent, was chosen assistant to John Nesbitt, in 1710, as pastor at Hare Court, London, and continued there till his death, March 3, 1746. He attended the Salter's Hall Synod in 1719, and sided with both the signers and non-signers, which created considerable mirth. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 287.

Conder, John (2), D.D., an English Independent minister, was born at Wimpole, in Cambridgeshire, in 1714; educated in London; was ordained at Cambridge in September, 1739; and chosen theological tutor at the Mile End College in 1754, when the institution was opened in that locality. In 1759 he became one of the preachers of the Merchants' Lecture, and in 1760 assistant preacher at the Pavement, near Moorfields, where he continued until his death in 1781. He published the Sermons of the Rev. Samuel Hayward of Silver Street about 1760. See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 85, 531; iii, 111.

Condict (or Condit), Aaron, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Orange, N. J., Aug. 6, 1765. He graduated from Princeton in 1788; was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1790, and soon after accepted a call to Stillwater, N. Y. In 1796 he was installed pastor at Hanover, N. J., where he labored for thirty-five years. He died in April, 1852. His ministerial labors were crowned with great success. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 39.

Condict, Edward William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Morristown, N. J., Jan. 17, 1833. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1853, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1855; was licensed by the Presbytery of Passaic, April 14 of the same year; in October following joined the Presbytery of Lewes, and became a missionary within its bounds. He died at Morristown, Nov. 28, 1858. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 69; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 199.

Condit, Joseph D., a Presbyterian minister, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1826; was settled as the sixth pastor at Easthampton, L. I., in 1830; dismissed in 1835; installed pastor of the Congregational Church at South Hadley, Mass., in July of the same year; and died in September, 1847. He possessed extraordinary talents, and was distinguished, through his whole ministry, for his zealous and successful labors. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 39.

Condle, THOMAS, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1741; called to the living at Dairsie in 1747; and died June 28, 1767. See Fusti Eccles. Scotticae, ii, 487.

Condit, Ira, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Morristown, N. J., March 6, 1772. He graduated at Cannonsburg, Pa., in 1806; studied theology under private instructors, teaching school in the meantime, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Ohio, Oct. 17, 1811. The first year of his labor was spent as a missionary. In 1812 he went to Sandy Creek, and after preaching for some time in various churches, accepted calls from the congregations of Fairfield and Big Sugar Creek. His ordination took place Nov. 8, 1814. In 1827 he accepted a call from Georgetown, O.; was afterwards installed over the congregation of Amity; in 1829 accepted a call from Cool Spring for one third of his time; and in this united charge—Fairfield, Georgetown, Cool Spring—labored till his death in 1836. See Hist. of the Presbytery of Erie.

Condit, John Howel, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Jersey in 1806. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1831, and at the Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835. He was ordained evangelist, by the Presbytery of New Jersey, Oct. 5, 1836; preached as a stated supply at Bethesda, Ky., from 1837 to 1839; was pastor at Washington, in the same state, from 1840 to 1868; and died at Ashland, Aug. 1, 1869. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 87.

Condit, Jonathan Bailey, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of the Rev. Aaron Condit, was born at Hanover, N. J., Dec. 16, 1808. He graduated from Princeton College in 1827, and spent the next year in the Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newark, at Orange, N. J., in 1830; was ordained in July, 1831, by a Congregational Council, as pastor at Long Meadow, Mass., where he remained four years and six months. From September, 1835, until May, 1838, he held the position of professor of rhetoric in Amherst College. In June, 1838, was installed pastor of the Second Congregational Church of Portland, Me., with which he remained until December, 1845. In February, 1846, he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J.; resigned, on account of ill-health, April 15, 1851; from October of that year to June, 1855, was professor of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology in Lane Theological Seminary; and thereafter, until January, 1874, professor in Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1861 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly (new school). He died at Auburn, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1876. Dr. Condit was a man of the loveliest type of Christian character, reminding one of the apostle John by his sweetness, gentleness, and serenity of spirit. He was eminently courteous and judicious. As a preacher, he was tender, sympathetic, and solemn. As a professor, he was able, instructive, conservative, and safe in his teachings. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 17. (W. P. S.)

Conditor, in Roman mythology, was a god of the fields, and presided over the gathering of the fruits.

He was represented with flowing robes, and had some fruits in his arms. In his hand he bore a sickle.

Conditorium, a burial-place among the ancient Greeks and Romans, in which dead bodies were deposited entire, as distinguished from those sepulchres which contained only the bones and ashes. The word conditorium is also used to denote the coffin in which a dead body was placed when consigned to the tomb.

Conclædth. See CONLAED.

Condo, ELI E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born July 12, 1846, in East Germantown, Ind. He was converted in 1863, entered the ministry in 1866, was ordained deacon in 1868, and elder in 1871. In 1873 and 1874 he edited the Carthage Advance, Mo. He joined the St. Louis Conference in 1878, his previous labors having been in connection with the Evangelical Association. He perished in the tornado which swept over Marshfield, Mo., April 18, 1880. Mr. Condo was a man of fine ability, scholarly attainments, unblemished character, and a good preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 95; Evangelical Messenger, May 25, 1880.

Condorcet, JACQUES MARIE DE Caritat de, a French prelate, was born at the Château of Condorcet, near Nyon, in Dauphiné, in 1708. He at first inclined towards a military life, but afterwards entered upon an ecclesiastical career, and became grand-vicar of his uncle, Yse de Saléon, bishop of Rodez. In 1741 Condorcet was appointed bishop of Gap, in 1754 of Auxerre, and in 1761 of Lisieux. He was a confessed enemy of the Jansenists, had some lively contests with the clergy, and by his violence even occasioned some disorders in the bishopric of Lisieux. He died Sept. 21, 1783, leaving various writings against the Jansenists. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Condren, CHARLES DE, a French theologian, was born at Vauvain, near Soissons, in 1588. His family at first chose for him a military life, but his great wish was to enter upon an ecclesiastical calling; and in 1616 he was made doctor of the Sorbonne. From that time he renounced the world, consecrated himself to works of charity, and at length, in 1617, entered the society formed by cardinal Bérulle, who appointed him, in 1622, superior of the house of St. Magloire, and chose him as his director. Having become confessor of Gaston, duke of Orleans, he showed great skill in very difficult negotiations. After the death of Bérulle, in 1629, he was unanimously elected general of the oratorio. He refused the archbishoprics of Rheims and of Lyons, as well as the cardinal's hat. He died Jan. 7, 1641, leaving Discours et Lettres (Paris, 1643, 1648):—Idée du Sacerdoce et Sacrifice de Jésus-Christ (ibid. 1677). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conduct (Conductarius, a stipendiary) is a term for a chaplain without endowment.

Condy, JEREMY, a Baptist minister, graduated at Harvard College in 1726. After preaching a few years he went to England, and remained till 1738, when he came back at the call of the First Baptist Church in Boston. He was an Arminian, and this caused his removal from the pastorate. He died in 1768, leaving two Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 37.

Cone, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut. He graduated from Yale College in 1808; studied theology at Andover Theological Seminary over a year; was ordained May 22, 1811; and acted as pastor at Bristol, Conn., until 1828, and at Durham, N. Y., from 1830 to 1848. He resided thereafter, without a charge, in New Haven, Conn., until his death, Jan. 4, 1850. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 20.

Cone, Salmon, a Congregational minister, was born in Bolton, Conn. He graduated from Yale College in 1789; was ordained pastor of the First Church in Colchester, Feb. 29, 1792; and remained there until Aug. 11, 1830. For some time thereafter he preached as a stated supply in the neighboring parish of Goshen. He died March 24, 1834. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 204.

Cone, William H. C., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greene County, Ga. He began preaching in 1849, and for twelve years was a faithful and laborious member of the Georgia Conference. He died in 1862. Mr. Cone was a remarkably sweet singer, and an earnest preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1862, p. 401.

Conecte (or Connecte), THOMAS, a Carmelite monk, was born at Rennes in the 14th century. He acquired in his native place a great reputation as a preacher, and attracted crowds of hearers in Flanders and various parts of France. He finally passed into Italy, everywhere preaching a reformation among the clergy, but was finally burned at the stake, in Rome, in 1434. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conegliano. See CIMA.

Conei (or Cowne; in Lat. Conaeus), GEORGE, a Scotch theologian, who, while very young, left his native country and went to Modena, then to Rome. Pope Urban VIII sent him as nuncio to the queen of England, Henrietta Maria. He died at Rome, Jan. 10, 1640, leaving Life of Mary Stuart (Rome, 1624);—De Institutione Principis;—De Duplici Statu Religionis apud Scolas (ibid. 1628);—Proofs of the Catholic Faith, in three books, with a Hymn to the Virgin (Bologna, 1631). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conestaggio, Geronimo Franchi de, a Genoese historian, was first secretary to cardinal Sforza, next chaplain to Philip III, and eventually bishop of Nardo, and archbishop of Capua. He died in 1635, leaving Dell' Unione del Regno di Portogello olla Corona di Castiglia (Genoa, 1585; transl. into French by Th. Nardin, Beaunon, 1596; into Latin, Frankfort, 1602; into Spanish, by L. de Bania, Barcelona, 1610);—Historie delle Guerre delle Germania Inferiore (Venice, 1614; Holland, 1624);—also An Expedition against Tunis, various Italian poems, and the Life of Sforza, Count of Santa Fiore. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coney, Jeremiah Bolce, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cambridge, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1810. After spending more than two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, he was stated supply at Prey Freehold, N. J., in 1841; was ordained by the Presbytery of Albany, Oct. 4, 1842; pastor at Hamilton Union Church, Guildersland, N. Y., in 1843; pastor thereafter at Princeton, until his death, May 16, 1848. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 118.

Coney, Thomas, D.D., an English clergyman, was born about 1676, became prebendary of Wells in 1716, and died April 6, 1752. He published several volumes of sermons, and Sick Bed (1747). See Le Neve, Fasti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Confalonieri, GIOVANNI AUGUSTINO, an Italian religious author, was born at Milan in 1571. He entered the Jesuit order, was employed in the German missions, and distinguished himself by his learning and talent in controversy. He died April 10, 1639, leaving various works in Latin and Italian, such as Vita Beatae Mariæ Virginis (Dillingen, 1612; Milan, 1620);—Del Verbo di Dio Umamato (Milan, 1624);—Miscellanea Varia (ibid. 1623);—also a number of MSS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Confarreatio was one of the modes of solemnizing marriage among the ancient Romans. The parties were joined in marriage by the Pontifex Maximus, or Flamen Dialis, in presence of at least ten witnesses, by a set form of words, and by tasting a cake made of salt, water, and flour, called far or pamē farrēus, which was offered with a sheep in sacrifice to the gods. A marriage effected in this way brought the woman into the possession or power of her husband by the sacred laws. She thus became partner of all his substance and sacred rites, those of the penates as well as of the lares. If he died intestate and without children she inherited his whole fortune. If he died leaving children, she shared equally with them. If she committed any fault, the husband judged of it along with her relations, and punished her at pleasure. The children of this kind of marriage were called patrimi and matrimi. From these were chosen the flamina of Jupiter and the vestal virgins. See MARRIAGE.

Confederated. See COMFORTED.

Confederated Monasteries are those united in prayer for the dead members, mutual hospitality, and admission to chapter. Westminster was confederated with Bury, Worcester, Malmesbury, St. Albans, Winchester, York, Colchester, Wenlock, Reading, Bermondsey, Tavistock, Tewkesbury, Rochester, Ramsey, Hulme, Canterbury, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Malvern, Hurley, and Fécamp.

Conference, Lay Electoral, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, is a body consisting of one lay member from each charge within the bounds of an Annual Conference, appointed by the Quarterly Conference, and meeting on the third day of the session of the Annual Conference preceding the General Conference, to elect two lay representatives to the latter body. The latter lay delegates must be at least twenty-five years of age, and church-members for five consecutive years previous to election. See LAY REPRESENTATION.

Conferentie (from Lat. confero, to bring together, to unite) is the name of a party in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, which was opposed to the Cetus, or party of independence. Its members insisted upon the maintenance of organic ecclesiastical relations with the mother church in Holland, and the education and ordination of ministers in that country. Zeal for a learned ministry and attachment to the Church of Holland led these educated clergy and their adherents into measures which produced the most bitter animosities and lamentable divisions, and which rent the Church in twain, until unity was restored in 1771, through the agency of Dr. Livingston. See REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. (W. J. R. T.)

Confessio was originally the place where a saint or martyr who had "witnessed a good confession" for Christ was buried, and hence the altar raised over his grave, and subsequently the chapel erected on the hallowed spot. From its subterranean position such an altar was known as descensus. Of these underground "confessiones" we have many examples in Rome, above all, in the Basilica of St. Peter's. Not unfrequently they were merely imitative, as in the crypts of early churches in England. The term was also used for the altar in the upper church, placed immediately above that built over the martyr's grave, sometimes covered with silver plates, and its canopy.

This memorial to a saint was a tomb beneath an altar containing a window, called the jugulum, or cata-ract, through which the pilgrim let down a cloth (called the pall, brandeum, sudary, or sanctuary) to touch the body below. It was surrounded by a screen of perforated marble, or a rail of bronze, and was often closed in with pillars, covered with metal plates, and illuminated by lights and candelabra. The theory was, that every church was erected over a catacomb: and where it was impossible to have a real confessio, relics were enclosed within an altar, which was erected on an elevated platform, and called the confessio. The true confessio was the germ of the crypt; in Old St. Peter's it formed a subterranean Chapel of St. Peter. At the beginning of the 13th century the steps to it were removed, and the entrance closed. The altar built over the actual grave was the lower confessio:

the upper confessio was the larger altar of marble erected above it, in the church itself, as at Santa Prisca, San Silvestro, San Martino, and San Lorenzo in Rome.

Concilia martyrum is applied to the burial-places of the martyrs in the catacombs. Jerome uses a similar expression, in speaking of the graves the young Nepotian had been in the habit of decorating with flowers.

Memoria martyrum is a term of constant occurrence in early Christian writings for the memorial chapel of a saint or martyr, also called cella. The church of St. Euphemia, where she lay buried, in which the Council of Chalcedon was held, is styled in the acts of that council martyrium; and also that erected by Constantine over our Lord's sepulchre on Calvary. The word tropea is used for the tombs of Peter and Paul in the Roman cemeteries. See CELLA MEMORIAE.

Confession is (1) general—made by a congregation; (2) auricular—private, to the priest's ear.

Public confession of sins prevailed in the 4th century, and lasted longer in the West than in the East. Private confession is supposed to have been first appointed during the Decian persecution, from 249 to 251; but public confession in the East was first given up at Constantinople, owing to a scandal in 890. Theodulph, bishop of Orleans (895), ordered confession to be made once a year; and the rule was made absolute by the Council of Lateran (1215). It was usual to confess on the first Sunday in Lent. Tertullian, Origen, and St. Cyril are supposed to allude to private confession.

CONFESSION, LITURGICAL, is the acknowledgment of sins made publicly in certain services of the Church.

I. The Confession Preceding the Celebration of the Eucharist.—It has been supposed by some that the Christian presbyters borrowed the custom of confessing sin before the eucharistic celebration from the Jewish priests, who, before sacrificing, confessed their sin in such terms as these: "Verily, O Lord, I have sinned, I have done amiss, and dealt wickedly; I repent and am ashamed of my doings, nor will I ever return unto them." Whether the precedent of the Jewish sacrificing priest were followed or not, no doubt the same feeling which prompted the use of the 26th Psalm in the early part of the liturgy caused also the use of a public general confession by the priest and ministers before the altar.

In many Greek liturgies some acknowledgment of sin and unworthiness forms part of the prothesis, said in the sacristy before entering the sanctuary: in the liturgy of St. James, for instance, the priest adopts the words of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and of the prodigal, "I have sinned against Heaven and in thy sight." The words of the prodigal are also adopted at greater length in the opening of the Mozarabic liturgy.

For the West, many forms of the liturgical confession of the priest about to celebrate have been preserved. These, it is asserted, were formerly used before the offertory, with which the Missæ Fidelium began; but in some missals they are directed to be said immediately before the Introit, while the Gloria in Excelsis and the Gradual are chanted by the choir. But the ancient formularies of the Roman Church contain no trace of a confession in a set form to be made publicly at the beginning of mass. They only testify that the celebrant, after paying his devotions before the altar in a low voice, with bowed head besought God's pardon for his own sins. The very diversity of the form and manner in saying the confession in different churches shows that no form was prescribed by any central authority, but that the several churches followed independent usages.

The usual place for the liturgical confession before mass is the lowest step of the altar; but there was anciently considerable diversity of practice; for the confession was sometimes made (as in the East) in the sacristy, sometimes by the side of the altar, sometimes in the middle of the presbytery. A peculiar custom, probably derived from ancient times, was long maintained in the Church of St. Martin at Tours, that the celebrant should make his confession at the tomb of that saint.

II. In the Matin Office.—Something of the nature of confession of sin appears to have formed part of the matin office from very early times. This custom is thought by some to have been inherited from the synagogue, which has, in the ancient "Eighteen Prayers," the form, "Have mercy upon us, O our Father, for we have transgressed; pardon us, for we have sinned. Look, we beseech thee, on our afflictions; heal, O Lord, our infirmities." Very similarly, the Greek matin office has, "O most Holy Trinity, have mercy on us; purify us from our iniquities, and pardon our sins. Look down upon us, O Holy One; heal our infirmities."

In the 4th century the early matin office of many Eastern churches began with a confession; for St. Basil describes the early matins of the Church of Neo-Cæsarea in the following manner: "The people at early dawn seek the house of prayer, and, after confession, made with sighing and tears to God, rising at length from their prayer, pass to the chanting of the Psalms."

In the Western matin office the confession is made in the form called Confiteor (q. v.), from its first word.

III. Confession of past sins formed also one of the preliminaries of baptism, as we learn from Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 20). See BAPTISM.

IV. In all liturgies of the Alexandrian family, and in many other Oriental liturgies, there is found, immediately before communion, a confession, or declaration of faith by the recipient, that the bread and wine are now really and truly the body and blood of Christ. In the Coptic of Basil, the priest, holding the elements, says: "The Holy Body and precious, pure, true Blood of Jesus Christ the Son of our God. Amen. This is in very truth the Body and Blood of Emmanuel our God. Amen."

CONFESSION, PSALM OF, is a name applied in the early Christian Church to Psalm li, as being peculiarly appropriate to the case of one confessing his sins.

Confessional. A stone chair found in the catacombs has been presumed to have been thus used. A small recess at the foot of the dormitory stairs of St. Albans, and a stone chair with two armed wardens, in the south-arm area of the transept at Gloucester, and two wooden structures at Bishop's Canning and Tavistock, are said to have served as confessionals. The usual place was a seat in the chancel, in the face of day, and open to all passers-by; the modern closed boxes are of recent introduction. In 1878, women were confessed without the chancel veil, and in an open place, that they might be seen, though not heard, by the people. Men confessed at Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas. Bedyll, writing to Cromwell, recommended the walling up of "the places where the friars heard outward confessions of all comers at certain times of the year." Probably these apertures were in friary churches, in the form of low side windows. One of the 14th or 15th century remains at Nuremberg. It consists of several canopied compartments; the central was occupied by the priest, and the lateral portions by penitents, who entered by the outermost doors. An open metal screen fills the apertures only half-way up. In England confession was ordinarily made openly in the chancel, the priest sitting in the stall on the north-east side, and the penitent kneeling before him. Roger Van der Weyde, who died 1464, painted a confessional chair as standing on the north side of the nave, next the stairs to the chancel, and outside the rood-screen. In Flemish churches, and St. Helen's, Bishopsrate, orifices in the wall served as confessionals.

Confessor. (1) The name of a singer in the council of Carthage and Toledo in 400, when anthems were forbidden to be sung by nuns and widows, except in the presence of a bishop. Confession of God's name (Psalm cvi, 1) is synonymous with its praise. (2) Saints not actually martyred, who by a good life have witnessed for Christ. Their names were first inserted in the diptychs in the 4th century.

CONFESSOR OF THE HOUSEHOLD was the sub-dean or one of the priests in ordinary of the chapel royal, who read daily prayers to the household, visited the sick, and prepared persons for holy communion. The dean of the royal chapel, Stirling, who was always bishop of Glasgow or Dunblane, was the Scottish king's confessor, and the bishop of Chichester was confessor to the king of England. At St. Paul's the cardinals acted as confessors. The confessor of the papal household was a Servite. See PENITENTIARY.

Confirmation of a Bishop. On the death, removal, or resignation of a bishop in the Church of England, the dean and chapter of the cathedral which is situated within the vacant diocese make application for the royal license to elect a successor. The crown then issues the license and the bishop is elected, whereupon the crown issues letters-patent to the archbishop of the province, requiring him to proceed with the confirmation and consecration. On the day being fixed for the confirmation, notice is publicly given, and all who object to the election of the party proposed are invited to appear. One or more persons delegated by the dean and chapter present the bishop-elect to the archbishop, or to his representative, the vicar-general. Proof is now given of the election of the bishop, and of the royal assent; after which the bishop takes the usual oaths touching allegiance, supremacy, simony, and obedience to the archbishop. Then follows "The definitive sentence, or the act of confirmation, by which are committed to the bishop elected the care, government, and administration of the spiritual affairs of said bishopric, and he is thus decreed to be installed and enthroned." See BISHOP.

Confiteor is the form of general confession of sins made in the offices of the Church, so called from its first word. This is prescribed:

1. At the beginning of the mass, when the priest says it standing at the steps of the altar, "bowing very low."
2. At the administration of the holy communion at other times.
3. At the administration of extreme unction.
4. Previous to the absolution "in articulo mortis."
5. In the daily office at compline; and at prime, when the office is not double.

Sacramental confession is also directed to begin with the opening words of the "Confiteor." It is prefaced by the versicle "Deus in adjutorium," etc., and is said alternately by the priest and congregation, who each respond with a prayer for the forgiveness of the other; in addition to which the priest pronounces a short formula of absolution over the people. There have been various forms in former ages, but since the publication of the missal of Pius V there has been complete uniformity in this respect throughout the Roman Church. See CONFESSION.

Conforte, DAVID, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Salonica in 1619. In 1644 he went to Palestine, and died there in 1671. He is the author of a chronological work, entitled קצרת חוררות, which treats of the Jewish literati in Turkey, Africa, Italy, etc. (Venice, 1746). It has been edited, with a corrected text, valuable notes, and indices, by David Cassel (Berlin, 1846). See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 186; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 86, but more especially Cassel's introduction to his edition of the work. (H. P.)

Confractorium is an anthem in the Ambrosian missal at the breaking of the host. It usually has some reference to the gospel of the day.

Congal (or Congall), an early Irish saint, is commemorated Jan. 2. Some say he lived about A.D. 590. He must not be confounded with St. Congall, abbot of Bangor, in Ireland (Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 233, 810).

Congan (Comdhan, or Comgan) (1), an early Irish saint, is commemorated Oct. 18. He was brother to St. Kentigern and uncle to St. Fillan. He succeeded his father, Cellach Cualann, king of Leinster, A.D. 715. But, leaving his kingdom in company with St. Kentigern and her three sons, he went to Lochelch, where they lived a severe life. He died at a great age, and was buried in Iona. The date of his death is unknown. He has given his name to many places in the islands and west of Scotland (Forbes, Kalendar of Scottish Saints, p. 810; Reeves, Adamnan, p. 884, 419).

Congan (2), a religious writer, lived in 1120. He entered the order of the Cistercians, and became an abbot in Surrey, England. He composed a Life of Saint Malachi, which St. Bernard afterwards wrote at his request. The preface of St. Bernard commenced thus: Tu mihi, abbas Congane, in iungia, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Congdon, Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born at Pomfret, Conn., in 1803. He united with the Church in his native town, and having prepared himself for the ministry at the New Hampton Theological Institution, was ordained in 1837 pastor of the Second Church in Sanbornton, N. H., where he remained until 1843. He then returned to Connecticut, and finished his ministry in his native town. He died June 28, 1846. Mr. Congdon was a man of an excellent spirit, and much devoted to his work. (J. C. S.)

Congdon, James, a minister and elder connected with the Oswego (N. Y.) Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends, died there Sept. 24, 1834, aged seventy-five years. See The Friend, viii, 132.

Congdon, Sylvester L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rhinebeck, N. Y., Jan. 26, 1826. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and in 1847 admitted into the Genesee Conference. He continued faithful and laborious during life, and died May 27, 1868. Mr. Congdon was endowed with a clear and comprehensive mind, marked conscientiousness, an ardent, genial temperament, and a deep spiritual nature. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 154.

Congio, CAMILLO, a Roman designer and engraver, was born about 1604. The following are some of his principal plates: The Annunciation; The Adoration of the Magi; The Creation of Angels; An Assembly of Saints.

Congnet, LOUIS HENRI, a French educator, was born at Soissons, Dec. 6, 1795, and died there July 5, 1870. He was canon of the cathedral of Soissons, a member of the Asiatic Society of Paris, and of the Historical Institute of France. He was the inventor of a new method for teaching the Greek language, to which he gave the name l'Enseignement Positif. He wrote, Grammaire de la Langue Grecque (Soissons, 1840):—Le Pieux Helléniste, etc. (in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1845), and several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Congregation is the ancient name for a chapter, used by St. Benedict. It designates some religious orders, and in the University of Oxford the assembly of all recent graduates, mainly for the purpose of granting degrees.

CONGREGATION ON THE MORALS OF BISHOPS is a committee of three cardinals, two bishops, four prelates, and a secretary (the pope's auditor), instituted by Innocent XI, to see that churchmen who are raised to the episcopal, or any other, dignity in the Church, should be men of virtuous and regular lives. See CONGREGATION.

Congregational (or Independent) Methodists. Besides the larger secessions from the Wesleyan body in England, and from the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, which have resulted in the formation of separate churches mainly organized like the parent stock, there have been at various time and places withdrawals of individual societies, especially in the United States, which have generally assumed a Congregational form of government. They have maintained but a local existence for a time, and ultimately either disbanded utterly, or else returned to their former communion, or become merged in some kindred association.

There still exists, however, a distinct body of a more general character, styled "The Congregational Methodist Church," which was organized in Monroe County, Ga., May 8, 1852, by the union of three local preachers and eight laymen, all members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Their chief dissatisfaction was with the itinerant ministry and the episcopal polity. They were soon joined by others from the same region, and within a year about a dozen societies were formed in that state. In the course of a couple of years the movement had spread so considerably that a convention was held at Mount Zion, early in 1855, at which there were present delegates from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. A complete organization was effected at that convention, by the ratification of a book of discipline, which had been early put forth by the leaders of the enterprise, and by the adoption of a formal constitution. This latter provides for a fourfold series of conferences, as follows:

(1) Church Conference.—Composed of all the local church members, who, by a majority vote, elect church officers; namely: an elder or pastor, class-leader, deacon or steward, and clerk. This conference is held monthly; the elder or pastor presides, or, in his absence, a chairman pro tem. is elected. Reception or dismissal of members is by majority vote of the members present.

(2) District Conference.—Meet semi-annually, composed of delegates from the local churches, in the ratio of one delegate for every twenty members.

(3) State Conference.—Composed of delegates from the district conferences, meet annually, electing their own officers. They review the acts of the district conferences, change or form new districts, determine all questions of doctrine or discipline, and supply destitute sections of states beyond the districts.

(4) General Conference.—Meeting quadrennially, and composed of delegates elected to the state conferences. This makes general rules and regulations for the whole Church, subject to certain restrictions.

The last General Conference of the body was held in 1881, and claimed a total lay membership of about twenty thousand. In 1872, an official organ, called The Congregational Methodist, was established at Opelika, Ala., which has lately been edited by L. T. Jones.

Congus (Lat. Congussius), bishop and scribe of Armagh, succeeded Suibhne A.D. 780, and held the see for twenty years (Ware, Irish Bishops, p. 4; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 331, 352 n^o, 353).

Coniac, a French Benedictine of the society of St. Maur, was born at Rennes in 1731, and died in Paris in 1802. He commenced the Collection des Conciles de France (completed by Labat, Paris, 1785), and published, in connection with J. P. Deforis, the Collection des Œuvres de Bossuet (Paris, 1772-1790). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conibear, WILLIAM, a minister of the Bible Christians, was born at Hicott, Devonshire, England, in August, 1799. He was converted in 1818, and in 1825 entered the ministry, and was appointed to the Chatham circuit. For twenty-nine years he labored on circuits and stations, making full proof of his ministry. In 1854, becoming very deaf, he took a superannuated relation. He died at Ilfracombe, Sept. 30, 1873. See Minutes of the Conference, 1874.

Coninarius, an early Irish saint, who died Dec. 9, A.D. 710, is said to have been abbot of Hy, and XII.—3 preceptor to king Ferquhard's sons (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 378, 404).

Coninck, GILLES DE, a Flemish theologian, was born at Baillet in 1571. He was a disciple of Lessius, entered the society of the Jesuits, and taught scholasticism for several years at Louvain, where he died in June, 1638. His principal works are, In Universam Doctrinam D. Thomæ (Antwerp, 1616, 1619; Rouen, 1630);—De Mortalitate, Natura et Effectibus Actuum Supernaturalium; et de Fide, Spe, Charitate (Antwerp, 1623);—De Deo Trino et Incarnato (ibid. 1645). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coningham, JOHN, an English Presbyterian minister, was born about 1670; educated at Edinburgh University, where he took his degree, and settled first at Penrith, Cumberland. In 1700 he removed to Manchester, to assist John Chorlton with his large congregation, and to train students for the ministry. He had much success till prosecuted for keeping a dissenting academy. In 1712 he became pastor at Haberdashers' Hall, London, and was both popular and useful till his premature death, Sept. 1, 1716. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 133-136.

Conington, JOHN, an English theologian of the 14th century, early took the Franciscan habit, and became general of the order. He defended the papacy against William of Occam. He died at Cambridge in 1330, leaving Sermones Solennes in Quadragesimam Gregorii:—De Magistro Sententiarum:—De Christo Domino, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conisälus (cloud of dust), in Greek mythology, was a demon attendant on Priapus (q. v.).

Conklin, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was settled Nov. 23, 1763, over a Church in Leicester, Mass. He resigned June 30, 1794, and died Jan. 30, 1798. Mr. Conklin was a laborious minister. He was pleasing and interesting, without being brilliant; useful and instructive, without being great. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Conklin, Robert Harvey, a Congregational minister, was born at Claverack, N. Y., April 22, 1808. He was converted at Camden, studied with Rev. Henry Smith of that place, and Rev. Sylvester Eaton, was ordained in 1831 as an evangelist, and labored in that capacity in New York, Springfield, Mass., Providence, R. I., and Ashtabula, O. He died at Cleveland, Dec. 15, 1865. As a preacher, Mr. Conklin was argumentative and earnest, personally amiable and kind, and on all the moral questions of the day his position was that of a radical reformer. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 300.

Conla. See CONNLA.

Conlaedh (Conclædh, Con-laidh, or Conlian), an Irish saint, is commemorated May 8. When St. Brigida founded her monastery at Kildare, she chose the learned and pious Conlaedh to be her bishop, but in submission to the monastic authority. He was also St. Brigida's chief artist, artificer, or brazier, for the working in all kinds of metals, and making chalices, patens, bells, shrines, etc. He was devoured by wild dogs or wolves as he was on his way to Rome, A.D. 520 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg, p. 119; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, i, 409, 450; Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 311; Todd, St. Patrick, p. 19-27.

Conley, ANDREW, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Williamson County, Tenn., in 1818. He was converted in early life, and in 1845 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference. He located in the fourth year of his ministry. In 1870 he removed to Arkansas, served as supply, and in 1872 entered the White River Conference, wherein he labored until his death, April 19, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 250.

Conlin, ALBERT JOHANN, a German writer, was pastor of Monning, in Bavaria, at the close of the 17th century. He left a voluminous work on religion and morality, in German (Augsburg, 1708). See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Connmach. See CONNMACH; CONNACHTACH.

Conn. HUGH, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Macgilligan, Ireland, in 1685. He studied at the school in Faughanvale, and afterwards at the University of Glasgow. A Presbyterian congregation having, through London merchants, who carried on a trade with the Patuxent river, Md., secured him as their minister, he was accordingly sent over, ordained, and installed October, 1715. After two years' service he obtained leave from the presbytery to resign his pastoral charge, on account of his want of success and the paucity of his flock. He received a call from Pomonkey, in the New Castle Presbytery, which he accepted, and was installed. He died almost instantly, June 28, 1752, while preaching at the funeral of a person who had died suddenly. (W. P. S.)

Conna (Conda or Dachonna), an early Irish saint, abbot of Daire-Dachonna, in Ulster, is commemorated April 12. Owing to there being so many saints of this name, it is impossible to keep the lines of identification clear (Mart. Domg. p. 71, 127).

Connachtach (or Conmach), an early Irish saint, is commemorated May 10. He was the eighteenth abbot of Hy or Iona, and presided A.D. 801-2. In the Annals he is called "choice scribe" (Reeves, Adamnam, p. 388; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 252).

Connell. See CONALL.

Connell, David, a Scotch clergyman, son of Matthew, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1727; was licensed to preach in 1736, became assistant to his father at Kilbride, and in January, 1744, minister at Blantyre. He died June 15, 1790, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 290, 291.

Connell, James, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1746; called to the living at Sorn in 1752, and ordained. He died July 14, 1789, aged sixty-seven years. He was eminent for his exemplary discharge of the pastoral, domestic, and social duties. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 140.

Connell, John Martin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 22, 1819. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1838; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, April 14, 1842; was stated supply in Delaware County; at Bladensburg and New Windsor, Md.; at Wilmington, Del., and was killed at Burlington, N. J., Aug. 29, 1855. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 122.

Connell, Matthew, a Scotch clergyman, studied theology at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in 1702; called to the living at Blantyre in 1708; ordained in 1704; transferred to Kilbride in 1720, and died Oct. 1, 1743, aged sixty-five years. He was very useful among his people. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 140, 290.

Connelly, Henry, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greensburg, Pa., Nov. 5, 1798. He graduated at Washington College in 1824; was a student in the Associate Reformed Seminary, Allegheny, and part of a year (1830) in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained an evangelist by the Associate Reformed Presbytery of New York, Sept. 21, 1832; became pastor at Bloomingburgh, N. Y., in 1833; principal of the academy, Newburgh, in 1848; agent of the New York Colonization Society; principal of an academy at Goshen in 1867, and died at Newburgh, Aug. 5, 1868. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 76.

Connelly, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Talbot County, Md., in 1793 or 1794. He labored some time as exhorter and local preacher, and in 1829 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he continued diligent until his death, Aug. 8, 1844. As a minister, Mr. Connelly was plain, practical, and powerful; as a friend, warm and generous; a buoyant, happy companion, an exemplary citizen. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 596.

Conner, Aaron, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Peru, May 22, 1822. He removed to Akron, O., with his parents, at the age of seven; was converted at sixteen; went to South Bend, Ind., in 1853, where shortly afterwards he was licensed to preach, and in 1860 was admitted into the North-west Indiana Conference. In 1872 he became superannuated, removed to California, spent five years as agent of the California Bible Society, and died Sept. 28, 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 23.

Conner, Champ C., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Culpepper County, Va., March 13, 1811. He united with the Church Sept. 14, 1828, and soon after began to preach; moved to West Tennessee in 1835, and was one of the pioneer Baptist preachers in that section of the state. For a term of years he was president of the Baptist Female College at Hernando, Miss. He died at Indian Mound, Lauderdale Co., Tenn., Feb. 14, 1875, being at the time pastor of four churches. He was a strict Baptist in faith and practice, yet, while he was bold and fearless in the advocacy of the doctrines he held, he was always courteous and respectful to those who differed from him. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 269. (J. C. S.)

Conner, Charles W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Franklin County, O., Oct. 6, 1839. He was converted when a boy; served three years in the Union army; spent two years in study at Abingdon College, and in 1868 entered the Illinois Conference. Having taken a superannuated relation, he removed to Louisiana, Mo., in 1873, engaged in business, and thus continued until his decease, Jan. 27, 1876. As a preacher, Mr. Conner was always interesting and earnest, and, as a citizen, he had a large place in the hearts of the people. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 144.

Conner, George J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Frederick, Md., April 9, 1829. He was converted at the age of fourteen, and was soon instrumental in leading his Roman Catholic father and Lutheran mother and his sisters to Christ. He graduated at Dickinson College, led a class of students while there, and acted as Sunday-school superintendent; studied medicine also, receiving the degree of M.D., as well as a diploma from the Dental College of Baltimore; and, after serving as principal of the Caseville Seminary eighteen months, became a member of the East Baltimore Conference. In 1859 he joined the Virginia Conference of the Church South, and at the beginning of the Rebellion removed to Parkersburgh, West Va., where he opened a successful seminary for young ladies. Subsequently he re-entered the ministry of the Church South, and in Ashland, Ky., conducted an academy for some time. In 1871 he was admitted into the Cincinnati Conference of the Northern Church. Disease obliged him to retire from regular work in 1872, and he died April 1, 1873. Mr. Conner was a methodical sermonizer; possessed a pleasant, well-trained voice; was a cultured man, a devoted friend, and naturally retiring in disposition. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 79.

Conner, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Buckingham County, Va. He was two and a half years in the work; a pious, solid, intelligent man. In the midst of a blameless, useful career he died, in 1789 or 1790. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1790, p. 87.

Conner, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rensselaersville, N. Y., July 5, 1810. He was converted in 1831, licensed to exhort in 1837, and in 1840 entered the Troy Conference, wherein he labored zealously until attacked by consumption, which soon terminated in his death, Dec. 27, 1861. Mr. Conner was an excellent minister, modest, devoted, and greatly beloved; powerful in exhortation, mighty in prayer, and sympathizing and faithful in friendship. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 100.

Conner, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Allegheny County, Pa., May 17, 1799. He was converted early in life, and from 1820 until 1830 was engaged in business. At thirty years of age he entered Jefferson College, Pa., where he pursued his studies with more than ordinary diligence. He was licensed by the Monongahela Presbytery in 1837, and stationed at Unity, Westmoreland Co., Pa. In 1850 he accepted a call to Bethel; and in 1858 an invitation to Blairsville. He died Sept. 28, 1863. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 348.

Connla (or Conla) is found twice in the Irish calendars, first as a son of Leinni, bishop, at May 10, and next as a bishop of Rusgach (perhaps Ruskagh, Westmeath) at Dec. 30. But the most famous person bearing the name was a renowned worker in brass, who lived in the 5th century or early in the 6th (Petrie, Round Towers, p. 202, 203).

Connmach (or Connmach), an early Irish prelate, succeeded Cudiniscus as bishop of Armagh some time after A.D. 790 (Four Masters). He died suddenly in 807, and the Pauler of Cashel gives him a rule of fourteen years. Under his influence St. Fothad the Canonist drew up the remonstrance which procured for the clergy of Ireland the right of exemption from military service (Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, iii, 233, 244, 252; Primitive Church History of Ireland, ii, 1106).

Of Connmach of Ath-blair, commemorated as an Irish saint on July 9, we have no account.

Connolly, John, an eminent Roman Catholic prelate, was born on the banks of the Boyne, near Navan, Ireland, in 1750, and was educated in Belgium. At an early age he proceeded to Rome, and there spent most of his life in the convents of his order, that of St. Dominic. He was for many years agent in that city of the Irish bishops, and filled various chairs as professor. He was selected by the cardinal-bishop of Albano as the examiner of candidates for the priesthood. In these duties he displayed great ability and virtue, and is remembered by his pupils as a man of gentleness of character. In 1814 he was appointed to succeed Concanen as the second bishop of New York, and was consecrated Nov. 6 of that year. His diocese comprised the state of New York and part of New Jersey, in which were thirteen thousand Catholics, three Jesuit fathers, and one secular priest. After a faithful episcopate, Connolly died in New York, Feb. 6, 1825, and was succeeded by Dubois. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 375-388.

Connolly, Thomas Louis, D.D., a Roman Catholic dignitary, was born at Cork, Ireland. He joined the Capuchins, and in his eighteenth year went to Rome to prepare himself for holy orders, remaining there six years. He was ordained in Lyons in 1838. Returning to Ireland the following year, he labored in Dublin for three years. In 1842 he accompanied archbishop Walsh to Halifax, N. S., as secretary. In 1845 he was appointed vicar-general of that diocese. In 1851 Pius IX. appointed him bishop of St. John, N. B., as successor of bishop Dollard. After administering this diocese for seven years, Dr. Connolly was, on the death of archbishop Walsh, in 1859, transferred to the archiepiscopal see of Halifax, N. S., which he filled for seventeen years. He was admirably fitted for this position. Of an imposing presence, he possessed a powerful eloquence, great energy, sincere and unaffected piety, and magnanimous and broad views. He became loved for innumerable acts of kindness to the poor and unfortunate, and his death, on July 27, 1876, in his sixty-third year, was regretted by all denominations. He was succeeded by Dr. Hannan, who died in 1882. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1877, p. 73.

Connor. See O'CONNOR.

Connor, James R., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was converted in early life, and joined the Church in 1846, in Randolph County, Ala. In 1848 he received license to preach, and in February, 1850, entered the Florida Conference, and was appointed to Hillsborough Mission, where he labored until his death, Dec. 17 of the same year. Mr. Connor was a young man of great promise, able, devout, fervent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 316.

Connor, Wilson, a Baptist minister, was born in Marlborough District, S. C., July 7, 1768. In his early manhood he was a Methodist preacher, but was baptized at Cheraw, and ordained as a Baptist in Effingham County, Ga., in 1803. Having fallen into a backslidden state, he retired from the active duties of the ministry for a long time. For eighteen years he was justice of the inferior court in Montgomery County, and also a member of the legislature. He was at last brought back to his religious experience, and once more became a preacher of the Gospel. In his latter days his ministry was signally blessed. He was also an earnest advocate of temperance and other good causes. As an evangelist he made the whole state of Georgia his mission field, travelling more than thirty-five thousand miles in thirteen years. For some time he held official connection with the Georgia Baptist Convention as its missionary. He was also actively engaged, for a time, as the financial agent of Mercer University, in collecting funds for that institution. Having preached a most solemn discourse in Telfair County, in the summer of 1844, he sat down and expired instantly. His personal appearance and address were striking. His voice is said to have been extraordinary, resembling the rumbling of distant thunder. See Haynes, Bapt. Cyclop. i, 167. (J. C. S.)

Cono (or Conon), JOHANN, a German theologian, was born at Nuremberg in 1463. He entered the Dominican order, and went to Padua to study Greek under Marcus Musurus. Erasmus spoke in eulogistic terms of this monk in several of his works. Cono died at Basle, Feb. 21, 1513. In 1512 he published in Greek some treatises of the different fathers of the Church, and the Institutes of Justinian, with numerous annotations. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conoc. See CANOC.

Conodhar (or Conodran), of Fobhar, commemorated as an early Irish saint Nov. 8, seems to have been a person of note, as his death is entered in most of the Irish annals; but of his parentage or life at Fobhar we have no trace. He died A.D. 707 (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 296; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, 143, c. 3).

Conon is the name of several early Christians. See also CONAN.

1. A martyr at Iconium, under Aurelian, is commemorated May 29 in Usuard's Martyrology, and March 5 in the Byzantine.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

2. A martyr under Decius, in Pamphylia, commemorated March 6. He is said in one account to have been a gardener of Nazareth, and a poor, simple, hospitable man. When told the præfect wanted him, he said, "What can he want me for, especially as I am a Christian." When bidden to sacrifice, he groaned, and wished the præfect could renounce idols and come to Christ. His ankles were pierced, and nails were driven through them, and in that state he was made to run before a chariot till he died. Another story was afterwards told of him, or perhaps of another man of the same name, in Isauria, to suit the taste of a later age. He was baptized by the chief captain Michael. He used to make the devils guard his folds, and then shut them up in casks. He taught the people to say, "There is one God, even Conon's." When he was tortured there was a rescue, and he survived two years, and died in peace (Menolog. Basil.).

3. Bishop of Edessa, who, in the year 313, laid the foundations of a church in that city, which was completed by his successor, Saades, and enlarged by Aitalaha (Herzog, Real-Encyclop. iii, 646).

4. Bishop of Apamea, who, in the Isaurian rebellion in the reign of Anastasius, A.D. 497, "left his throne, and was converted from a priest to a soldier and a general." Conon became a leader of the rebels, and was killed while besieging the town of Claudiopolis, A.D. 498.

5. Bishop of Tarsus (flourished about 601), a disciple of Joannes Philoponus, whose cause he defended in conjunction with Eugenius against the Eutychians, Paul and Stephen, before John, the patriarch of Constantinople. The acts of this disputation existed in the time of Photius, and were read by him. Conon subsequently disagreed with Philoponus as to the perfect equality of the three natures in the Trinity, and, separating from him, founded a new church, of which he acted as bishop. His quarrel with Philoponus led to his anathematization of his former teacher, and the publication of an Oratio Inveciva, directed against the views of Philoponus, as to the resurrection of the flesh, which Photius records having read. Photius speaks of Conon and his followers under the name of Tritheists. See CONONITES.

6. Abbot of Lérins, who lived about A.D. 600. Pope Gregory wrote a letter to him on the government of his monastery, commending Conon for his vigor, ability and excellence (Le Comte, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ii, 478).

Conondrius is supposed to have been bishop of Man, consecrated by St. Patrick, A.D. 447 (Stubbs, Register, p. 154).

Conov, PETER, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 8, 1580, at Prenzlau. In 1602 he was preacher at Karnow; in 1605 he was called to Berlin as archdeacon of St. Mary's, and in 1611 to Alt-Brandenburg, where he died, Aug. 18, 1642. He wrote, Repetitio Sanæ Doctrinæ de vera ac Reali Corporis Præsentia in S. Cænâ (Wittenberg, 1613):—Antiparæthesis Orthodoxiæ Lutheraniæ et Heterodoxiæ Calvinianæ (ibid. 1615), etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Conoway, JOHN O., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., in 1810. He was converted at twenty; received into the Ohio Conference in 1835; labored at St. Mary's, Madison, Finley, Bucyrus, Clarksfield, and Quincy, and died Dec. 8, 1841. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1843, p. 453.

Conrach (or Conry), an early Irish saint, is commemorated Feb. 23. On this day the calendars give Cruinther Conrach. Colgan says this is the brother of St. Aidan. His mother is said to have been Sinecha, sister of St. Columba, and he was buried at Durrow (Reeves, Adamnan, p. 247, 277).

Conrad, Saint, a German prelate, was son of Henry, count of Altdorf, and was educated by Noting, bishop of Constance, who brought him through the various clerical degrees and placed him in charge of his church. The chapter chose him for provost. Noting having died in 934, the people and the clergy of Constance elected Conrad bishop. He fulfilled with zeal his episcopal functions, and founded three churches and a hospital. Three times, according to Udalric, he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, returning with the gift of prophecy and miracles. He foretold to St. Gebhard who would be his successor. Conrad died Nov. 26, 976. Pope Calixtus II canonized him at the Council of Lateran, held in 1123. His anniversary is Nov. 26. An account of his miracles is given in the Chronique de Constance. A history of his life is given by Ulric or Udalric, one of his successors, as related by Surius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad of ASTI, a theologian of Piedmont, entered the Dominican order, of which he became general in 1462, in place of Martial Auribelli, whom Pope Pius II deposed. Paul II having in his turn deposed Conrad, Auribelli was restored to his position. Conrad died at Asti in 1470. His works were, Commentaria in jus Canonicum:—Summa Casuum Conscientiæ:—Opus Præcurum et Laboriosum quo Dicta B. Thomæ de Aquino per Materiam Ordinavit:—Epistola Encyclica in Universum Ordinem, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of AUSTRIA (or WALDHAUSEN). See WALDHAUSEN, CONRAD.

Conrad of BEFORT, a German theologian and philosopher of the Capuchin order, who died at Mühlberg, Aug. 12, 1720, wrote Problemata Philosophica (Cologne, 1720). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conrad of BRAUNWEILER, a German biographer, lived about 1090. He belonged to the Benedictine order, and wrote, Vita Miraculique Sancti Wolphelinii, Abbatia Brucilerensis, which he dedicated to Everhard, abbot of Braunweiler, and to Hermann, abbot of St. Pantaleon of Cologne. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of COLOGNE. See CONRAD OF HIRSCHAU; also CONRAD OF HOCHSTADT.

Conrad of CONSTANCE. See CONRAD, ST.

Conrad, abbot of EVERBACH (or ESTERBACH), a German ecclesiastic, was born about 1140, and died in 1226. He left a biography of the principal Cistercian and Clairvaux monks, entitled, Exordium Magnum Ordinis Cisterciensis. This contains some historical information worthy of interest, but in the main is a very dry compilation. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of FÜRSTENBERG, a German prelate, was son of Egon or Eginon, count of Urach and of Fürstenberg. After being dean of St. Lambert, at Liege, he became a monk of the Cistercian order, and then abbot of Villers, Brabant. In 1214 he was elected abbot of Clairvaux, and in 1217 head of the general order. In 1219 pope Honorius III appointed him cardinal and bishop of Oporto, and two years after sent him to France to preach against the Albigenses. Conrad afterwards returned to Germany, and published ordinances for the reform of the manners of the clergy. At the death of Honorius III he refused to be a candidate for the papacy, and thus aided the election of Gregory IX, who sent him to preach a crusade against the Mussulmans, and to lead it to the Holy Land. Conrad died during the expedition, Sept. 30, 1227, leaving, Constitutiones in Germania pro Cleri Reformatione, published in the Annales of Bazovius:—De Erroribus Albigensium. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of GISENFELD, a native of that city, was a Bavarian theologian, who pursued his studies and took his degrees at Vienna. In 1433 he entered the Benedictine order at Melk, in Austria, became prior in 1434, and resigned his functions in 1485. Nevertheless he had charge of reforming several houses of his order. For this purpose he was sent to Augsburg, Etthal, and Tegernsee. He was authorized to remain in this last-named place, where he died, in May, 1460. He left several MS. works on theology, such as Commentarii Interlineares in Epistolam Sancti Pauli ad Galatas et ad Titum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conrad (or Conrard) of HALBERSTADT (called The Elder), a German theologian, lived in 1821. He was a Dominican, and definitor of the province of Saxony. He added the indeclinable particles to the Concordance of the Holy Scriptures which Hugh of St. Cher had made; also wrote, Lectura in Jobum:—Summa Studentium:—Responsorium, seu Tractatus Musæ Philosophicæ:—Sermones de Tempore et de Sanctis, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of HERESBACH, a learned German theologian, was born at Heresbach, in the duchy of Cleves, Aug. 2, 1496. He studied at Cologne, and in 1522 visited the universities of France and Italy. He was the teacher and counsellor of prince William of Cleves, and died at Wesel, Oct. 14, 1576. He wrote Paulorum Explicatio (Basle, 1578), and several educational works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad of HIRSCHAU, or OF COLOGNE, a learned German, lived about 1140. He was a Benedictine at the monastery of Hirschau, in the diocese of Cologne. He was a philosopher, rhetorician, poet, and musician, and wrote, De Musica et Differentiis Tonorum, and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of HOCHSTADT (or OF HOHENSTEDEN), archbishop of Cologne, was son of Lothaire, count of Hochstadt, and was elected in 1238 to succeed the archbishop Henry of Molenarck. After a turbulent administration, he died, Sept. 28, 1261. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad of LICHTENAU (or Urspergensis), known as the Priest of Ursperg, a German chronicler, was at first canon at Constance, then took vows at the monastery of Ursperg, of the order of Premonstrants, where he became priest in 1216, and died in 1240 or 1241. He composed a work called, Life of the Saints, in twelve books, of which no trace remains. He also wrote, Chronicon Universale, commencing with Belus, king of Assyria, and continuing down to 1229. This work was published first by Conrad Pentinger, at Augsburg, in 1515. A second edition, dedicated to the duke of Bavaria, entitled Prolegomena, extending down to the time of Charles V, was prepared by Melancthon, at Strasburg, in 1537; a third edition, by Paul Pierna, published in 1569, bore the name of the author, which the previous editions omitted; and a fourth edition was published, at Strasburg, by Lazarus Zeltner, in 1609. The chronicle of Conrad of Ursperg contains valuable matter upon the history of Germany, and especially as to the contest which was carried on between the emperors and popes in the time in which the author lived. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad of LÖWENBERG (or Leontorius), a German scholar, was born at Löwenberg, Suabia, in 1460. He was a Benedictine of the Cistercian order, of the abbey of Mülbrun, Würtemberg, and became secretary to the general of his order in 1490. He died at Engenthal, (Arcta Vallis), near Basle, about 1520. He published, Textus Biblicus, cum Glossa Ordinaria, etc. (Nuremberg, 1496; Engenthal, 1499; Basle, 1498-1502; Arcta Vallis, 1506-1508; Lyons, 1520, 1528):—Postilla Hugonis de Sancto Caro (Basle, 1504):—Opera Sancti Ambrosii (ibid. 1506):—Aurelii Augustini Hippionensis Episcopi, ad Murcellinum, de Civitate Dei, contra Paganos, Libri xxi. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad (by some incorrectly called Clandarus), bishop of LUBZCK in 1183, went to Palestine in 1189, became bishop of Hildesheim in 1196, and of Würzburg in 1198. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad, cardinal-archbishop of MENTZ, was son of Otho IV, count of Wittelsbach, and was made archbishop in 1160, at the wish of the emperor Frederick I. In 1162 he made a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Jago of Compostella. In 1165 Frederick, having convoked the diet of Würzburg in order to acknowledge the antipope, Conrad retired to Tours with the rightful pontiff, Alexander III. Frederick then placed Christian of Buche in the archiepiscopal see of Mentz, and the pope named Conrad cardinal-priest and bishop of Sabina. But he did not resign the archbishopric of Mentz until 1177, after peace was made between the emperor and the pope; in indemnification he was named archbishop of Salzburg. Christian of Buche having died in 1183, Conrad returned to Mentz. The following year he wished to seize that which had belonged, in Thuringia and Hesse, to the lost house of Franconia; but he found an adversary in the landgrave, Louis III. The result was a war of pillage and devastation, lasting for several years. In 1189 Conrad aided Henry VI, prince of Germany, in vanquishing Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony. In January, 1197, the emperor, being unable to go to the Holy Land, as he was urged by the pope, put in his place the warlike archbishop, at the head of a large army. Conrad, with the title of legate, made it one of his tasks on the route to bring back to the Romish Church Livon, king of Armenia, and to reconcile him with Bohemond III, prince of Antioch. We are ignorant of his exploits in Palestine. He returned to Europe and landed in Apulia, July 15, 1199, rendered an account of his mission to pope Innocent III, then went to Mentz, and thence to Thuringia. He desired the same year to hold a diet at Boppard, in order to establish peace between the two competitors for the empire; but Otho refused to grant it. He then went to Hungary, and reconciled the king, Emeric, with Andrew, his brother; and succeeded, in 1200, at the assembly of Andernach, in pacifying the quarrels of the princes of the Rhine. In the same year he died. It was perhaps he who wrote the Chronicon Rerum Moguntinarum, giving an account of German events from 1140 to 1152 (published in Helverich's Hist. German., Frankf. 1550.) See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conrad of NUREMBERG, a learned German Benedictine, studied, probably, at Vienna; entered at Gottwig, in 1423, the Benedictine order; later returned to Melk; and in 1426 became abbot of the monastery of Obernburg. His knowledge was varied, embracing mathematics, theology, and music. He died at Obernburg, May 16, 1441, leaving Reductio Gradualis in Introitibus, Antiphonis, Kyrie Eleison, etc.:—Tractatus utrum Omnia quæ Continent Regularis Institutio sunt Præcepta ? etc.:—De Phlebotomia, ejus Causis, usu et Effectibus:—De Positione seu Applicatione Ventosorum:—Tractatus Nomina Morborum Exhibens. These works remain in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conrad of SCHEUERN (or Seiren), in Bavaria, called The Philosopher, a German chronicler, lived in the early part of the 13th century. He was a Benedictine, and became prior of his monastery. He wrote, Chronicon Schirensæ, that is, the chronicle of the abbey of Scheuern, from 1196 to 1226, published at Ingolstadt in 1623, and Strasburg in 1716. He wrote more than fifty volumes upon other matters. Aventin says that the works of Conrad, of which he gives a list, aided him greatly in completing his Annales. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of URSPERG. See CONRAD OF LICHTENAU.

Conrad, bishop of UTRICHT, was born in Suabia. He was at first chamberlain to the archbishop of Cologne; then had charge of the education of prince Henry, afterwards Henry IV, emperor of Germany. After the death of William de Pont, in 1075, Conrad was chosen his successor. He accomplished the construction of the fort of Ysselmonde, opposite Rotterdam. Robert the Frison, count of Flanders, restrained by this fortress, contested its possession with Conrad, who was conquered and taken prisoner, and obliged to yield to Robert a part of Holland as well as the isle of Ysselmonde. The emperor, Henry IV, made amends to the prelate by the gift of the county of Stavoren, on Oct. 30, 1077, and on Feb. 7, 1086, of those of Ostergo and Westergo. Conrad warmly espoused the cause of Henry IV when Gregory VII wished to depose him. He was the architect and designer, as well as the founder, of the college of Notre-Dame at Utrecht. Conrad was assassinated in his palace at Utrecht, April 14, 1099. He wrote, Pro Imperatore contra Papam, published in the Apologia pro Henrico IV (Hanau, 1611). This discourse, the style of which is concise and smooth, was delivered by Conrad at the assembly of Gerstungen in 1085. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Conrad of Waissebau, a German theologian, having lived for some time at the court of the emperor Henry V, entered the order of Premonstrants; and was successively abbot of Waissebau, in Suabia, of Valsery, near Soissons, then general of his order. He was deposed from this office and became abbot of Cuissy, near Laon, where he died in 1241. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conrad, Frederick William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the North-western German Conference, and died in the twenty-sixth year of his age, and ninth of his itinerant ministry, at Columbus, Wis., April 16, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 140.

Conrad, George W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Franklin County, Ind., Dec. 15, 1836. He joined the Church when fifteen years of age; was educated in Brookville College, where he afterwards became a teacher; removed to Iowa in 1856; received license to preach the same year; in 1857 was admitted to the Iowa Conference; became a supernumerary in 1859; and died April 27, 1860. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 224.

Conrad, Louis L., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Prussia, June 24, 1817. His parents emigrated to the United States in 1829, and settled near Columbia, Pa. He was educated in Lafayette College, Easton, and Hampden-Sidney College, Va. About 1847 he completed his studies, was licensed by the Allegheny Presbytery, and preached at Lawrenceville, Pa. He was settled at Manchester in 1852, where he remained till his death, in 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 79.

Conrad (or Conrad), Olivier, a French poet, a native of Gatinais, lived in 1546. He completed his studies at Paris, and took the habit of a Cordelier at Meung. He distinguished himself by his Latin verses; and so well did he imitate Faustus Andrelinus, that he was surnamed Faustulus. He wrote, Poésies Latines (Paris, 1530):—Le Miroir des Pêcheurs:—La Vie, Faits et Louanges de Saint-Paul (ibid. 1546). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conrad, P., a Baptist minister, was born in Wyoming County, N. Y. He pursued his studies at the Hamilton Institution, and in 1842 was sent by the American Baptist Home Mission Society to Wisconsin. His pastorates were at Milwaukee, Geneva, Prairie-du-Lac, and two or three other places. He performed a large amount of work as an itinerant, so that there is hardly a town in the state in which he did not sow the Gospel seed. He was for many years the "Missionary Apostle" of Wisconsin. For a short time Mr. Conrad acted as the financial agent of the American Bible Union in that state; but the work in which he most delighted was missionary work. Having gone to Santa Barbara, Cal., to recruit his health, he died there, Nov. 1, 1875. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 270. (J. C. S.)

Conradi, Ernest, a German physician and theologian, was born at Hamburg, March 2, 1677. He studied at Wittenberg, was pastor of the Church of St. George at Bremen, where his father was a merchant, and died there, April 21, 1715, leaving some dissertations, among which we mention, De Surdorum Enunciationibus (1698, 1701):—Finitor Physicus, Scientia Naturalis Limites et Confuzio Dirigens (Wittenberg, 1703). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conradi, Ignatius Norbert, a Hungarian theologian and poet, of the order of Pietists, was born at Pesth in 1718. After a journey to Italy he became professor of philosophy at the Academy of the nobility in Vienna; later he was professor of theology at Waitzen and Wesprim; he also filled important offices in his order. He died Aug. 20, 1785, leaving, De Jumi Pammonii Vita et Scriptis Commentarii (Buda, 1754):—Edwardsi Corsini Dissertationes Agonisticae (Leipsic, eod.):—Paulinianorum Orationum Volumen Secundum (Buda, eod.). An edition of the Odes Epigrammes, and other poems of Conradi, were published by Zimanyi (Pesth, 1792). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conradin or BORNADA (called The Happy), an Italian Dominican, was born near Brescia in 1392. His family being noble and rich, allowed him to pursue his studies at Padua, where, in 1413, he assumed the habit of the Dominicans. He devoted himself to preaching, for which he showed a remarkable talent. The pestilence having broken out at Bologna, Conradin went to its relief. This city was at that time at war with the pope. Conradin, failing in bringing the citizens into submission, published an interdict which the pope had pronounced against them. He was then treated as an enemy, thrown into prison and allowed little food, but his life was wonderfully spared, and, a treaty being concluded, he was set at liberty. Conradin performed with ardor all his tasks, and, the pest again raging, he devoted himself to the sick until he himself fell a victim and died, Nov. 1, 1429. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conradin of SUABIA. See KONRADIN.

Conran, JOHN, an Irish minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Dublin in 1739. He was brought up in the Established Church, and received a good education, his father being a man of means. He was placed as an apprentice to learn the linen trade at Lisburn. For a time he was inclined to be somewhat dissipated, but when, at the age of thirty-three, he was brought under the ministry of Robert Willis, of America, then on a religious visit to Ireland, the result was his conversion and uniting with the Friends. In 1780 he began, in a quiet way, to speak in public, and was recognized as a minister. At that time there was prevailing a spirit of unbelief in the north of Ireland. Socinianism was spreading. John Conran contended valiantly for what he believed was "the faith once delivered unto the saints." His ministerial work, for many years, was carried on chiefly in Ireland. When nearly eighty years of age he united in a religious visit to all the families of Friends in Dublin, in which he was greatly blessed. His death, which was sudden, took place at the house of a friend, with whom he resided, at Moyallen, June 14, 1827. See Piety Promoted, iv, 298-303. (J. C. S.)

Conrood, STEPHEN, a Baptist minister, was born in Shelby County, Ky., Feb. 4, 1798. He united with the Church in 1812, was licensed to preach in 1828, and ordained a few years later. In 1829 he settled in Greene County, Ill., and for forty years was pastor of a single church at Bethlehem, near Greenfield. During this time he baptized a large number of converts. Although he was very conservative in his ideas, and did not favor some of the movements of the modern Church, he was nevertheless an earnest man of God, and a successful preacher. He died in 1873. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1873, p. 8. (J. C. S.)

Conry (Lat. Conrius), FLORENCK, an Irish theologian, was born in Connaught in 1560. He was a Franciscan, became provincial of his order in Ireland, and was appointed archbishop of Tuam by Clement VIII, who ordered aid to be given by all means to the Spanish forces sent to the relief of the Irish Catholics, against queen Elizabeth. Don Juan d'Aguilla commanded the Spaniards, but the earl of Tyrone having been defeated at Kinsale, Conry was banished, escaped to Belgium, and thence passed on to Spain. He founded a convent of Irish Observantists at Louvain, under the title of St. Anthony of Padua. Conry died at Madrid, Nov. 18, 1629, leaving, De Sancti Augustini Sensu Circa Beatæ Mariæ Conceptionem (Antwerp, 1619):—De Statu Parvulorum sine Baptismo, Juxta Sensum Beati Augustini (Louvain, 1624, 1635; Rouen, 1643):—Mirror of Christian Life, in Irish (Louvain, 1626):—Compendium Doctrinæ Sancti Augustini Circa Gratiam (Paris, 1634, 1646):—Peregrinus Jerichontinus, hoc est de Natura Humana, etc. (ibid. 1641, 1644):—De Flagellis Justorum, Juxta Matrem Sancti Augustini (ibid. 1644):—Tractatus de Gratia Christi (ibid. 1646):—Epistola Difusa, contra eos qui Assensum Præbuerunt in Parlamento Hiberniæ Proscribendis Bonis, etc. (given by Philip O'Sullivan, in his Hist. of Ireland, vol. iv, book xii). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conscience signifies knowledge in conjunction; that is, in conjunction with the fact to which it is a witness, as the eye is to the action done before it; or, as South observes, it is a double or joint knowledge, namely, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action. It may be defined to be the judgment which a man passes on the morality of his actions, as to their purity or turpitude; or the secret testimony of the soul, whereby it approves things that are good, and condemns those that are evil. Some object to its being called an act, habit, or faculty. An act, say they, would be represented as an agent, whereas conscience is a testimony. To say it is a habit, is to speak of it as a disposition acting, which is scarcely more accurate than ascribing one act to another; and, besides, it would be strange language to say that conscience itself is a habit. Against defining it by the name of a power or faculty it is objected, that it occasions a false notion of it, as a distinct power from reason.

I. The moral ground of conscience. We must distinguish between a rule that of itself and immediately binds the conscience, and a rule that is occasionally of use to direct and satisfy the conscience.

1. The will of God is the only rule immediately binding the conscience. No one has authority over the conscience but God. All penal laws, therefore, in matters of mere conscience, or things that do not evidently affect the civil state, are certainly unlawful.

2. The commands of superiors, not only natural parents, but civil, as magistrates or masters, and every man's private engagements, are rules of conscience in things indifferent.

3. The examples of wise and good men may become rules of conscience; but here it must be observed, that no example or judgment is of any authority against law: where the law is doubtful, and even where there is no doubt, the side of example cannot be taken till inquiry has been first made concerning what the law directs.

II. Conscience has been divided into the following kinds:

1. Natural, or that common principle which instructs men of all countries and religions in the duties to which they are all alike obliged. There seems to be something of this in the minds of all men. Even in the darkest regions of the earth, and among the rudest tribes of men, a distinction has ever been made between just and unjust, a duty and a crime.

2. A right conscience is that which decides aright, or according to the only rule of rectitude, the law of God. This is also called a well-informed conscience, which in all its decisions proceeds upon the most evident principles of truth.

3. A probable conscience is that which, in cases that admit of the brightest and fullest light, contents itself with bare probabilities. The consciences of many are of no higher character; and though we must not say a man cannot be saved with such a conscience, yet such a conscience is not so perfect as it might be.

4. An ignorant conscience is that which may declare right, but, as it were, by chance, and without any just ground to build on.

5. An erroneous conscience is a conscience mistaken in its decisions about the nature of actions.

6. A doubting conscience is a conscience unresolved about the nature of actions, on account of the equal or nearly equal probabilities which appear for and against each side of the question.

7. Of an evil conscience there are several kinds. Conscience, in regard to actions in general, is evil when it has lost more or less the sense it ought to have of the natural distinctions of moral good and evil: this is a polluted or defiled conscience. Conscience is evil in itself when it gives either none or a false testimony as to past actions; when, reflecting upon wickedness, it feels no pain, it is evil, and said to be seared or hardened (1 Tim. iv, 2). It is also evil when, during the commission of sin, it lies quiet. In regard to future actions, conscience is evil if it does not start at the proposal of sin, or connives at the commission of it.

III. For the right management of conscience, we should, 1. Endeavor to obtain acquaintance with the law of God, and with our own tempers and lives, and frequently compare them together. 2. Furnish conscience with general principles of the most extensive nature and strongest influence; such as the supreme love of God; love to our neighbors as ourselves; and that the care of our souls is of the greatest importance. 3. Preserve the purity and sensibility of conscience. 4. Maintain the freedom of conscience, particularly against interest, passion, temper, example, and the authority of great names. 5. We should accustom ourselves to cool reflection on our past actions. See MORAL SENSE.

Consciousness is the perception of what passes in a man's own mind. We must not confound the terms consciousness and conscience; for though the Latin be ignorant of any such distinction, including both in the word conscientia, yet there is a great deal of difference between them in our language. Consciousness is confined to the actions of the mind, being nothing else than that knowledge of itself which is inseparable from every thought and voluntary motion of the soul. Conscience extends to all human actions, bodily as well as mental. Consciousness is the knowledge of the existence; conscience, of the moral nature of actions. Consciousness is a province of metaphysics; conscience, of morality.

Consecration of the Elements of the Communion. See EUCHARIST.

CONSECRATION, EUCHARISTIC (Consecratio, Sanctificatio). For the distinction between consecration and benediction, see BENEEDICTION. The general consideration of the doctrine of eucharistic consecration belongs to theology, and the question is considered here only in its relation to the liturgy.

1. The principal formulæ of consecration are given under CANON OF THE LITURGY. The most noteworthy difference between the forms of consecration used in the Eastern and Western churches consists in this, that in the Eastern Church the Holy Spirit is invoked, after the recitation of the words of institution, to descend upon the elements, and make them the body and blood of Christ (see EPICLESIS); and this invocation is commonly thought to imply that consecration would be imperfect without it. In the Western Church the invocation of the Holy Spirit at this part of the liturgy is generally wanting, and the whole consecrating virtue is attributed by Western ritualists to the recitation of the words of institution, accompanied by the fitting gestures. It would seem from the Mozarabic liturgy, however, that such an invocation is an ancient rite which the Latin Church has lost, not an innovation of the Orientals (Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 492 sq.).

2. In the Ordo Romanus, iii, c. 16, the following rubrical directions are given: "After the pope has communicated of the cup, which is held by the archdeacon, the latter pours a portion of the remaining wine into the larger chalice from which the people are to communicate; for wine not consecrated but mingled with the Lord's blood is completely sanctified." The reason of this custom probably was that in a very large congregation it was difficult to consecrate exactly the quantity of wine required. A small portion was, therefore, consecrated in the first instance, and amplified according to the number of communicants by pouring in fresh wine. The whole of the wine in the cup was held to be completely consecrated by mingling with that which had been originally consecrated. The same practice is enjoined in a number of other documents.

3. The placing of a particle of the consecrated bread in the chalice is sometimes called "consecration." See COMMISTIO.

4. On certain days it is an ancient custom not to consecrate the sacred elements. See PRÆSANCTIFICATIO, LITURGY OF.

Consecration Cross. According to the directions of the ancient Western Pontificals, twelve crosses should either be sculptured or painted in different parts of a new church. Generally, they are found inside; but sometimes (as at Uffington Church, in Berkshire) outside the sacred edifice. Occasionally a recessed stone quatrefoil is charged with a floriated brass cross; but ordinarily consecration crosses are painted either on the walls or pillars. An example of a painted cross may be found under the word BRANCH; another specimen of a consecration cross sculptured within a circle is given from the old cathedral church of Brechin, in Consecration Cross.

Scotland. In the act of consecrating a church, a Catholic bishop anoints the twelve crosses with holy chrism, "in the name of the Blessed Trinity, to the honor of God and of the glorious Virgin Mary and of all saints," and specially of the saint whose name the church is to bear. Then the crosses are incensed. A branch for a taper is usually placed opposite each consecration cross, and the taper is lighted during the service of consecration; as also, in some places, on the anniversary of that ceremony.

Consensus SANDOMIRIENSIS. See SANDOMIR.

Consent to Marriage. The marriage-law of all countries turns upon one or other of two principles. Either marriage is viewed as a union between persons, or as the disposal of a property. In the former case, the consent of the parties themselves is the main element in it; in the latter, that of some other person or persons. Still, in legislations founded upon the former principle, the element of consent by others comes in as a salutary check upon rash self-disposal by the young; in those founded upon the latter, the recognition of a right of self-sale in the adult may equally check the too authoritative interference of others.

The Jewish law is in its inception essentially personal. Christ needed but to refer to the first history in the Jewish Scriptures in order to bring out the full spirituality of the marriage relation (Matt. xix, 4; Mark x, 6). In Genesis, the woman is at once brought before us as the one "helpmeet" for the man. God simply brings the woman to the man, who at once recognises her as bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh (ii, 20, 22, 23). As the history proceeds, however, other elements develop themselves. Slavery makes its appearance, and the slave-owner is exhibited as giving the slave in marriage (xvi, 8; xxx, 4).

Throughout the patriarchal history (Gen. xxiv, xxix, xxxiv; Exod. ii, 21), under the law (Exod. xxi, 4, 7, 8; xxii, 17; Deut. xxii, 16), in the time of the judges (Josh. xv, 16, 17; Judg. i, 12; xv, 1, 2; xxi, 1, 7, 8; Ruth iv, 10), under the monarchy (1 Sam. xvii, 25; xviii, 19, 21, 27; 2 Sam. xiii, 13; 1 Kings ii, 17), after the captivity (Nehem. xiii, 25), in our Lord's time (Matt. xxiv, 38; Luke xvii, 27), and in the apostolic Church (1 Cor. vii, 38), the right of the father to give his daughter in marriage, of the king to give one who was under his control, is either assumed or asserted.

Among the Jews the power of self-disposal in marriage was singularly wide for either sex, the man being held of full age, and capable of marrying at his will, on the last day of his fifteenth year, the woman in the second half of her twelfth; while, if betrothed under that age by their fathers, girls could repudiate the engagement at ten. Yet the forms used in Jewish practice belong to the material, and not to the spiritual, view of marriage. The prominence given to the Arrka (q.v.) or earnest, and the necessity for its being presented to the woman herself either in money or money's worth, show clearly that the grand spirituality of marriage had been lost sight of, that it had come to be viewed essentially as an act of wife-buying; and yet the fact that the woman, from earliest puberty, was reckoned as having the sole right of self-sale, preserved an amount of freedom in the contract. See BETROTHAL.

The Roman law starts from the material view to grow more and more into the spiritual one. Originally the father's "power," scarcely to be distinguished from absolute ownership, overshadows all the domestic relations, extending equally to the wife and to the children of both sexes. Eventually, so far as marriage is concerned, the "power" resolves itself simply into a right of consent. Consent is made the very essence of marriage. The validity of marriages contracted by mere consent was admitted in a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 449. This consent, moreover, must be at once that of the parties themselves, and of those in whose "power" they are. The Roman law, indeed, never recognised such a thing as the marriage of slaves, and the unions between them, which might be permitted and even respected by their masters, were of no more legal value than the coupling of domestic animals, although they might be recognised by the superior morality of the Church. Where, indeed, a master gave away, or allowed another to give away, his slave girl in marriage to a freeman, or constituted a dos upon her, Justinian ruled that this should amount to an enfranchisement. But this of itself shows that marriage and slavery were held to be incompatible. See CONTRACT.

Substantially the Church did little else than follow the municipal law on the subject of consent, eventually adopting the Roman civil law as the basis of her own. If we except a canon of doubtful authority attributed either to the fourth or fifth council of Arles (A.D. 524 or 554), and enacting that widows, before professing continence, may marry whom they will, that virgins may do the same, and that none shall be forced to accept a husband against the will of their parents, the earliest Church enactments seem to belong to the British Isles. An Irish synod of uncertain date, presided over by St. Patrick, speaks thus: "What the father wills, that let the girl do, for the head of the woman is the man; but the will of the girl is to be inquired of the father." The so-called Excerpta of Egbert, archbishop of York, in the 8th century, read: "Parents ought to give women to be united to men in marriage, unless the woman absolutely refuse, in which case she may enter a convent;" not a very wide stretch of female freedom. Further on, the husband whose wife has deserted him, and refused for five years to make peace with him, is allowed to marry another woman, "with the bishop's consent."

The council of Friuli (A.D. 791) forbade the marriage of infants, requiring parity of age and mutual consent. The Carolingian capitularies, which have a sort of mixed clerical and civil authority, enact among other things that none shall marry a widow "without the consent of her priest." It is, however, also enacted that women are not to be compelled to marry, under penalty of treble ban and public penance; or, in default of means, of prison or banishment. Lastly, the edict of Charlemagne, in 814, required inquiry to be made, among other things, as to men who had wives "against the will of their parents." See MARRIAGE.

Consentes, in Roman mythology, were the twelve Etruscan deities who formed the council of Jupiter. They are not all known, but include Juno, Minerva, Sammanus, Vulcan, Saturn, Mars; possibly also Vertumnus, Janus, Neptune, Nortia. It was a later error to confound them with the twelve great Grecian deities, Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jove, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo.

Consentius, a lay theologian of the time of Augustine, lived probably in the Balearic islands, and wrote to submit some of his treatises to Augustine's judgment (August. Ep. 119 [221]; ii, 449, ed. Migne).

Consessus CLERI is a name given by Cyprian to the altar-part of the ancient Christian churches, within the rails, where none but the clergy were allowed to enter. See BEMA.

CONSESSUS PRESBYTERIORUM are the seats of the presbyters, in the ancient Christian churches, which were ranged in a semicircle on either side of the bishop.

Consignatio ABLUTORUM is an ancient Latin term for confirmation of the baptized.

Consignatorium. As the act of blessing by the use of the sign of the cross, e.g. in confirmation, is termed consignare, hence the word consignatorium is occasionally used to designate the place set apart for that rite. Bishop John of Naples (about 616) is said to have erected a beautiful building, called consignatorium ablutorum, so arranged that the newly baptized should pass in on one side, be presented to the bishop, who sat in the midst, and then pass out by the other side.

Consistentes (bystanders, συνιστάμενοι) were an order of penitents in the early Church, who derived their name from being allowed to remain and hear the prayers of the Church after the catechumens and other penitents were dismissed, but were not allowed to make their oblations nor partake of the eucharist. They remained in this class two years. See PENITENTS.

Consistories is a term sometimes applied to certain civil courts of judicature among the ancient Jews, commonly known as the Small Sanhedrim. See SANHEDRIM.

Consistory, in the Anglican Church, is the diocesan court of a bishop, in which are tried causes of voluntary jurisdiction, that is, affecting visitations, licenses, institutions, and sequestrations; and contentious or judicial, touching probate of wills and hearing of cases to be decided, the former by a vicar-general, the latter by an official, but now by the chancellor of the diocese. Criminal clerks were committed to the bishop's prison by this court.

Consolāti is a name applied among the Cathari (q. v.), in the 12th century, to those who had received the consolamentum. See COMFORTED.

Consortia, Saint, was a virgin of Clugny, the daughter of Eucherius (q. v.) and Galla, and is said to have declined an offer of marriage and afterwards built a church. She lived about the end of the 6th century, and is commemorated June 22. Her legend is given at length in Bollandus, Acta Sanctorum, June, iv, 250.

Constabile (Lat. Constabiles), PAOLO, an Italian theologian of the Dominican order, was born at Ferrara about 1509. Gregory XIII appointed him inquisitor of Ferrara and master of the sacred palace. He was also elected general of his order, and died at Venice, Sept. 17, 1582, leaving De Causis in Sancto Officio Cognoscendis. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Constable, John, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1674; was presented to the living at Kingoldrum in 1684, and ordained. He died in February, 1708, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 753.

Constable, Thomas, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1772; was licensed to preach in 1783; presented to the living at Liff in 1785, and ordained. He died April 17, 1817, aged sixty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 711.

Constable, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1785; presented to the living at St. Martin's, Perth, in 1802, and ordained. He died Oct. 6, 1836, in his eightieth year. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 663.

Constable, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at St. Albans. He was converted in early life, and began to preach in connection with the conference in 1806, his first station being St. Kitts, W. I. From 1807 he preached in England and Scotland. From 1810 to 1814, "being in doubt with regard to his station in the Church," he retired from the ministry. He finally removed to the Isle of Man, where he died, Oct. 10, 1845. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846, p. 297.

Constance, COUNCIL OF. We give additional particulars of this important synod, from London, Manual of Councils, s. v.:

The council was opened on the 5th November, 1414, with solemn prayer, and the first session was held on the 16th, in which pope John presided, and delivered an address, exhorting all present to give themselves entirely to the business of the council. After this the bull of convocation was read, and the officers of the council were appointed, viz. ten notaries, one guardian of the council, the auditors of the rota, four advocates, two promoters, four officers to superintend all matters relating to arrangement and ceremony. Lastly, the canon of the eleventh Council of Toledo, held in 675, was read, which relates to the gravity and decorum to be observed in such assemblies.

In the interval between the first and second session, John Huss, who, upon the strength of the emperor's safe-conduct, had ventured to Constance, was treacherously seized and thrown into prison by order of pope John XXIII., and his trial commenced. His accusers, who are said to have been also his personal enemies, drew up a catalogue of his imputed errors, which they presented to the pope and to the council. Among other things, they charged him with having taught publicly that the laity had a right to the communion in both kinds; that in the holy sacrament of the altar the substance of the bread remains unchanged after consecration; that priests living in mortal sin cannot administer the sacraments; that, on the contrary, any other person, being in a state of grace, can do so; that by "the Church" is not to be understood either the pope or the clergy; that the Church cannot possess any temporalities, and that the laity have a right to deprive her of them.

In this interval, moreover, vast numbers of temporal and spiritual dignitaries arrived; among others, the well-known Peter Dailé, cardinal of Cambray; also the emperor Sigismund, who, on Christmas day, assisted at mass in the habit of a deacon, and chanted the gospel. In the month of February the deputies of Gregory and Benedict arrived, and now several congregations were held, and steps taken to persuade John to abdicate, on account of his notoriously immoral conduct. It was resolved to take the opinion of the various nations composing the council, and for that purpose it was divided into four classes, according to their nations, viz. 1, Italy; 2, France; 3, Germany; 4, England. From each class a certain number of deputies were elected, having at their head a president, who was changed every month. The deputies of each nation then met separately to deliberate upon such measures as they considered best to propose to the council, and when any one class of deputies had agreed upon a measure, it was carried to the general assembly of the four nations; and if the measure, upon consideration, was approved, it was signed and sealed, to be presented at the next session, in order to receive the sanction of the whole council.

In one of these congregations a list of heavy accusations against pope John XXIII was presented, and, in consequence, deputies were sent to him to engage him to resign the pontificate. He, in answer, promised to do so, if his two competitors would, on their part, engage to do the same. Nevertheless, he put off from day to day making any clear and formal act of cession; and during that time the deputies of the University of Paris arrived, with Gerson, their chancellor.

In the second session (March 22, 1415) John made a formal declaration, accompanied with an oath, to the effect that he would abdicate, if by that means the schism could be healed. But when, in a subsequent congregation, they proceeded to deliberate about a new election to the pontificate, John, disguised in a postilion's dress, secretly escaped from the city to the castle of Schaffhausen. The council proceeded, nevertheless, to labor to effect the union of the Church, and Gerson made a long discourse tending to establish the superiority of the council over the pope. This discourse was the origin of the question, which was then very warmly agitated, viz. whether the authority of an œcumenical council is greater than that of a pope or not?

In the third session (March 25) the cardinal of Florence read a declaration made in the name of the council, by which it is declared, first, that the council is lawfully assembled; secondly, that the flight of the pope cannot dissolve it, and that it shall not separate, nor be transferred to another place, until the union of the Church shall have been effected, and the Church reformed as to faith and morals; thirdly, that John XXIII shall not withdraw his officers from Constance without the approval and consent of the council, nor shall the prelates leave the council without just cause.

The emperor Sigismund was himself present in the fourth session (March 30), in which the cardinal of Florence read the five articles upon which the fathers of the council had agreed. The most worthy of note is the decree which declares that the aforesaid Council of Constance having been lawfully assembled in the name of the Holy Spirit, and forming an œcumenical council of the whole Church militant, has received its authority immediately from our Lord Jesus Christ; a power which every person whatsoever, of whatever state or dignity he may be, even the pope himself, must obey in all matters relating to the faith, the extirpation of schism, and the reformation of the Church in its head and in its members. It was also decreed that the pope should not transfer the council to any other place, and declared null and void all processes and censures directed by the pope against those attending the council.

In the fifth session (April 6) the articles which had been read in the last were a second time read and unanimously approved. The departure of John was declared to be unlawful, and that he would justly subject himself to corporal punishment and imprisonment should he refuse to return. The emperor was charged to arrest all persons endeavoring to quit Constance in disguise. Also the decree of the Council of Rome against the writings of Wycliffe was confirmed.

The emperor was present in the sixth session (April 16), in which pope John XXIII was summoned to present himself at the council, or to issue a bull, declaring that he had vacated the pontificate. A citation was also issued against Jerome of Prague. It is, however, easy to see, by the answer of the latter to the deputies, that his design was only to amuse the council, and thenceforward the fathers resolved to proceed against him as against a notoriously heretic and schismatic.

Letters from the University of Paris to its deputies in the council, and others to the emperor, were read, in which both of the parties are exhorted to proceed firmly with the matter of the union, notwithstanding the pope's absence.

In the interval between the sixth and seventh sessions disputes arose among the theologians as to the form in which the decree condemning the doctrines of Wycliffe should be drawn up; some wishing that this condemnation should be made in the name of the pope, with consent of the council, while others insisted upon the omission of the pope's name altogether. Dailé was of the latter opinion, and he composed a treatise in support of his views: he maintained that the position of his adversaries was heretical, viz. that the council had no authority in itself, except through the pope, its head; for in that case, he urged, the Council of Pisa would have possessed no authority, not having been assembled by any pope; and if so, then the election of John himself would be invalid, since he succeeded Alexander V, who had been elected by the Council of Pisa. In the second place, he maintained that this very Council of Pisa was superior to the pope, from the fact that already two popes had been deposed by it; and that any other œcumenical council would possess the same power (Gerson, Op. ii., 960).

In the seventh session (May 2) John was cited to appear in person with his adherents within nine days, in order to justify himself with respect to the charges of heresy, schism, simony, and various other enormous crimes brought against him; in case of refusal, they declared that they would proceed against him. It may be observed that John, after many removals, had at this time settled at Brissac.

In this session the affair of Jerome of Prague was again discussed.

In the eighth session (May 4) the condemnation of Wycliffe's errors was proceeded with. The errors imputed to him were contained in forty-five articles or propositions. He is said in the first three to deny the doctrine of transubstantiation and a real corporal presence. In 4, to assert that a bishop or priest, in mortal sin, cannot perform the proper functions of his office. 6. That God is obliged to obey the devil. 8. That a bad pope has no power over the Church. 13. That they who hinder preaching will be held excommunicated by Christ in the last day. 16. That the temporal powers may, at will, take away the property of the Church. 18. That tithes are merely charitable offerings, which may be denied to the bad ministers. 27. That all things happen by an absolute necessity. 28. That confirmation, ordination, and consecration of places have been reserved to the pope and to bishops solely for the sake of gain. 29. That universities, schools, etc., are mere vanities, which help the devil as much as they do the Church. 34. That all of the order of mendicants are heretics. 36. That no one entering into any order of religion can keep the divine precept, and therefore cannot attain to the kingdom of heaven. 37. That the Church of Rome is the synagogue of Satan. 38. That the decretals are apocryphal, and the clergy who study them fools. 39. That the emperor and secular princes who endowed the Church were seduced by the devil. 41. That it is not necessary to salvation to believe that the Roman Church is supreme among all other churches. 42. That it is folly to put faith in the indulgences of popes and bishops. 44. That Augustine, Benedict, and Bernard are damned, unless they repented of having had property, and of having entered the religious state. 45. That all religions indifferently have been introduced by the devil. All of these forty-five articles, together with all the books written by him, were condemned, and his bones ordered to be dug up, and cast out of consecrated ground.

In the interval between sessions eight and nine, John XXIII was arrested at Fribourg.

In the ninth session (May 13) a proposition was received from the pope, offering to send three cardinals to the council to answer the charges brought against him; but the council rejected the offer. Two cardinals and five prelates were nominated to summon the pope thrice at the door of the church, and, as he did not appear, an act declaring this citation was drawn up.

After this session the depositions of witnesses against John were taken; among the ten who came forward were bishops, abbots, and doctors.

On the following day, in the tenth session (May 14), the commissioners made their report of the depositions against the pope. After this, having been again cited thrice without appearing, the council proceeded to declare John XXIII convicted of the charges brought against him; viz. of having brought scandal upon the Church by his corrupt life, and of having publicly been guilty of simony, and as such, suspended from the exercise of any of the functions of the papal office, and from every administration, temporal or spiritual, with a prohibition, at the same time, to every Christian, of whatever rank or condition, against obeying him thenceforth directly or indirectly, under penalty of being punished as an abettor of schism. The accusations were contained under seventy heads, all well proved; but fifty only were read in the council (in the following session), relating chiefly to his simony, his worldly life, his vexatious conduct, his false oaths, etc.; other things which decency required to be passed over in silence were suppressed. Sentence of suspension having been thus pronounced, messengers were sent to him to notify to him what the council had decreed. He did not in any way deny the justice of his sentence, and recognised the council as holy and infallible, and at the same time delivered up the seal, ring, and book of supplications, which they demanded of him, begging the council to take measures for his subsistence and honor.

In the eleventh session (May 25) the various heads of the accusation against John XXIII were read. Jerome of Prague, who had endeavored to escape, was arrested, and thrown into prison.

In the twelfth session (May 29) the sentence of deposition against John XXIII having been read, and unanimously approved, was definitively passed; at the same time, all the three competitors for the papacy were declared incapable of being elected again.

In the thirteenth session (June 15) a decree was made, in reply to a petition presented by the Hussites, upon the subject of the communion in both kinds, to this effect, that although Jesus Christ instituted the holy sacrament of the eucharist after supper, under the two kinds of bread and wine, nevertheless, the use sanctioned by the Church is not to celebrate that sacrament after supper, nor even to permit the faithful to receive it otherwise than fasting, except in cases of sickness or other necessity; and that, secondly, although in the primitive Church this sacrament was received by the faithful in both kinds, yet, in after ages, the laity had been permitted to receive in one kind only, viz. the bread, and for this reason, because it ought to be most surely believed that the whole body and the whole blood of Jesus Christ is truly contained under the species of bread; that, therefore, the custom introduced by the Church must be regarded as a law, which may not be rejected or altered at the will of individuals, without the sanction of the Church; and that to maintain that this custom is sacrilegious or unlawful is an error, such that the obstinate perseverance in it deserves to be punished as heresy, and even with the secular arm, if necessary.

In the fourteenth session (July 4) several decrees were read: the first of which forbade to proceed to the election of a new pope, without the consent of the council; also the abdication of Gregory XII was received, being made in his name by Charles de Malatesta and cardinal Dominic. Pedro de Luna was called upon to do the same; but he steadily refused to the day of his death, which happened in 1434.

In the fifteenth session (July 6) the trial of Huss, who was brought before the council, was terminated. The promoters of the council denounced that the articles preached and taught by John Huss, in Bohemia and elsewhere, being heretical, seditious, deceitful, and offensive to pious ears, should be condemned by the council, and that the books from which they were extracted should be burned. Huss not being willing to retract, was condemned to be degraded and given over to the secular arm, and in the end was cruelly burned alive, on the 6th of July, 1415.

In the same session, the opinion of John Perit, a doctor of Paris, was condemned as heretical, scandalous, and seditious; he maintained that any individual had a right to take away the life of a tyrant, and that the deed was even meritorious; no sentence, however, was passed upon the author of this opinion, who was protected by the duke of Burgundy and other powerful friends.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth sessions (July 11, 15) preparations were made for the departure of king Sigismund, who proposed to go in person to the king of Aragon, to induce him to renounce the cause of Pedro de Luna.

In the eighteenth session (Aug. 17) various decrees were made, one declaring the same credit and obedience to be due towards the bulls of the council as to those of the holy see.

In the nineteenth session (Sept. 23) Jerome of Prague, terrified by the horrible end of Huss, was induced to make a recantation of the errors imputed to him. A declaration was also made, in which it was stated that, notwithstanding the safe-conduct of kings, inquisition might always be made into the conduct of heretics.

In the twentieth session (Nov. 21) the differences between the bishop of Trent and duke Frederick of Austria were discussed. The twelve chapters of Narbonne, agreed upon between king Sigismund and the deputies of the council and the deputies of Benedict, were approved.

After the session, an assembly was held to consider the reformation of the Church, and the repression of simony.

Also, in the interval between the twentieth and twenty-first sessions, several congregations were held. In one, the affair of John Perit was further discussed; in another, Jerome of Prague, whose recantation was suspected, being brought forward, boldly declared that he had not sincerely retracted, spoke of Huss as a saint, and proclaimed his entire adherence to his doctrine, and to that of Wycliffe.

In the twenty-first session (May 30, 1416) Jerome was again brought before the council, and revoking his forced recantation, spoke boldly in favor of his original opinions; sentence was then passed upon him, he was declared to be a relapsed heretic, was excommunicated and anathematized, and, lastly, was handed over to the secular arm, and burned.

Measures were taken in the twenty-second session (Oct. 15) to unite the Aragonese to the council, they having acknowledged Benedict XIII.

In the twenty-third session (Nov. 5) the proceedings against Benedict XIII (Pedro de Luna) commenced, and he was definitively condemned in the thirty-seventh, when he was deposed, and declared to be a perjurer, and to have brought scandal upon the whole Church, etc.; and, as such, the council degraded and deposed him, deprived him of all his dignities and offices, forbidding him thenceforward to consider himself as pope, and all Christian people to obey him, under pain of being dealt with as abettors of schism and heresy.

In the thirty-eighth session (July 28, 1417), the decree of the council, annulling all sentences and censures uttered by Benedict XIII against the ambassadors or allies of the king of Castile, was read.

In the thirty-ninth session (Oct. 9) the question of Church reform was entered upon, and several decrees made, one of which declares the necessity of frequently holding councils, in order to check the progress of heresy and schism; and directs that another œcumenical council shall be held five years after the dissolution of the present; a third, seven years after the second; and after that, one every ten years, in a place appointed by the pope at the close of each council, with the approbation and consent of the council; in case of war or pestilence, the pope, with the concurrence of the cardinals, to have power to appoint any other place, and to hasten, but not to retard, the time for assembling. Another decree provides for cases of schism, and orders that, when there shall be two claimants of the papal chair, a council shall be held in the very next year, and that both claimants shall suspend every administration until the council shall have commenced its sittings. The third decree relates to the profession of faith which the newly elected pope was to make in the presence of his electors; in it eight œcumenical councils are recognized, besides the general councils of Lateran, Lyons, and Vienna. A fourth decree is directed against the translation of bishops.

In the fortieth session (Oct. 30) a decree containing eighteen well-matured articles of reformation was proposed. It was there provided that the new pope, whom they were about speedily to elect, should labor to reform the Church, in its head and in its members, as well as the court of Rome, in concert with the council, or the national deputies. Its principal articles relate to the annates, the reserves of the apostolic see, the collations to benefices, and the expectatives; what canons may or may not be carried to Rome; in what cases it is lawful to depose a pope, and how it can be done; to the extirpation of simony, to dispensations, to indulgences, and to tithes.

The article upon the annates or first-fruits was very warmly discussed by the cardinals and national deputies, but the latter finally declared that it was necessary to suppress them altogether, and chiefly for this reason, that whereas they had originally been but a voluntary offering to the Roman see, they had subsequently been made, under pretext of custom, an obligatory payment. In fact, we find no mention of annates before the time of Clement V, who for three years imposed them upon England, but was opposed by the parliament. Boniface IX was the first who pretended to claim them as a right attached to the dignity of sovereign pontiff. Moreover, the taxing of benefices was pronounced a simoniacal exaction.

In the forty-first session (Nov. 8) it was decreed, that, for this time alone, six prelates of different nations should be chosen within the space of ten days, in order to proceed to the election of the pope with the college of cardinals. Accordingly the electors held a conclave, and on November 11 after, cardinal Colonna was elected pope, and took the style of Martin V. After his coronation, the national deputies having required of him that he would labor to effect a reformation of the Church, he renewed his promise to do so.

In the forty-second session (Dec. 23) the new pope presided, and the emperor was present. A bull was read, releasing the emperor from the custody of Balthazar, and ordering him to be delivered over to the pope. The national deputies presented to the pope a memorial on the subject of reform. Martin, troubled by their importunity, gave in a scheme of reformation, based upon the eighteen articles proposed in session forty.

Between this and the forty-third session the pope issued a bull confirming the acts, etc., of the Council of Constance. In the edition of Haguenau, A.D. 1500, this bull is regarded as the act of the council itself, whereas in other editions it appears to be the pope who approves and confirms the council. However this may be, the first article of this bull is worthy of remark, for in it Martin declares that any one suspected in the faith shall swear that he receives all the œcumenical councils, and especially that of Constance; which proves that the pope considered this council lawful and œcumenical, and as he desired that all the acts of this council should be received by all persons, he thereby approves that passed in the fifth session, which declares the superiority of the council to the pope.

In the forty-third session (March 21, 1418) decrees were published restraining the abuse of exemptions and dispensations, and condemning simony. The canons relating to modesty of dress in ecclesiastics were renewed, but no other objects of reform were proposed besides those contained in the decree of the fortieth session, and of them six only were drawn up in this forty-third session. The reformation of the college of cardinals and of the court of Rome, which had been decreed by the council, was passed over without notice.

In the forty-fourth session (April 19) the pope, in order to satisfy the decree made in the thirty-ninth session, appointed Pavia for the meeting of the next council.

On April 29, 1418, the last session was held. After the celebration of high mass, the pope read a discourse to the council, which being ended, one of the cardinals, by order of the pope and council, dismissed the assembly with the words, "Go in peace." This council lasted three years and a half.

See Labbe, Concil. xii, 1-294.

Besides this most celebrated council, there are notices of other synods held at Constance, of which we give a brief account from Richard et Giraud, Bibliothèque Sacrée, viii, 118:

I. Held in 1044, at which Henry IV of Germany proclaimed a general peace (Labbe, ix: Hardouin, vi).

II. Convened in 1094, by Gebhard of Hirschan, bishop of Constance and legate of pope Urban II, on points of Church discipline, especially the incontinence of priests, simony, and fasting (Labbe, x: Hardouin, vi).

Constans. See CONSTANTINE; CONSTANTINUS.

Constans is a supposed bishop of Winchester, A.D. 293, according to Rudborne (Stubbs, Register, p. 153).

Constans, an Irish saint, was a priest and anchorite of Eo-inis, in Lough Erne, and is commemorated Nov. 14.

Constant (DE REBEQUE), David, a Swiss philosopher, was born at Geneva, March 16, 1638. He pursued his studies in Germany, Holland, and France, under Maresius, Cocceius, Amyraut, and other reformed scholars, with whom he allied himself in friendship. On his return to Lausanne, in 1658, he consecrated himself to the Church, and was appointed pastor at Coppet in 1664. In 1674 he became principal of the college of Lausanne, in 1684 professor of Greek, and in 1708 professor of theology. He died there, Feb. 17, 1733, leaving Traité de la Providence (Leyden, 1679):—Florus, cum Notis Philologicis et Historicis (Geneva, 1684):—Erasmii Colloquia, cum Notis (ibid.):—Systema Ethico Theologicum (Lausanne, 1689):—Transitus per Mare Rubrum (Geneva, 1690):—Dissertationes de Uzore Iothi, Rubo Mosis et Serpente Aeneo (Lausanne, 1693):—Dissertatio de Zelo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Constant, Philippe. See CONTANT.

Constantia, sister of the emperor Constantine the Great, and wife of the emperor Licinius, was the patroness of Eusebius of Cæsarea and of Arius. She is said to have imbibed the views of the latter—at least, through her influence the emperor Constantine was led to invite Arius to his court, where he soon established an exclusive influence (Robertson, Hist. of the Christ. Church, bk. ii, chap. i; Ceillier, iii, 250, 417).

Constantia, Saint, a martyr at Nuceria, under Nero, is commemorated Sept. 19 in Usuard's Martyrology.

Constantianus, Saint, abbot and recluse, was born in Auvergne in the beginning of the 6th century, and died A.D. 570. He is commemorated Dec. 1 (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Fræ. i, 398, 863).

Constantin, BONIFACE, a French theologian, belonging to the Jesuit order, was born at Magni (near Geneva) in 1590, was professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Lyons, and died at Vienne, Dauphiné, Nov. 8, 1651. He wrote, Vie de Cl. de Granger Evêque et Prince de Genève (Lyons, 1640):—Historia Sanctorum Angelorum Epitome (ibid. 1652), a singular work upon the history of angels. He also wrote some other works on theology. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Constantine (or Constantius), Saint, is represented as a bishop, whose deposition occurred at Gap, in France. He is commemorated April 12 (Gallia Christiana, i, 454). See also CONSTANTINUS.

Constantine OF CONSTANTINOPLE, deacon and chartophylax of the metropolitan Church of Constantinople, lived before the 8th century. There is a MS. in the library of the Escurial, a Greek discourse upon the holy martyrs, entitled Oratio Encomiastica in Omnes Sanctos Martyres. This discourse is often cited in the Acta of the second Council of Nice, which proves that Constantine lived before the holding of this council, or before the 8th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v.

Constantino, MANOEL, a Portuguese scholar, was born at Funchal, Madeira. He became established at Rome, and taught philosophy there. Later he was appointed clerk of the sacred college and professor of theology in the Roman gymnasium. He had acquired a rare facility for writing Latin, without, however, neglecting the study of history, to which he devoted himself closely. He died at Rome in 1614. He wrote, Insulæ Mæritæ Historia, connected with Orationes Dm Habitæ Coram Clemente VII et Gregorio XIII (Rome, 1599):—Historia de Origine atque Vita Regum Lusitanæ (ibid. 1601):—Carmine Varia (ibid.). These poems were published separately at different dates. He also published at Rome a remarkable work on the origin and history of the kings of Portugal. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantinople, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Constantinopolitanum). The large number of these, and the great importance of several of them, justify a fuller treatment, which we give from Landon, Man. of Councils, s. v., and Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

I. Held A.D. 336, by the Eusebians, under Eusebius of Nicomedia, at which Athanasius was exiled to Treves, Marcellus of Ancyra, with several other bishops, deposed, and Arius ordered to be received into communion by the Alexandrian Church. According to Rufinus (Hist. i, 12) it was convened by order of the emperor, viz. Constantine the Great; and according to Eusebius, the historian (Contra Marcell. i, 4), it was exclusively gathered together from the neighborhood of the capital. It seems to have met in February, and not separated till the end of July. See Mansi, Concil. ii, 1167-1170.

II. Held A.D. 339 or 340, by order of the emperor Constantius II, to depose Paul, the newly elected bishop there, whose orthodoxy displeased him, and translate Eusebius, his favorite, from Nicomedia to the imperial see. See Mansi, Concil. ii, 1275.

III. Held A.D. 360, composed of deputies from the Council of Seleucia, just ended, with some bishops summoned from Bithynia to meet them, about fifty in all. Most of the former were partisans of the metropolitan of Cæsarea, whose name was Acacius, and semi-Arians. A creed was published by them, being the ninth, says Socrates, that had come out since that of Nicæa. It was, in fact, what had been rehearsed at Rimini, with the further declaration that neither substance nor hypostasis were permissible terms in speaking of God. The Son was pronounced to be like the Father, according to the Scriptures, and Aetius, who maintained the contrary opinion, was condemned. A synodical epistle to George, bishop of Alexandria, whose presbyter he was, conveyed the sentence passed upon him and his followers. Several bishops were deposed at the same time, among them Cyril of Jerusalem—all for various causes. Ten bishops, who declined subscribing to these depositions, were to consider themselves deposed till they subscribed. Ulphilas, bishop of the Goths, who had hitherto professed the Nicene faith, was one of those present, and joined in their creed. See Mansi, Concil. iii, 825.

IV. Held A.D. 382 or 380, in which sixty-two bishops excommunicated and deposed Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, for his errors in faith concerning the Holy Spirit. See Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. cent. iv, pt. ii, ch. v.

V. The second general council, met in May, A.D. 381, to reassemble the following year, for reasons explained by the bishops in their synodical letter. Owing to this circumstance, and to the fact that its acts have been lost, its proceedings are not easy to unravel. Socrates begins his account of it (Hist. v, 8) by saying that the Emperor Theodosius convened a council of bishops of the same faith as himself, in order that the creed settled at Nicea might prevail, and a bishop be appointed to the see of Constantinople. That the bishops met at his bidding is testified by themselves in their short address to him subsequently, to confirm what they had decreed. Whether they reassembled at his bidding we are not told. Of their number there has never been any dispute, this council having, in fact, gone by the name of that of "the one hundred and fifty fathers" ever since. There were thirty-six bishops of the Macedonian party likewise invited, but they quitted Constantinople in a body when they found that it was the faith of the Nicene fathers to which they would be called upon to subscribe. Of those present, Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, Meletius of Antioch, who presided at first, Cyril of Jerusalem, with the two Gregories, of Nazianzum and Nyssa, were the most considerable, Nectarius and Flavian being added to their number before they separated. The names of all who subscribed have been preserved (Dionys. Exig. ap Justell. Bibl. Jur. Canon. ii, 502).

The first question considered was that relating to the Church of Constantinople, and it was declared that Maximus, called the Cynic, had not been lawfully made bishop; that his ordination, and all that he had since done in his pretended character of bishop, was null and void, and that, in fine, he was a usurper of the see of Constantinople. Then they proceeded to elect to the see Gregory Nazianzen, and eventually, notwithstanding his entreaties and tears, obliged him to accept the office. During these proceedings Meletius died, and Gregory of Nazianzum succeeded him as president of the council. He endeavored with all his powers to induce them to leave Paulinus in the see of Antioch, with the view of appeasing the divisions of that Church; but his efforts were ineffectual. The bishops of Macedonia and of Egypt (who had now arrived) vehemently opposed his designs, objecting also to his election, upon the ground that, being already bishop of another see, he ought not to have been translated to that of Constantinople. In consequence of this, Gregory formed the resolution to entreat the fathers to permit him to resign the see of Constantinople, which he in the end did, and Nectarius was elected in his room. During this interval Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, presided over the council; but Nectarius, immediately after his election, took that office upon himself. Now, Nectarius had been a priest in the latter city, but so far from having passed through the inferior degrees, as the canons direct, he had not been even baptized.

Seven canons and a creed appear to have been submitted to the emperor by the assembled fathers for confirmation, at the close of their labors. Whether any canons have been lost seems to admit of some doubt. Socrates speaks of the establishment of patriarchs as one of the things done by this council; and the Arabic paraphrase, under a separate heading, "concerning the order of the prelates, and their rank and place," explains this as follows: "Honor besides, and the primacy, was granted in this council to the bishop of Rome, and he was made first, the bishop of Constantinople second, the bishop of Alexandria third, the bishop of Antioch fourth, and the bishop of Jerusalem fifth"—which is the more remarkable as neither it nor Socrates omits the canon ordaining special prerogatives for new Rome. It is some difficulty connected with these canons, that in all probability they were not all passed at the same council.

1. Confirms the faith of the council of Nicea, and anathematizes ("extrema execratione ac detestatione") all who deny it, especially the Arians, Eunomians, Eudoxians, Sabellians, Apollinarians, and others.

2. Forbids bishops to go beyond their borders, and to trouble other dioceses. Orders that the bishop of Alexandria shall have the sole administration of Egypt, and that the privileges given to the Church of Antioch by the Nicene canons shall be preserved. Orders that the affairs of the Asian, Pontic, and Thracian dioceses shall be severally administered by their respective bishops, and that the synod of each province shall administer the affairs of the province, according to the canon of Nicea.

3. By this canon the primacy of honor is given to the bishop of Constantinople after the bishop of Rome, on account, as it states, of the former being "the new Rome."

4. Declares the nullity of the consecration and of the episcopal acts of Maximus.

5. As regards the books of the Western Church, we have also received those in Antioch, who confess one and the same divinity in the three persons of the Holy Trinity.

6. Lays down a rule for ecclesiastical judgments, and permits all persons whatever to bring an accusation against a bishop or any other ecclesiastic on account of any private injury or wrong said to have been received; but in Church matters it directs that no accusation shall be received coming from heretics or schismatics, or from persons excommunicated or deposed, or accused of any crime, before they shall have justified themselves.

7. Gives direction as to the manner in which heretics ought to be received into the Church: Arians, Macedonians, Sabbathians, Novatians, Quartodecimani, and Apollinarians were simply to be required to renounce their errors in writing, to anathematize all heresies, and to be anointed with the holy chrism on the forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, and ears, that they might receive the Holy Spirit. Others, such as the Eunomians (who baptized with one immersion), Montanists, Sabellians, etc., were to be received as catechumens, i. e. to be catechised, exorcised, and baptized.

See Labbe, Concil. ii, 911.

Of the heretics named in canon 1 the Semi-Arians engaged most attention by far here, from the further error into which they had fallen of late respecting the divinity of the Holy Ghost. All that was ruled by this council on doctrine was directed against them exclusively.

By the word "diocese," in canon 2, is meant a tract embracing several provinces.

Most probably, the third canon, ordaining that in future the see of Constantinople should take honorary precedence next after Rome, was intended to prevent the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria from ever attempting to take such liberties with it again.

Dionysius Exiguus ends his canons of this council with the fourth. Traces of a new series appear with the fifth. It runs as follows: "Concerning the tomes of the Westerns, we, too, have received those who professed their belief, at Antioch, in one Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." What was this tome of the Westerns? Some think it was the synodical epistle received from pope Damasus by the Easterns at their second meeting, A.D. 289, to which they wrote their own in reply. Others, with better reason, hold that it was a synodical letter of pope Damasus, addressed to the synod of Antioch A.D. 278 or 279. A third view is, that it was another of his to Paulinus of Antioch some years before. Athanasius sent a letter, in the name of his synod at Alexandria, A.D. 282, to the Church of Antioch, which he calls "a tome" himself, to which Paulinus is expressly said to have subscribed, and in which the indivisibility of the Holy Ghost from the substance both of the Father and the Son is as distinctly set forth as it ever was afterwards. Through Eusebius of Vercelli, to whom it was addressed, and by whom it was in due time subscribed, it would find its way into the West and to Rome, as the rallying-point of the orthodox, and a bond of union, under existing circumstances, between the sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, whose acceptance of its doctrine can scarce have become known to each other before Macedonius, the ex-patriarch of Constantinople, commenced assailing the divinity of the third person in the Godhead. On this, it would immediately give rise to, and be the foundation of, a series of "tomes" or epistles of the same kind between them, in which Constantinople, being in Arian hands, would take no part, nor Alexandria much, owing to the banishment of its orthodox prelate, Peter, from A.D. 273 to 278, under Valens. Meletius had also been driven from Antioch a year earlier: but his orthodox rival, Paulinus, was allowed to remain; and this would account for the correspondence that went on between him and pope Damasus uninterruptedly while Meletius was away, and of which the prominent topic was the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Now, the synods of Antioch and Rome are confusedly given about this time, yet several were probably held at each place. One thing may well be thought to have been agreed upon at the first synod of Antioch, and possibly Rome too, which was afterwards confirmed in the second, and is evidently referred to by the Constantinopolitan fathers in their synodical letter, namely, the creed, in its enlarged form. Admit this form to have been agreed upon at the synod of Antioch, in conjunction, or not, with that of Rome, A.D. 272, and the use of it in the year following by Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, as the authorized creed of the Church, is explained; nor is there any reason why Gregory Nyssen, if he composed it at all—as stated by Nicephorus alone—should not have composed it there. But Valens coming to Antioch in April, to persecute the orthodox, the probability would be that this synod was hastily broken up, and remained in abeyance till A.D. 378 or 379, when its proceedings were resumed under Meletius, and confirmed by one hundred and sixty-three bishops, and with its proceedings this creed. All, at the same time, then and there subscribed to the Western tome or letter of pope Damasus. Hence, both the language of the fifth Constantinopolitan canon above mentioned, and of the fathers who framed it, in their synodical letter, where they say that “this, their faith, which they had professed there summarily, might be learned more fully by their Western brethren, on their being so good as to refer to ‘the tome’ that emanated from the synod of Antioch, and that set forth by the oecumenical council of Constantinople the year before, in which documents they had professed their faith at greater length.” Now, what they had set forth themselves was their adherence to the Nicene faith and reprobation of the heresies enumerated in their first canon; what they had received from Antioch and accepted must have been the creed which has since gone by their name, but was certainly not their composition; and whatever else was confirmed there, A.D. 378, including the Western tome. The letter of pope Damasus to Paulinus was written A.D. 372, when there was nobody left at Antioch but Paulinus to write to. The letter addressed in his own name and that of the ninety-three bishops with him, “to the Catholic bishops of the East,” was “the tome” received by the synod at Antioch A.D. 378-9; to which they replied the same year. Both letters being on the same subject—as were the synods of 372 and 378-9—it was easy to confuse them.

We now come to the synodical letter of the reassembled Council of Constantinople, A.D. 382, and their proceedings generally. Most of the bishops who had met at Constantinople, A.D. 381, returned thither the following summer. One of their number, Aschollus, bishop of Thessalonica, and Epiphanius and Jerome with him, had gone meanwhile to Rome. Being at Constantinople, they received a synodical letter from the West, inviting them to Rome, where a large gathering was in contemplation. This letter having been lost, we can only guess at its contents from what they say in reply to it, coupled with their fifth canon, which was evidently framed in consequence. The affairs of the East being in imminent peril and confusion, they beg to be excused from going away so far from their sees. The most they could do would be to send deputies into the West. Cyriacus, Eusebius, and Priscianus are named, to explain their proceedings, which they then epitomize, commencing with what has been anticipated above about their faith, and ending with the statement that Nectarius and Flavianus had been appointed canonically to their respective sees, while Cyril was recognised by them as bishop of Jerusalem for the same reason. Thus this letter explains the framing of their fifth canon, and attests its date. The same date is assigned to canon 6, restricting the manner of instituting proceedings against bishops, and reprobating appeals to the secular power. But canon 7, prescribing the distinctions to be observed in admitting heretics into communion, is shown not to belong to this council at all. It is almost identical with the ninety-fifth Trullan canon. Of the creed, little more need be added. It was in existence A.D. 373, having probably been framed at Antioch, in conformity with the synodical letter of Athanasius, A.D. 372, where it was doubtless confirmed A.D. 378-9, and received more probably by the fifth canon of this council A.D. 382, than promulgated separately by the council of the year preceding. Possibly this may have been the creed called by Cassian, as late as A.D. 430, “peculiarly the creed of the city and Church of Antioch.” From the portion of it given by him it is as likely to have been this as that of A.D. 363, or any other between them. That there is a family likeness between it and the creed of the Church of Jerusalem, commented on by Cyril, will be seen on comparing them. On this hypothesis alone we can understand why no notice should have been taken of it at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and in the African code, namely, because it had originated with a provincial, and only been as yet received by a general council. It was promulgated as identical with that of Nicea for the first time by the fathers of the fourth council.

The dogmatic professions of the council of 381 were confirmed by Theodosius in a constitution dated July 30 of the same year, and addressed to Antonius, proconsul of Asia, by which the churches are ordered to be handed over to the bishops in communion with Nectarius and others who composed it, the Eunomians, Arians, and others having been deprived of their churches by a constitution issued ten days earlier. It was also received by pope Damasus, and has been regarded in the West ever since, so far, as oecumenical. Its first four canons, in the same way, have always been admitted into Western collections. But what passed at the supplemental council of 382 never seems to have been confirmed or received equally. It was in declining to come to this last council that Gregory Nazianzen said, in his epistle to Procopius, “that he had come to the resolution of avoiding every meeting of bishops, for he had never seen any synod end well, or asseuage rather than aggravate disorders.” His celebrated oration, known as his “farewell” to the council of 381, is inspired by a very different spirit.

See Mansi, Concil. iii, 583.

VI. Held A.D. 382, in order to appease the divisions of Antioch, to which see Flavianus had been nominated in the preceding council, during the lifetime of the actual bishop, Paulinus. Most of the bishops who were present at that council also attended here. Nothing certain is known of the proceedings, except that the election of Flavianus was confirmed, and a letter to the Western Church written, to excuse the Orientals from attending the council at Rome held at the same time. A declaration of faith was added on the subject of the Blessed Trinity as well as of the Incarnation. This council further declared that Nectarius had been duly elected to the see of Constantinople, according to the Nicene canons, and it also recognised the election of Flavianus to Antioch. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1014.

VII. There was a meeting of bishops held at Constantinople, by command of Theodosius, A.D. 383, under Nectarius, to devise remedies for the confusion created by so many sees passing out of the hands of the heterodox into those of the orthodox party. The Arian, Eunomian, and Macedonian bishops were required to attend there with confessions of their faith, which the emperor, after examining carefully, rejected in favor of Nicea. The Novatians alone, receiving this, were placed by him upon equal terms with the orthodox. It is said to have been on this occasion that Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, on entering the palace, made the usual obeisance to Theodosius, but took no notice of Arcadius, his son, standing at his side (Socrates, Hist. v, 10).

VIII. Held A.D. 394, Sept. 29, on occasion of the dedication of the church of the Apostles Peter and Paul, built by Rufinus, prefect of the Prætorium. The dispute concerning the bishopric of Bostra was brought before this council. Nectarius of Constantinople presided, in the presence of Theophilus of Alexandria, Flavianus of Antioch, Gregory of Nyssa, Palladius of Casarea in Cappadocia, and many other bishops of note. It was determined, that although three bishops are sufficient to consecrate, a larger number is required in order to depose. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1151.

IX. Held A.D. 399, attended by twenty-two bishops under Chrysostom, to inquire into seven capital charges brought against Antoninus, bishop of Ephesus. As he died before the witnesses could be examined, Chrysostom, at the request of the Ephesian clergy, went over thither, and, at the head of seventy bishops, appointed Heraclides, a deacon, in his place, and deposed six bishops who had been ordained by Antoninus. Their proceedings contain a reference to the canons of the African Church. Strictly speaking, this last was a synod of Ephesus. See Mansi, Concil. iii, 991.

X. Held A.D. 403, by forty or sixty bishops, in support of Chrysostom, unjustly deposed by the pseudo council, “ad Quercum,” because of his non-appearance there. Although Arcadius had weakly confirmed this deposition, and banished him into Bithynia, his exile lasted but for one day, for the empress Eudoxia, frightened by a terrible earthquake which happened at the time, sent after him to recall him, and he re-entered Constantinople in triumph. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1331.

XI. Held in the same year. After the restoration of Chrysostom to his bishopric, he ordered those priests and bishops who, upon his condemnation, had intruded into the sees and benefices of his followers, to be deposed, and the rightful pastors to be restored; he then demanded of the emperor that his own cause should be considered in a lawful synod. Sixty bishops assembled, who came to the same conclusion with the last council, viz. that Chrysostom had been unlawfully deposed in the council “ad Quercum,” and that he should retain the bishopric. See Socrates, Hist. viii, 19.

XII. Held A.D. 404, to sit in judgment on Chrysostom, who had been recalled from exile by the emperor and retaken possession of his see, from which he had been deposed by the synod "ad Quercum." Theophilus of Alexandria was not present on this occasion, having had to fly Constantinople on the return of his rival. Still, he was not unrepresented; and Chrysostom had by this time provoked another enemy in the empress Eudoxia, whose statue he had denounced, from the games and revels permitted to be held round it, in offensive proximity to his church. At this synod he seems to have given attendance when the question of his former deposition was argued. Thirty-six bishops had condemned him; but sixty-five bishops, he rejoined, had, by communicating with him, voted in his favor. It is not implied in these words that a synod was actually sitting in his favor now, any more than during the synod "ad Quercum," the deputies from which found him surrounded, but not synodically, by forty bishops, in his own palace. The fourth or twelfth canon of the Council of Antioch was alleged by his opponents: his defence was that it was framed by the Arians. As quoted by his opponents, it was differently worded from what either the fourth or twelfth are now; possibly there may have been an Arian version of these canons, against which his objection held good. The synod, however, decided against him, and his banishment to Comana, on the Black Sea, says Socrates—to Cucusus, in Armenia, say others—followed, where he died.

XIII. Held A.D. 426, on the last day of February, when Sisinnius was consecrated bishop there, in the room of Atticus. Afterwards, the errors of the Massalian, or Eucrites, were condemned, at the instance of the bishops of Iconium and Sida. A severe sentence was passed on any charged with holding them after this denunciation. See Mansi, Concil. iv. 343.

XIV. Held A.D. 428, on the death of Sisinnius, when the well-known Nestorius was consecrated. See Mansi, Concil. iv. 543.

XV. Held A.D. 431, Oct. 25, four months after Nestorius had been deposed, to consecrate Maximian in his place. This done, Maximian presided, and joined in a synodical letter, enclosing that of the Council of Ephesus, with its first six canons, as they are called, to the bishops of ancient Epirus, whom attempts had been made to detach from orthodoxy. Letters were written likewise by him and by the emperor to pope Celestine, Cyril, and other bishops, to acquaint them with his elevation, at which all expressed themselves well pleased. Another synod appears to have been held by him the year following, for restoring peace between his own church and that of Antioch. See Mansi, Concil. v. 257-292, 1045-1060.

XVI. Held A.D. 443, probably to consider the case of Athanasius, bishop of Perrhe, on the Euphrates, afterwards deposed at Antioch under Domnus. See Mansi, Concil. vi. 463.

XVII. Held A.D. 448, Nov. 8, under Flavian, to inquire into a dispute between Florentius, metropolitan of Sardis, and two of his suffragans; but while sitting, it was called upon by Eusebius, bishop of Dorylæum, one of its members, who had, as a layman, denounced Nestorius, to summon Eutyches, archimandrite of a convent of three hundred monks, and as resolute an opponent of Nestorius as himself, on a charge that he felt obliged to press against him. The charge was that he recognised but one nature in Christ. Messengers were despatched to invite Eutyches to peruse what Eusebius had alleged against him. A reply was brought subsequently from Eutyches, that he refused to quit his monastery. A second and third citation followed in succession. Then he promised attendance within a week. At last he appeared, made profession of his faith, and was condemned—thirty-two bishops and twenty-three archimandrites subscribing to his deposition from the priesthood and monastic dignity. The proceedings occupied altogether seven sessions, the last of which was held Nov. 22. Its acts were recited in a subsequent council of the year following at Constantinople; at Ephesus, also, the year following, under Dioscorus; and again, in the first session of the Council of Chalcedon. See Mansi, Concil. vi. 495, 649; Labbe, Concil. iii. 1466.

XVIII. Held A.D. 449, April 8, of thirty bishops under Thalassius, archbishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, by order of the emperor, to re-consider the sentence passed on Eutyches by the council under Flavian, on a representation from the former that its acts had been falsified. This, however, was proved untrue. Another session was held April 27, on a second petition from Eutyches, to have the statement of the official or silentary, who had accompanied him to the council under Flavian, taken down. This officer declared to having seen the instrument containing his deposition before the session was held at which it was resolved on. The acts of this council are likewise preserved in the first session of that of Chalcedon. See Mansi, Concil. vi. 503, 753.

XIX. Held A.D. 450, at which Anatolius was ordained bishop; and at which, some months afterwards, at the head of his suffragans and clergy, he made profession of his faith and subscribed to the celebrated letter of Leo to his predecessor Flavian, in the presence of four legates from Rome, charged to obtain proofs of his orthodoxy. See Mansi, Concil. vi. 509. All the bishops, abbots, priests, and deacons at the time in Constantinople were present. Nestorius and Eutyches, together with their dogmas, were anathematized. The pope's legates returned thanks to God that all the Church was thus unanimous in the true faith. Several of the bishops who had yielded to the violence of Dioscorus in the Latrocinium were present in this assembly, and having testified their sorrow for what they had done, desired to condemn the act with its authors, in order to be received back into the communion of the Church; they were subsequently received into communion, and restored to the government of their respective churches. See Labbe, Concil. iii. 1475.

XX. Held A.D. 457, under Anatolius, by order of the emperor Leo, whom he had just crowned, to take cognizance of the petitions that had arrived from Alexandria for and against Timothy Ælurus, who had been installed bishop there by the opponents of the Council of Chalcedon, and to consider what could be done to restore peace. The council anathematized Ælurus and his party. See Mansi, Concil. vii. 521, 869.

XXI. Held A.D. 459, under Geunadius. Eighty-one bishops subscribed to its synodical letter, still extant, in which the second canon of the Council of Chalcedon is cited with approval against some simoniacal ordinations recently brought to light at Galatia. See Mansi, Concil. vii. 911.

XXII. Held A.D. 478, under Acacius, in which Peter, bishop of Antioch, surnamed the Fuller, Paul of Ephesus, and John of Apamea, were condemned; and a letter addressed to Simplicius, bishop of Rome, to acquaint him with, and request him to concur in, their condemnation. A letter was addressed at the same time by Acacius to Peter the Fuller himself, rebuking him for having introduced the clause "Who was crucified for us" into the Trisagion, or hymn to the Trinity. This letter has been printed as issued from a synod five years later, when, in fact, there was no such synod. See Mansi, Concil. vii. 1017 sq.

XXIII. Held A.D. 492, under Euphemius, in favor of the Council of Chalcedon; but as he declined removing the name of his predecessor, Acacius, from the sacred diptychs, he was not recognised as bishop by popes Felix and Gelasius, to whom he transmitted its acts, though his orthodoxy was allowed. See Mansi, Concil. vii. 1175.

XXIV. Held A.D. 496, by order of the emperor Anastasius I, in which the Henoticon of Zeno was confirmed, Euphemius, bishop of Constantinople, deposed, and Macedonius, the second of that name who had presided there, substituted for him. See Mansi, Concil. viii. 186.

XXV. Held A.D. 498, by order of the emperor Anastasius I, in which Flavian, the second bishop of Antioch of that name, and Philoxenus of Hierapolis, took the lead: condemning the Council of Chalcedon and all who opposed the Monophysite doctrine, or would not accept the interpolated clause "Who was crucified for us," in the Trisagion. But it seems probable that this council took place a year later, and that another had met a year earlier, under Macedonius, less hostile to the Council of Chalcedon than this, and of which this was the reaction. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 197.

XXVI. Held A.D. 518, July 20, by order of the emperor Justin, at which the names of the councils of Nicæa, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon; of Leo of Rome, with Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople, were restored in the sacred diptychs; and Severus and all other opponents of the fourth council anathematized. Count Gratius was despatched to Rome by the emperor with letters from himself and the patriarch to pope Hormisdas, hoping that peace might under these circumstances be restored between them. The Easterns had to anathematize Acacius of Constantinople by name, and to erase his and the names of all others, Euphemius and Macedonius included, who had not erased his previously, from the sacred diptychs, before the pope would readmit them to his communion. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 435 sq.; Labbe, Concil. iv, 1586.

XXVII. Held A.D. 531, under Epiphanius, who was then patriarch, to inquire into the consecration of Stephen, metropolitan of Larissa, within the diocese of Thrace, which had been made without consulting him. Stephen, having been deposed by him on these grounds, appealed to Rome; but the acts of the synod held there to consider his appeal are defective, so that it is not known with what success. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 739.

XXVIII. Held A.D. 533, between the Catholics and followers of Severus; the latter were silenced, and many of them returned into the Church. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1763.

XXIX. Held A.D. 536. According to some, three synods were held in Constantinople this year: (1) In which pope Agapetus presided and deposed Anthymus, patriarch of Constantinople; but this the emperor Justinian had already done, besides confirming the election of Mennas in his stead, at the instance of the clergy and people of the city. Agapetus, who had come thither on a mission from Theodatus, king of the Goths, having previously refused his communion, had unquestionably procured his ejection; and he afterwards consecrated Mennas, at the request of the emperor. (2) In which a number of Eastern bishops met to draw up a petition to the pope, requesting him to call upon Anthymus, subsequently to his deposition, but previously to his going back to Trebizond, from which he had been translated, for a retraction of his denial of two natures in Christ; but this can hardly be called a council; and the death of the pope stopped any definitive action on his part. (3) Under Mennas, after the death of the pope, consisting of five actions, the first of which took place May 2, Mennas presiding, and having on his right, among others, five Italian bishops, who had come to Constantinople from the late pope. The first thing brought before the council was a petition from various monastic bodies in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Mount Sinai, to the emperor, begging that the sentence, stayed only by the death of the pope, against Anthymus, might be carried out; a general account of what had passed between them and the pope followed; their petition to him was produced by the Italian bishops present and recited; after it another petition to him from some Eastern bishops on the same subject; and his own letter to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem, in reply. Desirous of following out his decision, the council sent deputies to acquaint Anthymus with its proceedings, and bid him appear there within three days. The second and third actions passed in sending him similar summonses, but, as he could not be found, his condemnation and deposition were at length decreed in the fourth action by the council and its president, and signed by seventy-two bishops or their representatives, and two deacons of the Roman Church. At the fifth and last action a number of documents were recited, mainly referring to Peter, bishop of Apamea, Severus, and other Monophysites. All these having been read, an anathema was passed upon Peter, Severus, and Zoaras, one of their followers, by the council now sitting, and then by Mennas, its president; according to the order observed in the fourth action in passing sentence upon Anthymus. Eighty-eight bishops or their representatives, and two deacons of the Roman Church, as before, subscribed on this occasion. A constitution of the emperor addressed to Mennas confirmed their sentence. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 869 sq.; Labbe, Concil. v, 1 sq.

XXX. Held A.D. 538 (541, or 543), under Mennas, by order of the emperor Justinian, in support of his edict against the errors of Origen, denounced to him in a petition from four monks of Jerusalem, placed in his hands by Pelagius, a Roman envoy, whom he had sent thither on a different errand, with the express object of injuring Theodore, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, surnamed Acidias, who defended Origen. His edict is in the form of a book against Origen, and addressed to Mennas. It was communicated to the other patriarchs and to pope Vigilius. The council backed it by fifteen anathemas against Origen and his errors, usually placed at the end of the acts of the fifth general council, with which this council came to be subsequently confused, in consequence of their respective acts having formed one volume. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 487 sq.

XXXI. Held A.D. 546, under Mennas, to assent to the first edict, now lost, of the emperor Justinian against the three chapters the year before. Some authors pass over this council, and substitute for it another, supposed to have been held by pope Vigilius the year following, after his arrival in February (A.D. 547), at which it was decided to refer passing sentence upon the three chapters to the meeting of the general council about to take place. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 125; Labbe, Concil. v, 390.

XXXII. Held A.D. 553, the fifth general council, by order of the emperor Justinian, with Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople, for president; pope Vigilius being on the spot all the time, but declining to attend: indeed, he was not even represented there. The council opened on May 4, in the cathedral. In the first and second sessions, which were styled conferences, Eutychius, the patriarch of Constantinople, Apollinarius of Alexandria, and Domnus of Antioch were present, together with three bishops, deputies of Eustachius, the patriarch of Jerusalem; there were in all one hundred and sixty-five bishops, among whom were five Africans, the only bishops who attended from the West. The following is a summary of its causes and proceedings, with their results:

As far back as his election, A.D. 537, Vigilius had been secretly pledged to the empress Theodora, who favored the Monophysite party, to assent to the condemnation of the three chapters; and this step had been pressed upon the emperor all the more warmly since then, in consequence of the condemnation of the Origenists in a council under Mennas the year following. Theodore, bishop of Cæsarea, a devoted Origenist, and friend of the empress, pointed it out, in fact, as a means of bringing back a large section of the Monophysites to the Church. Their opposition to the fourth general council, he averred, lay in the censure supposed to be given by it to these writings: 1. The works of Theodore, bishop of Mopuestia; 2. The letter of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, to Maris; and 3. What Theodore, bishop of Cyrrhus, had published against Cyril—the third, however, he forbore to name—all held to be tainted with Nestorianism. By condemning them, he seems to have expected that the authority of the council that had treated their authors so favorably would be undermined. Justinian, acting on his advice, had already condemned them twice (A.D. 545 and 551), and the first time had been followed by Vigilius, whose Judgment, published at Constantinople, A.D. 548, is quoted in part by the emperor in his address to this council on its assembling. But Vigilius had (A.D. 547) declared against coming to any decision on the subject till it had been discussed in a general council; and to this he went back on ascertaining what indignation his Judgment had caused in Africa and in the West, and excommunicated Mennas and Theodore for having gone farther. Accordingly, the emperor decided on summoning this council to examine and pronounce upon them; and Eutychius, the Constantinopolitan patriarch, addressed a letter to Vigilius, which was read out at its first session, May 6, requesting him to come and preside over its deliberations. Vigilius assented to their joint examination by himself and the council, but was silent about his attendance. Three patriarchs and a number of bishops accosted him personally, with no better success.

At the second session or collation, a second interview with him was reported, in which he definitively declined attending; and even on a message from the emperor he would not undertake to do more than examine the chapters by himself, and transmit his opinion on them, not to the council, but to him. Some bi-hops of Africa and Illyria excused themselves to the deputation sent to invite their attendance.

At the third collation the fathers commenced the real business for which they had been convened. They pledged themselves to the exact doctrine and discipline laid down in the four general councils, each and all, preceding their own; one and the same confession of faith had sufficed for them in spite of all the heresies they had met to condemn, and should suffice now. All things in harmony with it should be received; and all things at variance with it rejected. Having thus pledged themselves to the fourth council among the rest, the fathers proceeded to the examination of the three chapters in their fourth collation. This was on May 12. Extracts having accordingly been read out from various works of Theodore, both he and they were judged worthy of condemnation.

The next day, or the fifth collation, passages for or against Theodore, Cyril, and others, were produced and weighed; and authorities, particularly Augustine, cited in favor of condemning heretics, although dead. At the close of the sitting, extracts from the writings of Theodoret, against Cyril, were recited; on which the fathers remarked that the fourth council had acted wisely in not receiving him till he had anathematized Nestorius.

The sixth collation took place May 19. During the interval Vigilius issued his Constitutum, dated May 14, in the form of a synodical letter addressed to the emperor, answering and condemning a number of the positions of Theodore, but pleading for Theodoret and Ibas, as having been acquitted by the fourth council. However, the council at its sixth collation found the letter of Ibas in question contrary to the Chalcedonian definition, and anathematized it accordingly; but its author escaped.

At the seventh collation, May 26 or 30, a communication was read from the emperor in deprecation of the Constitutum, addressed to him by the pope, May 14, and on which there had been a good many messages between them, in vain, since. No less than six documents were recited, proving that Vigilius had expressly condemned the three chapters as many times; the last of them, a deposition signed by Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, and a lay dignitary, to the effect that Vigilius had sworn to the emperor in their presence to do all he could for the condemnation of the three chapters, and never say a word in their favor. Next, an inquiry, by order of the emperor, respecting a picture or statue of Theodoret, said to have been carried about at Cyrrhus in procession, was reported. Lastly, the imperial mandate, which ordained that the name of Vigilius should be removed from the sacred diptychs for his tergiversations on the subject of the three chapters. Unity with the apostolic see would not, he adds, be thereby dissolved, inasmuch as neither Vigilius nor any other individual could, by his own change for the worse, mar the peace of the Church. To all this the council agreed.

Finally, reviewing at its eighth collation, June 2, in a singularly well-written compendium, all that it had done previously, and vindicating the course about to be pursued, the council formally condemned the three chapters, and with them the author of the first of them—Theodore—pronouncing its definitive sentence in fourteen anathemas, almost identical with those of the emperor, and in which the heresies and heresarchs thus condemned are specified: Origen among the number, in the eleventh, though not in the corresponding one of the emperor. He had been previously condemned in the council under Mennas A.D. 528, as we have seen. Of these anathemas the Greek version is still extant; of almost every other record of its proceedings the Latin version alone remains. Vigilius, after taking some time to consider, announced his assent to them in two formal documents: the first a decretal epistle, dated Dec. 8 of the same year, and addressed to the Constantinopolitan patriarch, in which, as he says, after the manner of Augustine, he retracts all that he had ever written differently; and the second, another Constitutum of great length, dated Feb. 28 of the year following, but without any heading or subscription in its present form. He died on his way home, and Pelagius, the Roman envoy who had been instrumental in condemning Origen, had thus, on becoming pope, to vindicate the condemnation of the three chapters by this council, in the West, where they had been defended all but unanimously, and were upheld obstinately by more than three parts of Italy still. The second Pelagius, twenty-five years later, in his third letter to the bishops of Istria, said to have been written by Gregory the Great, then his deacon, apologized for the conduct of his predecessors and his own therein, by referring to the occasion on which Peter was reproved by Paul (Gal. ii. 11). Gregory, when pope, settled the matter by affirming that he venerated the fifth council equally with the four preceding.

No canons seem to have been passed by this council: many points connected with it are still doubtful; and the documents published as belonging to it greatly need re-arranging.

See Mansi, Concil. ix, 151-651; Labbe, Concil. v, 411, sq.

XXXIII. Held A.D. 565, at which the emperor Justinian endeavored to get the errors of Julian of Halicarnassus, a well-known Monophysite, who maintained the incorruptibility of the body of Christ antecedently to his resurrection, approved, by banishing those who opposed them. See Mansi, Concil. ix, 765.

XXXIV. Held A.D. 587, at which a foul charge brought against Gregory, patriarch of Antioch, by a banker of his diocese, was examined. He was honorably acquitted and his accuser punished. This may have been the synod summoned as a general one by the Constantinopolitan patriarch John, in virtue of his assumed title of oecumenical patriarch, and for which he was so severely taken to task by pope Pelagius II; but for this no direct proof is adduced. This is referred to in a letter of Gregory the Great to that patriarch, and a further letter of his some time later, when Cyriacus was patriarch, whose plan of holding another synod for the same purpose he would seem to have anticipated. Mansi conceives this synod to have been held A.D. 598 (Concil. ix, 481).

XXXV. Held A.D. 626, under Sergius, to consider the question raised by Paul, a Monophysite of Phasis, in Lazica, and Cyrus, its metropolitan—afterwards translated to Alexandria—before the emperor Heraclius, whether one or two wills and operations were to be ascribed to Christ. Sergius pronounced in favor of one operation and one will; thereby founding the heresy called Monothelism. The question may have originated with Athanasius, patriarch of the Jacobites in Syria, on his promotion to the see of Antioch by Heraclius four years later. See Mansi, Concil. x, 585.

XXXVI. Held A.D. 639, under Sergius, and continued—unless there were two distinct councils this year—under Pyrrhus, his successor, at which the exposition of faith by the emperor Heraclius, favorable to Monothelism, was confirmed. Parts of its acts, with the "exposition" in full, were recited in the third sitting of the Lateran, under Martin I, A.D. 649. See Mansi, Concil. x, 673.

XXXVII. Held A.D. 665, by order of the emperor Constant II, at which Maximus, the great opponent of the Monothelites, was condemned. See Mansi, Concil. xi, 78.

XXXVIII. Held A.D. 666, under Peter, patriarch of Constantinople, and attended by Macedonius of Antioch and the vicar of the patriarch of Alexandria, at which Maximus was condemned a second time, with his disciples. See Mansi, Concil. xi, 78.

XXXIX. The sixth general council, held in the banqueting-hall of the palace, called Trullus from its domed roof, and lasting from Nov. 7, A.D. 680, to Sept. 16 of the ensuing year. It was convened by the emperor Constantine Pogonatus, in consequence of a request made to him by the patriarchs of Constantinople to permit their removing from the sacred diptychs the name of pope Vitalian, lately deceased, while they were for retaining that of Honorius. In short, they wished to commemorate none of the popes after Honorius till some disputes that had arisen between their own sees and his had been settled, and some newly-coined words explained. Donus dying before this letter could reach Rome, it was complied with at once by his successor, Agatho, who sent three bishops, on behalf of his synod, and two presbyters, and one deacon named John—who subsequently became pope as John V—in his own name, to Constantinople, “to bring about the union of the holy churches of God.” On hearing from the “œcumenical pope,” as he styles him, to that effect, the emperor issued his summons to George, patriarch of Constantinople—whom he styles œcumenical patriarch—and through him to the patriarch of Antioch, to get ready to come to the council with their respective bishops and metropolitans. Mansuetus, metropolitan of Milan, who had formed part of the Roman synod under Agathos, sent a synodical letter and profession of faith on behalf of his own synod, and Theodore, bishop or archbishop of Ravenna, who had formed part of the same synod, a presbyter, to represent him personally. The number of bishops actually present, it is said, was two hundred and eighty-nine, though the extant subscriptions are under one hundred and eighty. Thirteen officers of the court were there likewise, by command of the emperor, who attended in person, and were ranged round him—on his left were the representatives of the pope and his synod, of the archbishop of Ravenna, and of the patriarch of Jerusalem, then Basil, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, and the remaining bishops “subject to Rome”—his right being occupied by the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, a presbyter representing the patriarch of Alexandria, the bishop of Ephesus, and “the remaining bishops subject to Constantinople.” The business of the council was concluded in eighteen actions or sessions, as follows:

1 (Nov. 7, 680). The legates of Agathos having complained of the novel teaching of four patriarchs of Constantinople, and two other primates, that had for forty-six years or more troubled the whole Church, in attributing one will and operation to the Incarnate Word, Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, and two suffragans of the see of Constantinople favorable to this dogma, briefly replied that they had put out no new terms, but only believed and taught what they had received from general councils and from the holy fathers on the point in question, particularly the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, named by their opponents, and Honorius, formerly pope of elder Rome. Whereupon the chartophylax, or keeper of the archives of the great Church, was ordered by the emperor to fetch the books of the œcumenical councils from the library of the patriarch. As nothing was said of the acts of the first and second councils on this occasion, we must infer they had been lost previously. The chartophylax was told to produce what he had brought; and immediately two volumes of the acts of the third council were recited by Stephen, a presbyter of Antioch in waiting on Macarius, who forthwith contended that some of Cyril's expressions were favorable to him.

2 (Nov. 10). Two volumes of the acts of the fourth council were read, when the legates of Agathos pointed out that two operations were attributed to Christ by pope Leo.

3 (Nov. 13). Two volumes of the acts of the fifth council were read, when the legates protested that two letters of pope Vigilius, contained in the second volume, had been interpolated, and that a discourse attributed in the first to Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople, was spurious. This last having been proved on the spot from internal evidence, its recital was stopped, the emperor directing further inquiry to be made respecting the letters of the pope.

4 (Nov. 15). Two letters from Agathos were recited—one to the emperor, in his own name, the other to the council, in his own name and that of a synod of one hundred and twenty-five bishops, assembled under him at Rome, previously to the departure of his legates. The burden of both is the same, namely, that what had been defined as of faith by the five general councils preceding it was the summit of his ambition to keep inviolate. Several passages in the Latin version of these letters, on the prerogatives of the Church of Rome, are not found in the Greek. Either, therefore, they have been interpolated in the one, or suppressed in the other.

5 (Dec. 10). Two papers were exhibited by Macarius, and recited, of which the first was headed, “Testimonies from the holy fathers confirmatory of there being one will in Christ, which is also that of the Father and the Holy Ghost.”

6 (Feb. 12, 681). A third paper from Macarius, to the same effect as the other two, having been read, the reading of all three was commanded by the emperor, and intrusted to his own officials and those belonging to the sees of Rome and Constantinople. On the legates affirming that the quotations contained in them had not been fairly made, authentic copies of the works cited were ordered to be brought from the patriarchal library to compare with them.

7 (Feb. 13). A paper headed “Testimonies from the holy fathers demonstrating two wills and operations in Christ” was produced by the legates, and read. Appended to it were passages from the writings of heretics, in which but one will and operation was taught. This paper also was ordered to be sealed, by the emperor.

8 (March 7). The passages adduced by Agathos from the fathers, and by his synod, in favor of two wills and operations, having been examined and confirmed, were pronounced conclusive by all present except Macarius; and the petition to have the name of Vitalian erased from the diptychs was withdrawn by George, the existing patriarch of Constantinople, amid great applause. Macarius being then called upon to make his profession, proved himself a Monothelite; and was convicted of having quoted unfairly from the fathers in his papers, to support his views.

9 (March 8). Examination of the papers of Macarius having been completed, he and his presbyter Stephen were formally deposed as heretics by the council.

10 (March 18). The paper exhibited by the legates was taken in hand; and after a most interesting comparison between it and the authentic works in the patriarchal library, was declared thoroughly correct in its citations; a profession of faith was received from the bishop of Nicomedia and some others, in which Monothelism was abjured.

11 (March 20). A long and remarkable profession of faith, contained in a synodical letter of Sophronius, late patriarch of Jerusalem, and the first to oppose Monothelism, was recited; and after it, at the request of the legates, some more writings of Macarius, since come to hand, that proved full of heresy.

12 (March 22). Several more documents belonging to Macarius having been received from the emperor through one of his officers, which he professed not to have read himself, some were looked through and pronounced irrelevant, but three letters were recited at length, two from Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, and one from pope Honorius in reply to one of these. Search in the patriarchal archives and proper investigation placed the genuineness of all three beyond doubt. A suggestion brought from the emperor, that Macarius should be restored in the event of his recanting, was peremptorily declined by the council.

13 (March 28). Both the letters of Sergius before mentioned and that of Honorius to him were declared heretical; and he and his successors, Pyrrhus, Peter, and Paul, Cyrus of Alexandria, and Theodore, bishop of Pharan—on all of whom Agathos had passed sentence previously—with Honorius, whom Agathos had passed over, were definitively cast out of the Church—the only sentence of the kind ever decreed against any pope. Finally, search having been made for all other works of the same kind in the archives, all that could be found were brought out and recited. A large number were pronounced heretical, and burned as such. Letters of Thomas, John, and Constantine, patriarchs of Constantinople, were read likewise, but their orthodoxy was allowed.

14 (April 1). Returning to the letters of pope Vigilius that had been called in question, it was ascertained by careful inquiry that each of the volumes of the fifth council had been tampered with; in one case by inserting the paper attributed to Mennas, in the other by interpolating the letters of Vigilius, in support of heresy. The council ordered both falsifications to be cancelled, besides anathematizing them and their authors. A sermon of Athanasius was produced by the bishop of Cyprus, in which the doctrine of two wills in Christ was clearly laid down. At this sitting Theophanes, the new patriarch of Antioch, is first named among those present.

15 (April 26). Polychronius, a presbyter, undertaking to raise a dead man to life in support of his heretical views, and failing, was condemned as an impostor, and deposed.

16 (Aug. 9). Constantine, another presbyter, affecting to have devised some formula calculated to reconcile Monothelism with orthodoxy, was proved in agreement with Macarius, and similarly condemned. In conclusion, all who had been condemned were anathematized, one after the other, by name, amid cheers for the orthodox.

17 (Sept. 11). The previous acts of the council were read over, and its definition of faith published for the first time.

18 (Sept. 16). The definition having been once more published, was signed by all present, and received the assent of the emperor on the spot, amid the usual acclamations and reprobations. It consisted of three parts: a. An introduction, proclaiming entire agreement on the part of the council with the five previous councils, and acceptance of the two creeds promulgated by them as one. b. Recital of the two creeds of Nicea and Constantinople in their pristine forms. c. Its own definition, enumerating all previously condemned for Monothelism, once more by name, and mentioning with approbation the declaration of pope Agathos and his synod against them, and in favor of the true doctrine, which it proceeded to unfold by course; then reiterating the decree passed by previous councils against the framers and upholders of a faith or creed other than the two forms already specified; and including finally in the same condemnation the inventors and disseminators of any novel terms subversive of its own rulings.

Proceedings terminated in a remarkable address to the emperor on behalf of all present, which was read out, showing that the doctrine of the Trinity had been defined by the first two councils, and that of the Incarnation by the next four, of which this was the last; and a still more remarkable request was appended to it—that he would forward the definition, signed by himself, to the five patriarchal sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; which we are told expressly was done. In conclusion, a letter was despatched to the pope in the name of the council, informing him that he would receive a copy of its acts through his legates, and begging that he would confirm them in his reply. The emperor, on his part, exhorted all to receive them, in a special edict; and, as he had promised, addressed a letter in his own name to the Roman synod, dated Dec. 28, A.D. 681 (Agathos dying, according to Cave, Dec. 1), and another to Leo II, soon after his accession, the year following, bespeaking their acceptance. This the new pope granted without hesitation in the fullest manner, even to the condemnation of Honorius as having betrayed the faith; all which he repeated to the bishops of Spain, in sending them a Latin translation of the acts of this council.

It is admitted on all hands that no canons were passed. Several anecdotes of this council found their way into the West. Bede tells us, for instance, that such was the honor accorded there to the legates of Agathos that one of them, the bishop of Oporto, celebrated the eucharist in Latin on Low Sunday, in the Church of St. Sophia, before the emperor and patriarch. Cardinal Humbert asserts it was then explained to the emperor that unbleven bread was enjoined by the Latin rite. But the two striking incidents of this council were: 1. The arrangement of the "bishops subject to Rome," and those "subject to Constantinople" on opposite sides; and, 2. The anathemas passed on pope and patriarch alike.

XL. Held A.D. 691, in or not earlier than September. The fathers composing it, in their address to the emperor Justinian II, say that they had met at his bidding to pass some canons which had long been needed, owing to the omission of the fifth and sixth councils, contrary to the precedent of the four first, to pass any, whence this council has been commonly styled the quini-secundum, or a supplement to both. It is, indeed, best known as the Trullan, from the hall of the palace in which it was held, although the sixth council had met there also. The number of bishops subscribing to its canons is two hundred and thirteen, of whom forty-three had been present at the sixth council, and at their head, instead of after them, as at the sixth council, the emperor, who signs, however, differently from the rest, as merely accepting and assenting to what had been defined by them. A blank is left immediately after his name for that of the pope, showing clearly that the pope was not represented there; and blanks are subsequently left for the bishops of Thessalonica, Heraclea, Sardinia, Ravenna, and Corinth, who might, had they been present, have been supposed to be acting for him. Basil, indeed, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, is set down as subscribing on behalf of the whole synod of the Roman Church; but then he is similarly set down among the subscriptions to the sixth council, not having been one of the three deputies sent thither from Rome, and afterwards, in the letter addressed to Agathos by the council, only signing for himself and his own synod. Hence there seems little ground for supposing him to have represented Rome there in any sense. Anastasius, in his life of Sergius I, who was then pope, says that the legates of the apostolic see were present, and deluded into subscribing; but there is nothing in the subscriptions to confirm this, and of the acts nothing further has been preserved. Great controversy prevails as to the extent to which this council has been received in the West: œcumenical it has never been accounted there, in spite of its own claim to be so; and when its canons were sent in six tomes to Sergius, himself a native of Antioch, for subscription, he said he would die sooner than assent to the erroneous innovations which they contained. John VII, the next pope but one, was requested by the emperor to confirm all that he could, and reject the rest; but he sent back the tomes untouched. Constantine is supposed to be the first pope to confirm any of them; but this is inferred solely from the honorable reception given to him at Constantinople by Justinian. Adrian I, in his epistle to Tarasius, read out at the seventh council, is explicit enough: "I, too, receive the same six holy councils, with all the rules constitutionally and divinely promulgated by them; among which is contained" what turns out to be the eighty-second of these canons, for he quotes it at full length. The first canon of the seventh council, confirmed by him, is substantially to the same effect. But the exact truth is probably told by Anastasius, the librarian. "At the seventh council," he says, "the principal see so far admits the rules said by the Greeks to have been framed at the sixth council, as to reject in the same breath whichever of them should prove to be opposed to former canons, or the decrees of its own holy pontiffs, or to good manners." All of them, indeed, he contends had been unknown to the Latins entirely till then, never having been translated; neither were they to be found even in the archives of the other patriarchal sees where Greek was spoken, none of whose occupants had been present to concur or assist in their promulgation. This shows how little he liked these canons himself, nor can it be denied that some of them were dictated by a spirit hostile to the West.

1. The council declared its adherence to the apostolic faith, as defined by the first six œcumenical councils, and condemned those persons and errors which in them had been condemned.

2. The canons which they received and confirmed were set forth, viz. the eighty-five canons attributed to the apostles, those of Nicæa, Ancyra, Neo-Cæsarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, and those of the œcumenical councils of Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, also those of the councils of Sardica and Carthage, and those of Constantinople, under Nectarius and Theophilus; further, they approved the canonical epistles of Dionysius of Alexandria, of Athanasius, Basil of Cæsarea, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory the Divine, Amphilochius of Iconium, of Timothy, Theophilus, and Cyll of Alexandria, of Gennadius, and, lastly, a canon of Cyprian.

3. Enacts that all priests and deacons who, being married to a second wife, refuse to repent, shall be deposed; that those whose second wives are dead, or who have repented, and live in continence, shall be forbidden to serve at the altar, and to exercise any priestly function in future, but shall retain their rank; that those who have married widows, or who have married after ordination, shall be suspended for a short time, and then restored, but shall never be promoted to a higher order.

4. Restrains the arrogance of deacons; forbids them to take precedence of priests.

5. Forbids clerks to keep taverns.

6. Forbids familiarity with Jews.

7. Allows (notwithstanding the decrees of the Roman Church to the contrary) that married men, when raised to holy orders, should keep their wives and cohabit with them, excepting on those days on which they are to celebrate the holy communion; and declares that no person otherwise fit and desirous for ordination shall be refused on account of his being married, and that no promise shall be extorted from him at the time of ordination, to abstain from his wife, lest God's holy institution of matrimony be thereby dishonored; orders further, that they who shall dare to deprive any priest, deacon, or sub-deacon of this privilege, shall be deposed, and that, also, any priest or deacon separating from his wife on pretence of piety, shall, if he persist, be deposed.

8. Enacts that men be not ordained priests before they are thirty years of age, or deacons before twenty-five. Deaconesses to be forty.

9. Sub-deacons to be twenty.

10. Forbids clerks to go from one church to another.

11. Orders those who preside over churches to teach the people at least every Sunday; forbids them to explain Scripture otherwise than the lights of the Church and the doctors have done in their writings.

12. Orders that deposed clerks, who remain impenitent, shall be stripped of every outward mark of their clerical state, and be regarded as men of the world; those who are penitent are permitted to retain the tonsure.

13. Against simony.

14. Forbids to require any fee for administering the holy communion.

15. Forbids all in the sacerdotal order to be present at plays, and orders such as have been invited to a wedding to rise and depart before any thing ridiculous is introduced.

16. Declares that in some parts of Armenia water was not mixed with the wine used at the altar; condemns the novel practice; sets forth the foundation for the catholic use, and orders that every bishop and priest who refuses to mix water with the wine, "according to the order handed down to us by the apostles," shall be deposed.

17. Decrees that the see of Constantinople, according to the canons of Constantinople and Chalcedon, shall have equal privilege with the throne of old Rome.

40. 41. Of those who shall be admitted into the monastic state.

42. Of hermits.

43. Orders that the wife of one who has been raised to the episcopate, having first separated from her husband of her own free-will, shall be kept, at the bishop's expense, in a monastery far from him, or shall be promoted to the deaconate.

44. Forbids a man to marry her to whose children by a deceased husband he has become godfather.

45. Forbids any to fast on Saturdays and Sundays, even during Lent.

46. Forbids to eat eggs or cheese in Lent.

47. Forbids to offer milk and honey at the altar.

48. Forbids a lay person to administer to himself the holy mysteries, when there is a bishop, priest, or deacon present; offenders to be separated for a week, "that they may be thereby taught not to be wiser than they ought to be."

49. Forbids lay persons to teach, and bids them rather learn of others who have received the grace to teach.

50. Orders all the faithful, for seven days after Easter, to occupy themselves at church in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs.

51. Forbids to eat the blood of any animal; offenders, if clerics, to be deposed.

52. Forbids injury to any of the books of the Old and New Testament.

53. Forbids lay persons to enter the altar-rails.

54. Forbids marriage with heretics.

55. Forbids the use of the cross lying upon the ground, lest by treading on it men should dishonor it.

56. Forbids to celebrate the Agapæ in churches.

57. Relates to the manner of singing psalms to be observed.

58. Forbids to administer the holy eucharist to dead bodies.

59. Orders the baptism of those of whose baptism there exists any doubt.

60. Forbids to take any beast into a church, unless in case of great need a traveller be compelled to do so.

61. Orders the faithful to observe Good Friday with fasting and prayer, and compunction of heart, until the middle of the night of the great Sabbath.

62. Forbids to kneel at church from Saturday night to Sunday night.

63. Of penance and absolution.

This council receives all the apostolical canons, eighty-five in number, though at that time but fifty were received in the Roman Church, but rejects the apostolical constitutions as having been interpolated, and containing many spurious things. Accordingly, the code of the Eastern Church was authoritatively settled, apart, of course, from the one hundred and two canons now added to it, which were formally received themselves, as we have seen, by the second council of Nicæa, and reckoned over afterwards as the canons of the sixth council. Their general character is thoroughly Oriental, but without disparagement to their practical value. See Mansi, Concil. xi, 921 sq.; xii, 47 sq.; Labbe, Concil. vi, 1124 sq.

XLI. Held A.D. 712, in the short reign of Philip-picus or Bardanes, and under the Monothelite patriarch of his appointment, John VI; at which the sixth council was repudiated and condemned. The copy of its acts belonging to the palace was likewise burned by his order, as we learn from the deacon who transcribed them, and the picture of it that hung there removed. On the death of the tyrant, indeed, John addressed a letter to pope Constantine, to apologize for what had been done; but its tone is not assuring. He testifies, however, to the authentic tomes of the sixth council being safe still in his archives. See Mansi, Concil. xii, 187 sq.

XLII. Held A.D. 715, Aug. 11, at which the translation of Germanus from the see of Cyzicus to that of Constantinople was authorized. He had been a party to the Monothelite synod under John three years before; but immediately after his translation he held a synod—most probably in 714, of which this was a continuation—in which he condemned Monothelism. See Mansi, Concil. xii, 255 sq.; Labbe, Concil. vi, 1451.

XLIII. Held A.D. 730, or, rather, a meeting in the imperial palace, at which the emperor Leo III, better known as the Isaurian, called upon Germanus, the aged patriarch, to declare for the demolition of images, which he had just ordered himself in a second edict against them. The patriarch replied by resigning. See Mansi, Concil. xii, 269 sq.; Labbe, Concil. vi, 1461.

XLIV. Held A.D. 754, from Feb. 10 to Aug. 8, by order of the emperor Constantine Copronymus, and styling itself oecumenical, or the seventh council, though its claim to both titles has since been set aside in favor of the second council of Nicæa, in which its decrees were reversed. There is no record of its acts extant but what is to be found in the sixth session of that council, where they were cited only to be condemned. As many as three hundred and thirty-eight bishops attended it, but the chief see represented there was that of Ephesus. Their proceedings are given in six tomes, as follows:

1. They deduce the origin of all creature-worship from the devil, to abolish which God sent his Son in the flesh.
2. Christianity being established, the devil, they say, was determined to bring about a combination between it and idolatry; but the emperors had opposed his designs. Already six councils had met, and the present one, following in their steps, declared all pictorial representations unlawful, and subversive of the faith which they professed.
3. Two natures being united in Christ, no one picture or statue could represent Christ as he is; besides, his only proper representation is in the eucharistic sacrifice, of his own institution.
4. There was no prayer in use for consecrating images, nor were representations of the saints to be tolerated any more than of Christ, for Holy Scripture was distinctly against both.
5. The fathers, beginning with Epiphanius, having been cited at some length to the same purpose, the council decreed unanimously that all likenesses, of whatsoever color and material, were to be taken away, and utterly disused in Christian churches.
6. All clergy settling up or exhibiting reverence to images in church or at home were to be deposed; monks and laymen anathematized. Vessels and vestments belonging to the sanctuary were never to be turned to any purpose in connection with images. A series of anathemas was directed against all who upheld them in any sense, or contravened the decrees of this council. Germanus, the late patriarch of Constantinople, George of Cyprus, and John of Damascus, or Maneur, as he was called by the Saracens, were specially denounced as image-worshippers. The usual acclamations to the emperor followed. Before the council separated, Constantine, the new patriarch, was presented to it and approved.

See Mansi, Concil. xii, 575; xiii, 203 sq.; Labbe, Concil. vi, 1661 sq.

XLV. Held A.D. 786, Aug. 2, by the Iconodulists, but broken up by the violence of the opposite party. See Ignatius of Constantinople, Vita Tarasii.

XLVI. Held A.D. 815, by the Iconoclasts, under the emperor Leo; the abbots of Constantinople excused themselves from attending, and the monks deputed to bear to the council their reasons for so doing were driven from the assembly; also, those of the bishops who differed in opinion from the dominant party were trampled upon and maltreated. The council condemned the acts of the second council of Nicæa, A.D. 787, and decreed that all paintings in churches should be defaced everywhere, the sacred vessels destroyed, as well as all Church ornaments. This council has never been recognized by the Western Church. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1299.

XLVII. Held A.D. 842, by the emperor Michael and Theodora, his mother. This council confirmed the second council of Nicæa, anathematized the Iconoclasts, restored images to the churches, deposed the patriarch John, and elected Methodius in his stead. In memory of this council the Greek Church still keeps the second Sunday in Lent (the day on which it was held) holy, as the festival of orthodoxy. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1782.

XLVIII. Held A.D. 858, by the bishops of the province of Constantinople, first, on account of the banishment of Ignatius, the patriarch of Constantinople, by the emperor Bardas, to whom he had justly refused communion after having charitably warned him of the scandal occasioned by his irregular life. They deposed Photius, who had been intruded into the see, with anathema, as well against himself as against all who should dare to acknowledge him to be patriarch. This Photius was one of the most learned and able men of his age; but, led astray by his boundless ambition, by his artifices he procured his election to the patriarchate, although a layman, and was consecrated by Gregory Aebasta, the deposed bishop of Syracuse, Dec. 25, 857.

Forty days after his consecration he held a council, in which sentence of deposition and anathema was pronounced against Ignatius and his followers; and in 861 he convoked another council, at which three hundred and eighteen bishops (including the pope's legates) attended, together with the emperor Michael and a large number of lords and people. To this council Ignatius, having been cited, refused to come, protesting against its irregularity, but some days afterwards he was seized and forcibly brought before it. After a sort of mock trial, he was condemned, and sentence of deposition passed upon him; he was then imprisoned, and subjected to great cruelties. The pope, it should be added, had been deceived into sending legates to this council, and the latter, when at Constantinople, by threats were forced to yield an assent to its proceedings. Ignatius subsequently, in order to deliver himself from the cruelties which he endured, signed (or rather was forced to sign) a confession declaring that he had been unlawfully elevated to the see; after this he was delivered from prison, and escaped from Constantinople. Photius then wrote an artful letter to pope Nicholas, to induce him to recognise his elevation to the patriarchate, which he, however, refused to do, and held a council at Rome (863), in which Zachens, one of the legates who attended the pseudo-council of 861, was excommunicated, he other remanded, and Photius himself condemned and deposed. Upon this the latter, in 866, called together another assembly, wherein the emperors Michael and Basil presided, together with the legates of the three great Eastern sees; and this, after hearing witnesses against Nicholas, the pope, pronounced sentence of deposition and excommunication against him. Twenty-one bishops signed this sentence, and about one thousand false signatures were said to have been added. After so bold a step it was impossible to keep up appearances with Rome any longer, and Photius wrote a circular letter to the Oriental bishops, in which he dared to charge with error the whole West. Among other accusations, he charged the Latin Church with adding the word "Filioque" to the original creed. See Labbe, Concil. viii, 651, 695, 735.

XLIX. Held A.D. 867. In this council Photius was deposed and driven into banishment, Ignatius, by a decree of the emperor Basil, having been restored to the see.

L. Sometimes called the eighth general council, held A.D. 869, by the emperor Basil, and attended by about one hundred Eastern bishops, and by three legates from pope Adrian II.

The council was opened (Oct. 5) in the Church of St. Sophia. The pope's legates, who had been received by the emperor with the most marked attention and honor, had the first seats assigned to them; the legates of the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem were also present. The first bishops who entered the council-chamber were the twelve who had suffered persecution from Photius in the cause of Ignatius; then the pope's letters to the emperor and to the patriarch were read, also the form of reconciliation which the Roman legates had brought with them.

In the second session (Oct. 7) the bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons who had yielded to Photius appeared and testified their repentance, urging, at the same time, in excuse, the evils that they had been made to suffer.

In the third and fourth sessions (Oct. 11 and 13) Theophilus and Zachary were questioned. The legates from Antioch declared that Photius had never been acknowledged by the Church of Antioch. Also, a letter from the pope to the emperor Michael was read.

Fifth session (Oct. 26). Photius himself was brought before the council and questioned. Being required to submit to the council and to Ignatius, in order to be received into lay communion, he refused to give a definite answer, and was withdrawn.

In the sixth session (Oct. 26) the emperor Basil was present, and occupied the chief place. Several bishops who had taken part with Photius were introduced, and exhorted to renounce their schism; they, however, continued firm in their fidelity to him, and Zachary, bishop of Chalcedon, in a long oration, defended Photius from the charges brought against him. The emperor himself, at some length, endeavored to persuade them to renounce Photius and to submit to Ignatius, but they resolutely refused. Ten days were granted them in which to consider the matter.

In the seventh session (Oct. 29), Photius again appeared, and with him Gregory of Syracuse; an admonition to himself and his partisans was read, exhorting them, under pain of anathema, to submit to the council. Photius merely answered that he had nothing to say in reply to calumnies, whereupon the legates directed the sentence of excommunication against Photius and Gregory to be read.

In the eighth session (Nov. 5) the acts of the council against Ignatius, and several of the books written by Photius, were burned; anathema was pronounced against the Iconoclasts, and finally, the sentence of anathema against Photius was repeated.

In the ninth session (Feb. 12, 870), false witnesses whom the emperor Michael, at the instigation of Photius, had brought forward to give evidence against Ignatius, were put to penance. In this session the emperor was not present, but the legate of the patriarch of Alexandria attended.

In the tenth and last session (Feb. 28) the emperor Basil attended, with his son Constantine, twenty patriarchs, the three ambassadors of Louis, emperor of Italy and France, and those of Michael, king of Bulgaria; also a hundred bishops were present. They acknowledged seven preceding œcumenical councils, and declared this to be the eighth. The condemnation pronounced by the popes Nicholas and Adrian against Photius was confirmed.

Twenty-seven canons which had been drawn up in the previous sessions were read; they were chiefly directed against Photius:

8. Enjoins the worship of the sacred image of our Lord equally with the books of the holy Gospels (œquo honore cum libro S. E.); also orders the worship of the cross and of images of saints.

7. Forbids persons laboring under anathema to paint the holy images.

11. Anathematizes all who believed with Photius that the body contains two souls.

12. Forbids princes to meddle in the election of bishops.

13. Orders that the higher ranks in each Church shall be filled by the ecclesiastics of that Church, and not by strangers.

16. Rebukes the sacrilegious use made of the holy vestments and garments by the emperor Michael, who employed them in profane shows and games.

21. Enjoins reverence to all the patriarchs, especially to the pope, and declares that even in an œcumenical synod, any matter of complaint or doubt involving the Roman Church should be treated with suitable reverence, without presuming to pass any sentence against the supreme pontiffs of old Rome.

Further, a definition of faith was published in the name of the council, with anathema against all heretics, especially naming Monothelites and Iconoclasts.

The acts of this council were subscribed, in the first place, by the three legates of the pope (the emperor, through humility, refusing to sign first), then by the patriarch Ignatius, and after him by Joseph, legate of Alexandria, Thomas, archbishop of Tyre, who represented the vacant see of Antioch, and the legate of Jerusalem, then by the emperor and his two sons, Constantine and Leo, and, lastly, by one hundred and one bishops.

This council has not the slightest claim to be considered œcumenical; it was, indeed, annulled in the following council, and has always been rejected by the Eastern Church. See Labbe, Concil. viii, 962.

LI. Sometimes styled the ninth general, was held A.D. 879, by the emperor Basil, upon the restoration of Photius to the patriarchate of Constantinople, vacated by the death of Ignatius. The legates of pope John VIII and of all the Eastern patriarchs attended, with not less than three hundred and eighty bishops.

In the first session Photius presided; the legate of John, cardinal Peter, declared the pope's willingness to recognise Photius as his brother, and produced the presents which he had brought for the latter from Rome. Much was said by Zacharias, bishop of Chalcedon, and others, in praise of Photius, which was greatly applauded by the assembly.

In the second session (Nov. 16) the letter of the pope to the emperor, translated into Greek, was read, those parts which were unfavorable to Photinus having been altered. The council received the pope's letter relating to union with the latter, but rejected that which claimed Bulgaria as belonging to the Roman obedience. The letter of the pope to Photinus was then read, that part, however, being suppressed which declared that Photinus ought to have consulted him before returning to the see of Constantinople, and to have asked pardon in full council. The bishops declared that no force or violence had been used by Photinus, in order to procure his re-establishment in the see, and that all had been done quietly and in order; afterwards, he himself spoke, declaring that he had been elevated to the patriarchate against his own will, to which the whole council assented. This done, the letters of the eastern patriarchs to the emperor and to Photinus were read, being all highly favorable to the latter, acknowledging him to be the lawful patriarch of Constantinople, and inveighing against the synod of 869.

In the third session (Nov. 18) the letter of John VIII to the Church of Constantinople was first read, then the acts of all previous councils condemning Photinus were annulled, the council declaring, "We reject and anathematize that pretended council (the preceding) in uniting ourselves to the patriarch Photinus."

In the fourth session (Christmas Eve) the letter of the patriarch of Antioch to Photinus was read; it was approved by the council, which declared that the Eastern sees had all along recognized Photinus. Afterwards, the articles of union were discussed; they were five: 1. Respecting Bulgaria, concerning which nothing was determined; 2. Relating to the consecration of laymen to the see of Constantinople; 3. Forbidding the election of any person to the patriarchate of Constantinople from another Church; 4. Condemning all the councils held against Photinus; 5. Excommunicating all who refused to communicate with Photinus. The last four were unanimously approved.

In the fifth session (Jan. 26, 880) the second council of Nicea was approved, and received as oecumenical. After the publication of certain canons, the bishops present proceeded to subscribe the acts of the council, the Roman legates being the first, who declared that they acknowledged Photinus to be the legitimate patriarch, that they rejected the council of Constantinople in 869, against him, and that if any schismatics should still separate themselves from Photinus, their lawful pastor, they ought to be excluded from communion, until they should return to obedience.

The sixth session was held (March 10) in the palace, the emperor Basil being present. Here it was agreed to follow the decisions of the seven oecumenical councils in drawing up a profession of faith; thereby, in fact, condemning the addition of the "Filioque."

In the seventh and last session, held on Sunday, March 18, in the church, the definition of faith, agreed to in the former session, was read and subscribed, after which the council was dissolved.

The acts of this council were subscribed by the emperor. It was rejected by the Western Church. John VIII very shortly after sent Marinus, his legate, to Constantinople, to revoke his consent to its proceedings, and to declare his concurrence in the sentence of excommunication previously passed against Photinus. It does not seem to have been universally received in the East. See Labbe, Council, ix, 324-329.

LII. Held A.D. 1054, by the patriarch Michael Cærularius. In this council the great schism between the Greek and Roman churches was (as it were) consummated. Cærularius had previously written a letter in his own name and that of Leo, archbishop of Acrida, to John, bishop of Trani, in Apulia, in which he publicly accused the Latin Church of error. Among other things laid to their charge was the use of unleavened bread in the holy communion; single immersion in holy baptism; the use of signs by bishops, etc. To this letter Leo IX returned an angry answer, and held a council at Rome, in which the Greek churches were excommunicated. The emperor, however, was anxious to appease matters, and, by his order, Leo sent three legates to Constantinople, Humbert, Peter, archbishop of Amalfi, and Frederick, chancellor of the Church of Rome (afterwards Stephen IX), who by their own conduct fully seconded the arrogance of the pope, and, in 1054, in the church of St. Sophia, solemnly excommunicated Michael Cærularius and Leo of Acrida, with all their adherents; and, leaving a written document to this effect upon the altar, departed, shaking off the dust from their feet. Upon this, Michael called together this council, in which he excommunicated the three legates, with all those who adhered to their views. The jealousy with which the bishops of Rome regarded the claim of the patriarchs of Constantinople to the supremacy over the churches of their own obedience was the true cause of this rupture.

LIII. A council was held by Nicholas III, the patriarch, about the year 1084, in which the decree made in the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 842, in favor of the use of images, was confirmed. Simeon, patriarch of Jerusalem, twenty-three archbishops and bishops, together with many heads of monasteries, were present. The case of Leo, archbishop of Chalcedon, was discussed, and his opinion unanimously condemned, which was to the effect that an absolute worship, and not merely relative, was due to the holy images. Leo himself submitted to the decision of the council, retracted, and was admitted to communion.

LIV. Held A.D. 1118, under John IX, in which the sect of the Bogomili was condemned, and its leader Basilus anathematized and sentenced to be burned. This sect took its rise in Bulgaria. Like the Manichæans, in earlier times, they attributed an excessive importance to prayer, and walked about perpetually muttering prayer to themselves; the Lord's prayer they repeated seven times every day, and five times in the night, many of them very much more frequently. From this habit of much praying they derived the name of Bogomili, which, in the Slavonic language, means, "God have mercy upon us." In their heretical notions they resembled the Manichæans and Paulicians, which last sect arose about the same time. They affected an appearance of extreme sanctity, and wore the monkish dress. Their leader Basilus, a physician, had twelve principal followers whom he designated his apostles, and also some women, who went about spreading the poison of his doctrine everywhere. Basilus, when before the council, refused to deny his doctrine, and declared that he was willing to endure any torment, and death itself. One peculiar notion of this sect was, that no torment could affect them, and that the angels would deliver them even from the fire. Basilus himself was burned in this year. Several of his followers, when seized, retracted; others, among whom were some of those whom he called his apostles, were kept in prison and died there. Several councils were held upon this subject.

LV. Held A.D. 1143, Aug. 20, by the patriarch Michael Oxytes, in which the consecration of two bishops, Clemens and Leontius, performed by the metropolitan alone, was declared to be null and void. They were further condemned as favorers of the sect of the Bogomili. See Leo Allat. Constit. l, t. 11, cap. 12, p. 671.

LVI. Held about A.D. 1143. Nyphon, a monk (who had been sentenced in a previous council to be imprisoned until further evidence could be procured against him), was condemned for blasphemy; among other things, for saying, "anathema to the God of the Hebrews." He was put into prison, and remained there during the patriarchate of Michael. See Leo Allat. Constit. p. 681; Mansi, Council, xviii; Baronius, Annal. A.D. 1143.

LVII. Held A.D. 1156, under the patriarch Lucas Chrysoberges; in which the errors of Soterichus Pantengenus, the patriarch-elect of Antioch, and of some others, were condemned. They asserted that the sacrifice upon the cross was offered to the Father and to the Holy Spirit alone, and not to the Word, the Son of God. The origin of this error seems to have been the fear of admitting the Nestorian doctrine of two persons in Jesus Christ. In a subsequent sitting Soterichus confessed his error, but was judged unworthy of the priesthood.

LVIII. Held A.D. 1261, by the emperor Michael Paleologus, to deliberate upon the recall of Arsenius I, the patriarch, who had withdrawn from Constantinople. The circumstances of the case were as follows: Arsenius (Antorionus) was a monk of Mount Athos, who had been raised to the office of patriarch of Constantinople by the emperor, Theodorus Lascaris II, in 1257. Upon the death of the latter, Michael Paleologus was, in the absence of Arsenius, appointed regent, and shortly after having been associated in the imperial dignity with the young emperor John, Arsenius was obliged, against his own wishes, to crown him; this, however, he did only upon condition that John should hold the first rank. Subsequently, seeing that this condition was not fulfilled, and that Michael was going on in an ill course, he withdrew from his see; to which Michael immediately appointed Nicephorus of Ephesus, in 1260, who died within a few months, when Michael convoked this council to consider about the expediency of recalling Arsenius. After some debate, in the course of which some of the bishops present maintained that Arsenius had not lawfully and canonically vacated the see, and others that he had sufficiently signified his abdication by his words and actions, it was resolved to send a deputation from the council to Arsenius to entreat him to return, which he subsequently did, the emperor promising to forget all that had passed.

LIX. Held A.D. 1266, by the same Michael Paleologus, in which the patriarch Arsenius was deposed and banished. Arsenius, after his recall in 1261, had given offence to the emperor by refusing to acknowledge the consecration of Nicephorus to the patriarchate during his absence; and subsequently learning that Michael had cruelly put out the eyes of the young emperor John, he had boldly excommunicated him; and, upon his continuing obstinate, he had, in a council held three years afterwards, entirely cut him off from the Church. Upon this Michael grievously persecuted him; and upon a false charge of having administered the holy communion to a Turkish prince, he was in this synod excommunicated, deposed, and banished, and Joseph set up in his place. This caused a schism among the Greeks of Constantinople, most of them refusing to acknowledge Joseph. Arsenius died in banishment in 1273.

LX. Held about A.D. 1277, in which John Veccus, or Roccus, who succeeded Joseph I in the patriarchate, made profession of the faith as held by the Church of Rome, and excommunicated those of the Greeks who refused to return into union with that Church. A long synodal letter was written to the pope, humbly deploring the division of the two churches, acknowledging the primacy of Rome, and confessing the Latin faith. This, however, was not done without great opposition; and a new schism arose. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1032-1037.

LXI. Held A.D. 1280, May 3, by the same patriarch, John Veccus, at which eight metropolitans and eight archbishops were present. A passage was read from the writings of Gregory of Nyssa (beginning with these words, "Cum adduceret magnus Moyses"), in which the following words occur: "Spiritus vero Sanctus et a Patre dicitur et ex Filio esse affirmatur." The word "ex," it appeared, had been wilfully erased, and thus the sense of the passage was altered, which otherwise would have assisted towards the re-establishment of union between the churches, since it tended to prove that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son as well as from the Father. The zeal of Veccus for a reunion with Rome, and in favor of the Latin faith, brought upon him the ill-will of the Greeks. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1125.

LXII. Held A.D. 1283, in which the patriarch Veccus was condemned; and at a council held the following year, in the palace of Blaquerna, the celebrated treaty of union agreed upon at the Council of Lyons in 1274, and publicly ratified by Veccus, was annulled, and Veccus himself exiled.

LXIII. Held A.D. 1341, under John XIV, patriarch, who presided, the emperor, Andronicus III, being present. To this council Gregory Palamas, the chief of the Quietists or Hesycasts, of Mount Athos, was cited to answer the accusation of Barlaam, a Calabrian monk (afterwards bishop of Gieracé, in Calabria). These Quietists believed that by intense and constant contemplation it was possible to arrive at a tranquillity of mind entirely free from perturbation; and, accordingly, they used to sit in one fixed posture, gazing at the pit of their stomach (hence the title Umbilicani, given them by Barlaam), and pretended that, when so occupied, they could see a divine light beaming forth from the soul, and that this light was the glory of God and the same that illuminated Christ during the transfiguration. The event of the council, however, was that Gregory triumphed, and Barlaam was condemned, and made to ask pardon for his hasty accusation. He subsequently returned to Italy. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1872.

Five other councils were held upon this same subject within the nine following years.

LXIV. A council was held about A.D. 1345, at which the two legates from Rome—Francis, archbishop of Bosphorus, and Richard, bishop of Chersonesus, an Englishman—were present. Their object was to enter into a negotiation for a union of the two churches. As neither the patriarch, John XIV, nor his bishops were capable of managing the business, Nicephorus Gregorius, a learned layman, was called in, by whose advice they avoided all discussion with the legates, and the matter fell to the ground.

LXV. Held about A.D. 1450, upon the subject of the union of the Greek and Latin churches, agreed upon at Florence in 1439. Gregory III, patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed, on account of the consent which he had given, as he allowed, willingly, to that union, and Athanasius elected to his place. This was done in the first session. In the second the unfair means used by the Latins at Florence, in order to effect the union, were dilated on. In the third the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit was argued, and the Latin doctrine on that subject endeavored to be refuted. In the fourth they discussed the following subjects:

1. The authority claimed by the pope over the Oriental and all other churches.
2. The fire of purgatory.
3. The fruitfulness of the saints.
4. The words of consecration.

In all of these they differed from the view taken by the Roman Church. They then added twenty-five articles of complaint against the Latin Church:

1. That they did not paint the Images like the archetype.
2. That they adapted secular tunes to ecclesiastical psalmody.
3. That they permitted men and women to sit together in their churches.
4. That they forbade marriage to the clergy.
5. That they did not pray towards the East.
6. That they used unleavened bread in the holy sacrifice.
7. That they asserted whatever is in God to be substance.
8. That the pope had that cross depicted upon his feet which Christ carried on his shoulder.
9. That they allowed the bed-ridden (enbancim) to participate in the holy mysteries, and that not with sufficient reverence.
10. That they accepted money from harlots.
11. That they fasted on Saturdays.
12. That they, contrary to the decree of the seventh synod, made paintings to represent the Father.
13. That in crossing themselves they began on the left.
14. That the pope usurped a secular authority.
15. That the pope, for money, absolved Christians from the obligation to fast.
16. That, contrary to holy Scripture, they permitted parents to make their eldest sons sole heirs.
17. That they gave to the Image of Christ and to the cross the worship of Latria, which is due only to the Word.
18. That they adored Images.
19. That they permitted priests, in a state of fornication, to celebrate mass.
20. That they did not at once anoint the heads of the baptized.
21. That they did not pray standing on Saturdays and Sundays.
22. That they ate of things suffocated.
23. That they punished with temporal fires those who erred in the faith.
24. That they did not enjoin those who had done any injury to any one to seek forgiveness of him.

The synod, which was numerously attended, ended with the fifth session. See Labbe, Concil. xiii, 1365.

LXVI. Held A.D. 1593. A great synod, in which Jeremiah II, patriarch of Constantinople, and Meletius of Alexandria presided. All things relating to the foundation of the new patriarchate of Moscow were confirmed in this council. Up to the end of the 16th century Kieff, which was then the metropolis of Russia, was under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople; but about that time Jeremiah II, being at Moscow, the monks of that city earnestly besought him that the people and empire of Moscow might be subjected to an archbishop, αὐτοκράτορ, "qui sui juris esset;" subject, that is, to no superior. This petition the patriarch at once, of his own accord, granted, and confirmed his promise by an oath, at the same time giving a deed drawn up in the Slavonic tongue, by which the new patriarchate of Moscow was erected; which deed was subscribed by all the priests and monks who were present with him. Having executed this deed, Jeremiah convoked a synod on Jan. 26, 1589, in the imperial city of Moscow, composed of all the bishops and abbots of the empire; in which, the liturgy having been first said in the presence of the emperor, his wife, and the whole senate, Job, archbishop of Rostof, was elected, and declared the first primate and patriarch of the empire of Moscow. Upon the return of Jeremiah to Constantinople, a numerous council of bishops was assembled in the month of February, 1593, by which the erection of the new patriarchate of Moscow was confirmed; and it was declared to be just and right that the state of Moscow, strictly orthodox, etc., should receive ecclesiastical honors in accordance with the spirit of the twenty-eighth canon of Chalcedon, and for other sufficient reasons there stated. Then it was settled and decreed that the Church of Moscow should be thenceforward a patriarchate; that all Russia, with its tributaries northwards, should be subject to it in all matters ecclesiastical; and that the patriarch of Moscow should rank next after the patriarch of Jerusalem, and take precedence of all metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops throughout the whole Catholic and Orthodox Church of Christ. It was further decreed that the election of the patriarch of Moscow should be confirmed by the patriarch of Constantinople, to whom a fixed tribute should be paid. Job, archbishop of Rostof, was then consecrated primate of the empire of Moscow, and patriarch.

LXVII. Held A.D. 1638, Sept. 24, by Cyril of Berœa, patriarch of Constantinople, for the purpose of anathematizing the memory of Cyril Lucar, his predecessor, who died about three months previously, and who was accused of holding many of the peculiar tenets of Calvin. It was decreed that Cyril Lucar should be publicly denounced, and delivered over to an anathema, as well as all those who received his vain dogmas. Thirteen anathemas were then published against him, of which the following is a summary:

1. To Cyril, surnamed Lucar, who has falsely asserted that the whole Eastern Church is of the same belief as Calvin, anathema.
2. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that the holy Church of Christ can lie, anathema.
3. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that God has chosen some to glory before the foundation of the world, and predestinated them without works, and has reprobated others without cause, and that the works of none are sufficient to demand a reward before the tribunal of Christ, anathema.
4. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that the saints are not our mediators and intercessors with God, anathema.
5. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that man is not endued with free will, but that every man has the power of stuning, but not of doing good, anathema.
6. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that there are not seven sacraments, but that only two, i. e. baptism and the eucharist, were handed down to us by Christ in his gospel, anathema.
7. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that the bread offered at the altar, and also the wine, is not changed by the blessing of the priest, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, into the real body and blood of Christ, anathema.

8. To Cyril, who teaches and believes that they who have fallen asleep in piety and good works are not assisted by the alms of their relations and the prayers of the Church, anathema.

9. To Cyril, a new Iconoclast, and the worst of all, anathema.

The 10th and 11th are merely an amplification of the 9th, and the 12th and 13th a recapitulation and enforcement of the whole.

The acts of the council are signed by three patriarchs, viz. Cyril of Constantinople, Metrophanes of Alexandria, and Theophanes of Jerusalem; also by twenty-four archbishops and bishops, and by twenty-one dignitaries of the great Church of Constantinople. See Neale, Hist. of the Oriental Church.

LXVIII. Held A.D. 1641, by Parthenius; eight prelates and four dignitaries of the Church attended. The teaching of Cyril Lucar was again condemned, and the use of the word μετουσίωσις authorized to express the change in the elements after consecration; but this was not done without opposition, as it was a term unknown to the fathers, and the offspring of Latin scholasticism. See Neale, Hist. of the Oriental Church.

LXIX (COUNCIL OF JASSY), A.D. 1642. Held at Jassy, in Moldavia, but commonly named the synod of Constantinople. Parthenius, the œcumenical patriarch, presided; and the acts of the council (which are incorporated with and authenticated by those of the Council of Bethlehem, A.D. 1672) are signed by twenty-three archbishops and bishops, among whom was Peter Mogilas, archbishop of Kieff, the author of the Confessio Orthodoxæ Ecclesiæ Catholicæ et Orientalis, which, as revised by Meletius Syriga, was formally approved. Most of the signatures, however, appear to have been added subsequently, the number of prelates actually present being small.

The decrees of this synod are contained in seventeen chapters, and the condemnation of Cyril Lucar is more fully expressed than it had been in the synod of 1638. All the chapters of Cyril, except the seventh on the incarnation, are condemned. See Neale, Hist. of the Oriental Church; Labbe, Concil. xv, 1718.

LXX. Held A.D. 1718, April 12; the patriarch, Jeremiah of Constantinople, Samuel of Alexandria, and Chrysanthus of Jerusalem being present, with the clergy of the Church of Constantinople. In this council the twelve proposals of the Scotch and English non-juring bishops upon the subject of a union between the Greek Church and the nonjuring British churches was considered. The circumstances which led to this scheme were as follows: In 1716 Arsenius, metropolitan of the Thebaid, in Egypt, was in London, and the Scotch bishop, Campbell, forming an acquaintance with him, was led to mention the subject of a union to him. Arsenius entered warmly into the matter, and undertook to forward to the Orientals any proposals upon the subject which the British bishops might agree upon. In consequence twelve proposals were drawn up, which were translated into Greek by bishop Spinkes, and to them was added a declaration expressing wherein they agreed and disagreed with the Oriental Church. The five points of disagreement were as follows:

1. That they denied to the canons of œcumenical councils the same authority with holy Scripture.
2. That they could not pay any kind of worship to the Blessed Virgin.
3. That they could not pray to saints or angels.
4. That they could give no religious veneration to images.
5. That they could not worship the host in the eucharistic sacrifice.

In 1721 "The answer of the orthodox in the East to the proposals sent from Britain for a union and agreement with the Oriental Church" was transmitted through Arsenius, who was then at Moscow. This answer was the synodical judgment agreed upon in this council; it was contained in a long paper, in Greek, accepting the twelve proposals and the articles of agreement, under certain explanations, but warmly defending the Greek Church on the subject of the five articles of disagreement, and insisting upon an entire conformity in each of these particulars. At the same time they forwarded the two declarations of their Church drawn up in the synod of Constantinople (or Bethlehem), under Doritheus, in 1672, and in that under Callinicus, in 1791. See Skinner, Eccles. Hist. of Scotland, ii, 634.

LXXI. Held A.D. 1723, in September, upon the same subject as the preceding—Jeremiah of Constantinople, Athanasius of Antioch, Chrysanthus of Jerusalem, Callinicus of Heraclea, Auxentius of Cyzicum, Paisius of Nicomedia, Gerasimus of Nicæa, Parthenius of Chalcedon, Ignatius of Thessalonica, Arsenius of Prusa, Theoctistus of Polypolis, and Callinicus of Varna being present. Upon the receipt of the synodical judgment of the last council, the English bishops, in a synod held at London, in May, 1722, drew up a reply defending their former position by appropriate passages from Holy Scripture and from the fathers, and concluding with the following proposal:

"If our liberty, therefore, is left us in the instances above mentioned; if the Oriental patriarchs and bishops will authentically declare us not obliged to the invocation of saints and angels, the worship of images and the adoration of the host; if they please publicly and authoritatively, by an instrument under their hands, to pronounce us perfectly disengaged in these particulars, both at home and abroad, in their churches and in our own: these relaxing concessions allowed, we hope, may answer the overtures on both sides, and conciliate a union."

In the present council this second communication of the British bishops was considered, and a final answer drawn up and forwarded, telling the Anglican prelates that they had nothing to say different from their former reply; and, far from acceding to any compromise, they boldly declare that

"These doctrines have been long since examined, and rightly and religiously defined and settled by the holy and œcumenical synods, so that it is neither lawful to add anything to them, nor to take anything from them: therefore, they who are disposed to agree with us in the divine doctrines of the orthodox faith must necessarily follow and submit to what has been defined and determined by the ancient fathers and by the holy and œcumenical synods, from the time of the apostles and their holy successors, the fathers of our Church, to this time: we say they must submit to them with sincerity and obedience, and without any scruple or dispute, and this is a sufficient answer to what you have written."

To this epistle they added the confession of faith agreed upon in the synod of Bethlehem, in 1672. See Skinner, Eccles. Hist. of Scotland, ii, 637.

In addition to the foregoing, Richard et Giraud (Bibliothèque Sacrée, viii, 158 sq.) give several less important councils held at Constantinople, as follows:

- I. In 351, against Athanasius.
- II. In 438, in favor of the Catholic faith.
- III. In 439, on the pretended primacy of the Church at Antioch.
- IV. In 451, on the conversion of the Eutychians.
- V. In 497, in which Macedonius condemned the defenders of the Council of Chalcedon.
- VI. In 520, by Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople, concerning his ordination. The council wrote a letter to pope Hormisdas on the subject.
- VII. In 550, a synod of Eutychians, followers of Julian of Halicarnassus.
- VIII. In 566, by order of Nicephorus, successor to Constantine VII, in which Joseph Œconomus of Constantinople was restored, whom the patriarch Tarasius had degraded for having crowned Theodora, concubine of Constantine.
- IX. In 508, in which Constantine's marriage with Theodora was ratified, and several eminent persons were exiled.
- X. In 614, by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, with sixty-six bishops. Antonius, an iconoclastic bishop of Pamphylia, was excommunicated. Mansi places three councils in this year (Concil. i, 507).
- XI. In 871, in which the Catholic bishops refused to unite in council with heretics, as the emperor Michael II had proposed.
- XII. In 682, against image worship.
- XIII. In 804, in which Gregory, bishop of Syracuse, was deposed by Ignatius of Constantinople. Mansi assigns this to the year 847 or 848 (Concil. i, 980).
- XIV. In 856, during the absence of the patriarch Ignatius, in which the adherents of Gregory of Syracuse were condemned (Mansi, i, 947).

XV. In 901, in which Nicholas the Mystic, patriarch of Constantinople, condemned the marriage of the emperor Leo with his fourth wife (Labbe, ix).

XVI. In 944, to depose Trypho, whom Constantine VIII had intruded into the patriarchate of Constantinople until his own son, Theophylact, should be of sufficient age for the office (Labbe, ix; Hardouin, vi).

XVII. In 963, to absolve the emperor Nicephorus Phocas from the ban which the patriarch Polyeuctes had imposed upon him for having two wives; the emperor taking oath of his innocence.

XVIII. In 969 a celebrated dispute was held at Constantinople between the Catholics and the Jacobites, by order of the emperor Nicephorus (Renandot, Liturgie Orientale, ii, 489; Assemani, Bibliothèque Orientale, ii, 138; Mansi, Concil. supplement, i, 1169).

XIX. In 976, when the patriarch Basil, convicted of crime, was deposed, and Antonius Studites put into his place (Baronius, Annales, s. an.).

XX. In 1090, when the patriarch Alexis excommunicated the seditions (Mansi, Concil. append. i, 74).

XXI. In 1021, when the same patriarch condemned the sale or transfer of monasteries.

XXII. In 1028, when the same patriarch made certain rules concerning bishops.

XXIII. In 1062, when the patriarch Michael Cærularius defended the marriage of relatives in the seventh degree.

XXIV. In 1068, when the patriarch John Xiphilin declared that there was no difference between marriage and regular betrothal as to the impediments between the parents.

XXV. In 1067, on the same subject.

XXVI. In 1081, when the marriage of two consins, one of them to a mother, and the other to a daughter, was annulled.

XXVII. In the same year, when the emperor Alexis Comnène was forbidden to dismember episcopates.

XXVIII. In 1166, when Demetrius Lampenus and others were exiled for having falsely accused the Germans of heresy respecting the divine nature. Marriage was also allowed to the seventh degree of relationship inclusively (Mansi, ii).

XXIX. In 1168, when the Greek Church was entirely separated from the Roman.

XXX. In 1286, on a passage in bk. i, cap. v, of John of Damascene's book on the orthodox faith (Hardouin, vii).

XXXI. In 1297, concerning the anathema huried by the patriarch Athanasius against the emperor (Mansi, iii).

XXXII. In 1299, in which the marriage of prince Alexis was judged valid, although contracted against the consent of his nicle the emperor.

XXXIII. In 1448, when the patriarch Metrophanes, who had been very zealous for the union of the Greek and Anglican churches, was deposed (Æladius, De Concensione, iii).

XXXIV. In 1568, when the patriarch Joshaphat was deposed for simony.

Constantinus is the name of several early saints and prelates besides those given below and under CONSTANTINE:

1. Bishop in the Romagna in the 4th century, addressed by Ambrose, A.D. 379 (Epistles in Migne, Patrol. Lat. xvi, p. 878, 1245; Ceillier, v, 480).

2. Bishop of Laodicea, originally a magister militum, consecrated in 510 bishop of Laodicea. He was a leading Monophysite, and as such was deposed by Justin I in the year 518. He is commemorated by the Jacobites on June 26 (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii, 327; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus).

3. Abbot of Monte Cassino after the death of St. Benedict. He ruled the monastery from A.D. 543 to cir. 560. He was one of the four whom St. Gregory consulted as witnesses to the life and works of their founder (Ceillier, xi, 634).

4. Saint, is said in the breviary of Aberdeen to have been the son of Paternus, king of Cornwall. He went as a missionary to Scotland, where he was martyred in Cantire, about the end of the 6th century (Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 311-314; Butler, Lives of the Saints, iii, 148, 149; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, i, 486; ii, 165).

5. Surnamed, or perhaps christened, Silvanus, the founder of the Paulicians, was born in Armenia in the latter half of the 7th century. By order of the emperor Constantinus Pogonatus, he was stoned to death. See PAULICIANS.

6. Bishop of Nacolia, in Phrygia, about A.D. 727, the principal supporter, among other bishops, of the emperor Leo III, the Isaurian, in his polemic against images.

7. Constantinus and Peregrinus, Saints, were two bishops whose relics were found in the church at Gerinige, in Normandy, but it is not known when or where they lived. They are commemorated in that church June 15.

Constantinus, an Italian martyr, was a citizen of Rome, and for the defence of the Gospel being condemned to be burned, was put in a dung-cart; who, thereat rejoicing, said that he was reputed here as excrements of this world, but yet his death was a sweet odor unto God. This occurred at Rome in 1542. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 398.

Constantinus (or Constantius) of Antioch, a Greek theologian, was priest of the metropolitan church of Antioch, and destined to succeed Flavian, bishop of that place. Porphyry, who desired to obtain this episcopal see, by intrigue at the court of Constantinople obtained of Arcadius an order of exile against Constantinus, who, by the aid of his friends, escaped to Cyprus, where he appears to have passed the remainder of his days. He died about 410 of the Christian era. He placed in order the thirty-four Homilies of John Chrysostom, upon the epistle to the Hebrews. Among the letters of Chrysostom there are two addressed to Constantinus, and he appears to be the author of two other letters attributed generally to Chrysostom. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantinus LICHUDES, a Greek theologian, was at first protovestiary, and was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 1058. We have from him two synodal decrees, one upon a culpable slave, the other upon a priest arrested for murder. These two decrees are found, with a Latin translation, in the Jus Græcoromanum of Leunclavius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantinus MELITENIOTA, a Greek theologian, lived about 1276. A partisan of the union of the Greek and Latin churches, he was exiled to Bithynia, where he died. He wrote the two following treatises: De Ecclesiastica Unione Latinorum et Græcorum;—De Processione Spiritus Sancti. These were published, with a Latin translation, in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Leo Allatius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantinus TIBERIUS, antipope, did not await the death of Paul I in order to obtain the papal power. He was elected in 767 by the influence of his brother Toto, or Teuto, duke of Nepi, who installed him by force of arms. Constantinus was a layman. He assumed the deaconry, disdained the priesthood, and was ordained bishop by George, bishop of Preenate, and afterwards consecrated pope by the same George, assisted by Eustrasius, bishop of Albano, and by Ciconatus, bishop of Oporto. A little later, another intruder, Philip, priest of St. Vito, and cardinal-priest, proclaimed himself. He excited a sedition in which Toto was killed. Constantinus took refuge with his other brother Passicus, in the oratorio of St. Cæsarius. He was pursued, dragged from his retreat, and imprisoned in the monastery of Cella Nova, where he was cruelly treated. Stephen IV was named and acknowledged sovereign pontiff, Aug. 5, 768. In April, 769, a council was convoked in St. John of Lateran, which decided that one could not be raised to the papacy who had not been ordained deacon and priest. The election of Constantinus was thus annulled, and he was condemned to pass the remainder of his days in a monastery. During his usurpation he had created eight bishops, eight priests, and four deacons, who could not be confirmed. The letters of the antipope were published by the Jesuit Gretser (Ingolstadt, 1613), and by Duchesne, in his Collection des Historiens de France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantinus I was 38th patriarch of Constantinople, and succeeded John V, A.D. 674. He died A.D.

677, and was followed by Theodore I (Theophanes, Chronog. p. 295).

Constantinus II was 47th patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 746, according to Theophanes (Chronog. p. 660). He had previously been a monk and bishop of Syllium. In A.D. 764, owing to the emperor Constantine Copronymus's ill-will, he was exiled, and in 767 was deposed by Nicetas, who afterwards succeeded him. After enduring horrible cruelties from his enemies, he was beheaded in the year 776 (Niceph. Constantin. Breviarium, p. 48). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Constantius, Saint (1), a martyr, was born at Perugia. His upright character gained for him the appointment of bishop of his native city. Some years afterwards he was arrested, conducted to Assisi, and beheaded near Ypsello or Foligno. According to the Bibliothèque Sacree the life of this saint, as published by the Bollandists, is not trustworthy. It is certain that the worship of St. Constantius is very ancient, and that there is a church near Perugia which bears his name, also a district of Foligno which is called the country of St. Constantius. He is honored Jan. 29. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantius, Saint (2), lived about 550. He was sacristan of San Stefano, near Ancona. His poverty was great and his humility profound. He is honored Sept. 23. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constantius is likewise the name of a number of early Christian bishops or other notable ecclesiastics. See also CONSTANTINE; CONSTANTINUS.

1. Bishop of Faenza, in the Romagna, A.D. 313, present at the Council of Rome concerning Cæcilian.

2. Bishop of Siscia (in Pannonia, now Sissek, on the Save), attended the Council of Aquileia, A.D. 381.

3. Bishop of Arausio (Orange), was present at the same council.

4 and 5. Two presbyters of Antioch in the time of Chrysostom.

6. A Manichean at Rome, in Augustine's time.

7. Bishop of Uzès (Ucetia) in Gaul, A.D. 419.

8. Also called CONSTANTINUS, deacon and secretary of Eutyches, present at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 448.

9. A bishop sent by Hilary of Arles, in the 5th century, along with bishop Nectarius, to Leo of Rome, on a question of jurisdiction.

10. A priest of Lyons, in the latter half of the 5th century, of noble extraction and literary character, the friend of Sidonius, who gives us our only knowledge of him and his brave exploits when Clermont was besieged by the Visigoths (Epist. i, 1; iii, 2; vii, 18; ix, 16).

11. A bishop directed by Avitus (bishop of Vienne, in France, A.D. 497-517) not to refuse communion to trivial offenders.

12. A monk of the abbey of Classis, who failed to be appointed abbot there in the time of Gregory the Great.

13. Bishop of Albi, at the Council of Rheims, A.D. 625, and living in 647. He wrote a joint letter with Dado Desiderius of Cahors (Migne, Patrol. lxxxvii, 217).

14. Also called CONSTANTINUS, presbyter of Apamea, in Syria, who explained his peculiar views on Christology at the third Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, but was excommunicated therefor. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Consuetudinary, in ecclesiastical usage, is a term for (1) the ritual or book of constitutions for ceremonies and official duties; (2) a custumal or rental of estates.

Consulter with familiar spirits. See NECROMANCER.

Consus (is thought to be derived from conditus,

"hidden," or from consulo, "to advise") was an ancient Roman god, probably to be referred to the worship of the deities in the infernal regions. When the Roman state was threatened with destruction, because of a scarcity of women, Romulus decided on the rape of the Sabine girls. He pretended to have found hidden in the earth an altar of an unknown god, in whose honor plays were to be celebrated, and for this purpose all neighboring nations were invited. In memory of the success of the scheme there was a yearly festival held, called Consuatia, at the celebration of which an altar was dug from the earth and plays were performed.

Contacium (κοιτάκιον) is a name given in the ritual of the Greek Church to a short hymn, and also to the volume containing special liturgies.

Contancin, CYRIQUE, a French Jesuit missionary, was born at Bourges in 1670. In 1700 he was sent to the Chinese missions, and did not return to France until 1731, when he was brought back by some affairs connected with his order. Being appointed superior-general in China, he went to Port Louis, where he took ship Nov. 16, 1733, but died at sea a few days afterwards. His long sojourn in Asia afforded him opportunity for collecting curious documents, and these were published in the Lettres Edifiantes. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contant (or Constant de la Mollette), Philippe du, a French theologian, was born at Saint-André, Dauphiné, Aug. 29, 1737. He completed his studies at the Sorbonne, and received the degree of doctor in 1766, preparing a thesis in six languages upon the Holy Scriptures, which was published at Paris the same year. He was afterwards vicar-general of Vienne. He was beheaded in 1793. He wrote, La Genèse Expliquée (Paris, 1773):—Essai sur l'Écriture Sainte (ibid. 1775; this work is preceded by a plate containing several Oriental alphabets):—Nouvelle Méthode pour Entrer dans le Vrai sens de l'Écriture Sainte (ibid. 1777):—L'Exode Expliqué (ibid. 1780):—Les Psaumes Expliqués (ibid. 1781):—Traité sur la Poésie et la Musique des Hébreux (ibid. eod.):—Le Lévitique Expliqué (ibid. 1786):—Nouvelle Bible Polyglotte (very rare). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contant, Pierre, an eminent French architect, was born in 1698 at Ivry-sur-Seine, and studied under Watteau. He erected the convent of Panthémont and the church of la Madeleine, in Paris, and also designed the beautiful church of St. Waast, at Arras. He died at Paris in 1777. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contarini, Camillo, an Italian scholar, was born at Venice, Jan. 3, 1644. He completed his studies at the Clementine College in Rome, returned to his native city in 1663, and entered upon public employments with zeal and wisdom. Later he became member of the grand council, and there distinguished himself by his eloquence. He married Maria Donato in 1679, but after her death, in 1698, he took, March 30, 1710, the ecclesiastical habit, and went to Rome, where he presented to Clement XI the first volume of his historical works. He died at Venice, Aug. 17, 1722, leaving L'Ingenuo Riconosciuto (Venice, 1666):—L'Arbace, a musical tragedy (ibid. 1667):—La Genealogia de Domini (Amsterdam, 1693):—Istoria della Guerra di Leopoldo I, Imperatore, Contra il Turco, dell' Anno 1683:—Il Traditore Tradito, a tragedy (Venice, 1714):—Annali delle Guerre per la Monarchia delle Spagne (ibid. 1720-1722). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contarini, Giovanni, an eminent Venetian painter, was born in 1549, and applied himself at an early age to the study of the works of Titian. He travelled in Germany, where he met with great encouragement from the princes and nobility, especially at the court of the emperor Rudolph II. In the church Della Croce, at Venice, is a picture by this artist of The Crucifixion, and in San Francesco is The Resurrection. His principal work, however, now in the Louvre, represents the Virgin and Infant Enthroned, with St. Mark and St. Sebastian. He died in 1605. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contarizo, LUIGI, an Italian theologian, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, wrote Il Vago e Dilettevole Giardino (Vicenza, 1602). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Conte, Guido del, an artist, so called, whose real name was Fussi, a native of Carpi, was born in 1584. He was the inventor of a kind of work called by the Italians scagliola or mischio. From him this method rapidly spread throughout all Italy. Some of his scholars far surpassed him in the execution of altars for churches. He died in 1649. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Conte, Jacopino del, a Florentine painter, was born in 1510, and studied under Andrea del Sarto. His principal pictures in Rome are, St. John Preaching and The Descent from the Cross, in San Giovanni Decollato; The Dead Christ and St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, at the Cappuccini à Monte Cavallo. He died at Rome in 1598. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contee, BENJAMIN, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Benfield, Charles Co., Md., in 1755. When the war of the Revolution broke out he entered the American army, and held a commission in 1776. After independence was declared he visited France, Spain, and England. He was a scholarly man, very courteous in his manner. In 1789 he was elected a representative to the first Congress under the new constitution. Though not a public debater, he was profound in investigation and wise in counsel. Washington was his personal friend. Returning from Congress, his father established him as a merchant in Nottingham, Md.; but he was unsuccessful, and returned to Blenheim, where he had been married. Subsequently he became a planter. He accepted the appointment of chief judge of the testamentary court of Charles County, which he held during his life. In May, 1802, the parish of William and Mary, in Charles County, of which he had been vestryman, solicited him to enter holy orders and become their pastor, to which he consented. In June, 1803, he obtained deacon's orders, and in 1805 was placed on the standing committee, and became the official visitor of his own and the adjoining county, a position which he held ever after. The adjoining parish, Trinity, invited him to its pulpits about this time, and he continued to preach there during the following five years, although one church was twelve and the other twenty miles distant from his home. Bishop Claggett's health failing, Dr. Contee became, in August, 1811, rector of St. Paul's parish, a part of the bishop's charge, and in this pastorate he continued for three years. During this time he had five places of worship to supply, the most distant being forty miles away. In 1812 he came very near being elected assistant to the bishop. In 1813 he began to curtail his field of labor, giving up Trinity Church and St. Paul's. William and Mary, the parish in which he resided, was held by him until the date of his death, Jan. 23, 1816. His character was distinguished by self-denial, great zeal, and devotion. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 487.

Contelorio, Felice, an Italian theologian, was born at Spoleto in 1590. He was doctor of theology and keeper of the Vatican library, and died at Rome, Sept. 28, 1652. He wrote various religious treatises, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Contenson, Vincent, a French theologian, was born at Altiwillare, in the diocese of Condom, about 1640. He took the Dominican habit at Toulouse, Feb. 2, 1657, and taught philosophy at Albi, then theology at Toulouse. He was very learned, and occupied the chair of eloquence. He died at Creil, Dec. 26, 1674, leaving, Theologia Mentis et Cordis (Lyons, 1675, 1681, 1687). See Hofer, Nouv. Bing. Générale, s. v.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Contextus (Contestus, Contestius, or Contestus), Saint, an early Christian prelate, is said to have been born near Bayeux, in Gaul, and to have been pious from early youth. He preached so zealously against the prevalent vices as to be subject not only to popular dislike, but to Satanic temptations; but persevered, and in advanced age was made bishop of Bayeux, A.D. cir. 480-518. He is famed for his virtues and good deeds, and his body was translated to Fiscannum (Fécamp). His festival is on Jan. 19.

Conthigirius. See KENTIGERN.

Continency is that moral virtue by which we restrain concupiscence. There is this distinction between chastity and continence: chastity requires no effort, because it may result from constitution; whereas continency appears to be the consequence of a victory gained over ourselves. The term is usually applied to men, as chastity is to women. See CHASTITY.

Contingent, happening without a foreknown cause, commonly called accidental. An event not come to pass is said to be contingent, which either may or may not be; what is already done is said to have been contingent, if it might or might not have been. What is contingent or casual to us is not so with God. As effects stand related to a second cause, they are oftentimes contingent; but as they stand related to the first cause, they are acts of God's counsel, and directed by his wisdom. See NECESSITY; WILL.

Contobaditæ were a section of the Agnostæ (q. v.).

Contra votum is a formula of regret in early Christian epitaphs, adopted from paganism after the 8th century, especially in Northern Italy.

Contract of Marriage may be considered in two senses:

1. Agreement for Marriage in the Abstract. The law of the Church on this point is, as on many other points, compounded of the Jewish and Roman laws, under the influence of New-Testament teaching. It is derived mainly from the latter system of legislation, especially in regard to the marriage of the laity; from the former mainly, in regard to that of the clergy. The validity of the marriage-contract generally depends on two points:

1. Strictly speaking, the inherent capacity of the parties for marriage turns only upon three particulars:

(a) Sufficient Age. On this it may be observed that the old Roman, like the old Jewish law, attached the capacity for marriage by age to the physical fact of puberty; and the same principle is practically followed in all systems of legislation which take notice of age at all in this matter, although it is generally found convenient in the long run to fix an age of legal puberty, without reference to the specific fact. Thus, in the Digest, it is provided that the marriage contract is only valid on the part of the wife when she has completed her twelfth year, even though she be already married and living with her husband. Justinian himself, in his Institutes, professes to have fixed, on grounds of decency, the age of puberty for the male at fourteen; both which periods have very generally been adopted in modern legislation.

The earlier Roman legislation seems to have fixed an age beyond which a woman could not marry, since we find Justinian abolishing all prohibitions of the earlier Roman law against marriages between men and women above sixty and fifty. Nothing of this kind is to be found in later systems of legislation, although disparity of age in marriage has sometimes been sought to be suppressed.

Physical incapacity in persons of full age has never been held to produce actual inability to enter into the marriage contract, but simply to render the marriage voidable when the fact is ascertained. Nor is the fact one of importance in reference to the marriage relation, except where divorce is put under restrictions. See IMPOTENCY.

(b) Defect of Reason acts inversely to defect of age. Thus, madness was fatal to the validity of the contract, but did not dissolve it when afterwards supervening.

(c) The Freedom of Will of the parties, on the other hand, can only be testified by their consent to the marriage (see CONSENT); but it may also be indirectly secured, by limitations of a protective character placed on the exercise of the capacity to contract marriage. According to the jurists of the Digest, a man might marry a woman by letters or by proxy if she were brought to his house, but this privilege did not belong to the woman.

There was one large class of persons in whom there was held to be no freedom of will, and, consequently, no capacity to contract marriage. Marriage is simply impossible where the persons of slaves of both sexes are subject, absolutely without limit, to the lusts, natural or unnatural, of a master. The slave, his master's thing, can have no will but his master's; in respect of the civil law, properly so called, i. e. the law made for citizens, he does not exist; his condition is almost equivalent to death itself. Thus the Roman law has never mentioned connections between slaves. Connections between slaves and serfs are indeed mentioned, but without the name of marriage, and only to determine the condition of the offspring, which is fixed by that of the mother. Rustici, a class of peasants who seem to have been of higher status than the "serfs," could contract marriage among themselves.

The recognition of slaves' marriages originated, not in the Roman law, but unquestionably in the Jewish law. Although only "Hebrew" servants are mentioned in the passage of Exodus on this subject (xxi, 3, 4, 5, 6), it is clear that the Pentateuch recognised the marriage of persons in a servile condition. With the sweeping away by the Christian dispensation of all distinction between Jew and Gentile it is but natural to suppose that the right of marriage would be extended from the Hebrew slave to the whole slave class. Such right, indeed, was not absolute, as will have been observed, but flowed from the master's will, and was subject to his rights. The master gave a wife to his slave; the wife and her children remained his, even when the slave himself obtained his freedom. As respects the marriage of slaves, it appears clearly to have been recognised both by the State and the Church in the reign of Charlemagne.

2. The Extrinsic Conditions of the capacity for marriage were very various. Some are purely or mainly moral ones; the leading one of this class, that of the amount of consanguinity which the law of different nations has held to be a bar to the validity of the nuptial contract, will be found treated of under the heads of AFFINITY; COUSINS-GERMAN. Another—singular, because exactly opposite feelings on the subject have prevailed in different countries—is to be found in the prohibition by the later Roman law of marriages between ravishers and their victims, under severe penalties, both for the parties themselves, and the parents who consented to it (Justinian, Cod. b. ix, l. xiii, § 1, Nov. 143, 150).

Another limitation on the marriage contract, which must be considered rather of a political nature, and which prevails more or less still in the military code of almost every modern nation, was that on the marriage of soldiers. Under the early Roman polity, marriage was absolutely forbidden to soldiers; but the emperor

Claudius allowed them the right, and it seems certain that there were married soldiers under Galba and Domitian. Severus seems, however, to have been the first to allow soldiers to live with their wives. Philip I and II, on the other hand, seem to have restricted soldiers to a first marriage. Under Justinian's Code, the marriage of soldiers and other persons in the militia was made free, without solemnities of any sort, so long as the wife was free-born. There having been no regular armies among the barbarian races, nothing answering to the prohibition is to be found in their codes.

There were also restrictions on marriage which must be considered protective in their character, and intended to secure real freedom, as well as the wisdom of choice. To these, in the highest view of the subject, belong those which turn upon the consent of parents (see CONSENT); although this restriction seems generally to have had its historic origin in a much lower sphere of feeling—that of the social dependence and slavery, or quasi-slavery, of children to their parents. Next come the interdictions placed by the Roman law on the marriage of guardians or curators, or their issue, with their female wards.

Lastly come the interdictions on the marriage of officials within their jurisdictions, which are analogous in principle to those on the marriage of guardians with their wards. No official could marry (though he might betroth to himself) a wife born or domiciled within the province in which he held office, unless he had been betrothed to her before; and if he betrothed a woman, she could, after his giving up office, terminate the engagement, on returning the earnest-money; but he could give his daughters in marriage within the province. The marriage of an official contracted against this interdiction seems to have been considered absolutely void.

Among the specially religious restrictions placed on the marriage contract in the early ages of the Church, the one which would first claim our attention is that on the marriage of Christians with Gentiles, or eventually also with Jews and heretics.

That marriage generally was a civil contract, subject to the laws of the state, seems to have been the received doctrine of the early Church; while at the same time it claimed also power to regulate it in the spirit of the Gospel, as is shown, for instance, in the strictness of our Lord and his apostles against divorce, although freely allowed both by the Jewish and the Roman law. Hence pagan betrothals and marriages were, as Selden observes, held valid by the Christians (Uxor Ebraica, bk. ii, c. 24).

The next religious restriction of marriage is that connected with the monkish profession, which must be distinguished from the early vow of virginity in the female sex, and from the institution of the Church virgins. The vow of virginity, which for many centuries now has been considered an essential prerequisite of the monastic profession, was not so by any means in the early heroic days of monachism (q. v.).

The prohibition against the marriage of monks and religious women by degrees found its way into the civil law of several of the barbarian kingdoms besides France. Among the laws of king Luitprand of Lombardy, A.D. 721, or later, we find one of this kind as to women, in which their position when they have assumed the religious habit is assimilated to that of girls betrothed under the civil law, whose marriage entails a penalty of five hundred solidi. The Visigothic code inflicts "on incestuous marriages and adulteries, or on sacred virgins and widows and penitents, defiled with lay vesture or marriage," the penalties of exile, separation, and forfeiture of property. By the time of the Carolingians, the civil and ecclesiastical law almost wholly coalesce. In the 6th book of the Capitulaires we find one almost in the same terms with the Visigothic law above quoted, declaring that marriage with a virgin devoted to God, a person under the religious habit, or professing the continence of widowhood, is not a true marriage, and requiring the parties to be separated by either the priest or the judge, without even any accusation being lodged with him, the penalty being still perpetual exile. In the East, on the contrary, about the end of the 8th century, it is noted as one of the features of Constantine Copronymus's tyranny, that he compelled monks to marry.

In respect of the marriage of the clergy, however, the restraint which occupies most space in the Church legislation of the period which concerns us, is that on digamous or quasi-digamous marriages, which will be considered under the head of DIGAMY. Meanwhile, however, there was growing up a feeling against all marriage of the clergy while in orders, tending to their absolute celibacy. The notices which occur of other restraints upon clerical marriages are comparatively few and unimportant. See CELIBACY.

II. We have now to say a few words on the contract of marriage, in the sense in which the expression is still used in France (marriage settlement), of the written evidence of the contract itself as between the parties.

The marriage contract among the Romans was habitually certified in writing on waxen tablets, which, however, might also be used after marriage, e. g. on the birth of a child. "Nuptial tablets" were signed both by the parties and by witnesses, and the breaking of them was held to be at least a symbol of the dissolution of marriage, if it had not the actual effect of dissolving it. By a constitution of the emperor Probus, the drawing up of such "tablets" was enacted not to be necessary to establish the validity of the marriage or the father's power over his offspring. They were perhaps not necessarily, though usually, identical with the "dotal tablets," "dotal instruments," or "dotal documents," specifically so called, but must have been comprised with them at least under the general terms "instruments" or "documents;" as to which it is provided, by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximin, that where there is no marriage, "instruments" made to prove marriage are invalid; but that where there are none, a marriage lawfully contracted is not void; nor could the want of signature to such by the father invalidate his consent. Nuptial instruments were by Justinian made necessary in the case of the marriage of stage-players. Under the 74th Novel, indeed, all persons exercising honorable offices, businesses, and professions, short of the highest functions in the state, were required, if they wished to marry without nuptial instruments, to appear in some "house of prayer and declare their intentions before the 'Defender of the Church,'" who, in the presence of three or four of the clerks of the Church, was to draw up an attestation of the marriage, with names and dates, and this was then to be subscribed by the parties, the "Defender," and the three others, or as many more as the parties wished, and if not required by them, to be laid up, so signed, in the archives of the church, i. e. where the holy vases were kept; and without this the parties were not held to have come together "with nuptial will." But this was only necessary where there was no document fixing a dos or anti-nuptial donation; nor was it required as to agriculturists, persons of mean condition, or common soldiers. It will be obvious that we have in the above the original of our marriage certificates. See DOWRY; MARRIAGE.

Contredit, ANDRÉ, a French poet and musician, lived about 1290. He was an ecclesiastic, and left Neuf Chansons Notées (MS. in the National Library of Paris, No. 7222, containing eight volumes). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Contrite literally signifies beaten or bruised, as with hard blows, or a heavy burden; and so, in Scripture language, imports one whose heart is broken and wounded for sin, in opposition to the heart of stone (Isa. lxvi, 2; Psa. li, 17; lvii, 15). The evidences of a broken and contrite spirit are: (1) Deep conviction of the evil of sin; (2) humiliation under a sense of it (Job xliii, 5, 6); (3) pungent sorrow for it (Zech. xii, 10); (4) ingenuous confession of it (1 John, i, 9); (5) prayer for deliverance from it (Psa. li, 10; Luke xviii, 13); (6) susceptibility of good impressions (Ezek. xi, 19).

Controversy, RELIGIOUS, is good or evil, according to the principles which it upholds, the purpose in which it originates, the object to which it is applied, and the temper with which it is conducted. If it spring from a mere spirit of contention, from desire of victory, not love of truth, or from stubbornness, that will not be brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, Christianity will not acknowledge it for her own. If it be employed on questions unbefitting human disputation; questions inaccessible to our finite understandings; unnecessary or unimportant in their issue, and only tending to perpetuate strife, or to unsettle the minds of men, then it is also unworthy of the Christian character. Nor is it void of offence when, however sound its principles, however important its subject, however irrefragable its argument, it is made the vehicle of personal malignity; when it is carried on with a spirit that rends asunder the social ties, and exasperates, instead of endeavoring to soften, the irritable feelings, which, even in its mildest aspect, it is but too apt to excite.

But those evil consequences, which flow from the abuse of controversy, and from causes by no means necessarily connected with religious discussion, ought not to deter us from its proper use, when truth requires its aid. Controversy is worse than useless if it have no better end in view than a display of mental superiority, or the self-gratification which, to minds of a certain cast, it appears to afford. For as, in secular disputes, it is the legitimate end of warfare to produce peace, so, in religious polemics, the attainment of unanimity ought to be the main object. War is waged because peace cannot be obtained without it. Religious controversy is maintained because agreement in the truth is not otherwise to be effected. When this necessity is laid upon us, we do but acquit ourselves of an indispensable duty in defending the charge committed to our care by the use of those weapons with which the armory of the divine Word supplies us. See Van Mildert, Bampton Lectures.

Contumeliōsus, a bishop of Riez, in Gaul, A.D. 524. He was addressed by Avitus, bishop of Vienne, concerning a work sent him by the latter. He was a learned man, but of doubtful private morality, and about 534, at the instance of Cæsarius, bishop of Arles pope John II forbade his exercising episcopal functions. Contumeliosus appealed to pope Agapetus, but the case seems not to have been further determined.

Contumely and Impudence, two vices, were adored by the Athenians under the figure of partridges, from a supposed analogy of nature.

Couture, GUILLAUME, a French architect, was born at Rouen in 1732, and visited Italy early, where he made great improvement. He restored the Church de la Madeleine, and died in 1799.

Contzen, ADAM, a Jesuit and controversialist of Belgium, was born in 1573 at Montjoie, in the Jülich territory. In 1595 he joined his order at Treves, was in 1606 appointed a professor of philosophy at Würzburg, and in 1610 professor of theology at the academy in Mayence. He wrote, against the Heidelberg professor Pareus, Defensio Libri de Gratia Primi Hominis (Magdeburg, 1613), and Crudelitas et Idolum Calvinistarum Revelatum (ibid. 1614). When Pareus tried to harmonize the differences between Lutherans and Calvinists, and to array both parties against Rome, Contzen published De Unione et Synodo Generali Evangelicorum (ibid. 1615), and De Pace Germaniæ Libri Duo (ibid.

1616). When the first centenary of the Reformation was celebrated, he published Jubilum Jubilorum (ibid. 1618). At Munich, where he was called in 1623, he wrote, In Quatuor Evang., a commentary (Cologne, 1626):—In Epistol. ad Romanos (ibid. 1629):—In Epistol. ad Corinthios et ad Galatas (ibid. 1631). He died May 20, 1635. See K. Brischar, P. Adam Contzen (Würzburg, 1829); Streber, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Conuualh (or Conwalh). See COINWALCH.

Conuulfus (or Conwulfus). See CYNEWULF.

Convallus (or Conwall) is the name of several early Scotch saints:

1. Said by some to have been an abbot in Scotland, and confessor of king Comanus, and to have died in A.D. 527; but according to others an abbot of Iona, who introduced "gang-days" (Rogation-days) into Scotland. His day of commemoration is Oct. 13 or 15. See Forbes, Kal. of Scottish Saints, p. 164, 214, 241, 315.

2. A confessor, commemorated May 18 or Sept. 28, probably the Convallus who was a favorite pupil of Kentigern at Glasgow, described as the son of an Irish prince, and as dying in A.D. 612. See Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 315.

3. A monk, commemorated Sept. 14, who was brought up in the monastery of Crocraguel in Carrick, and therefore not earlier than the 13th century. See Cameron, De Scot. Fort. p. 173.

Convention, GENERAL, is an assembly of clerical and lay deputies belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church (q. v.) of America.

Converse, AMASA, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lyme, N. H., Aug. 21, 1795. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1822; studied theology at Princeton Theological Seminary for one year; was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of Hanover, May 5, 1826; was missionary in Virginia during 1826 and 1827; editor of the Visitor and Telegraph, Richmond, thereafter until 1839; of the Christian Observer, Philadelphia, Pa., until 1861; then went back to Richmond, and was employed there until 1869; and at Louisville, Ky., until his death, Dec. 9, 1872. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 44.

Converse, AUGUSTUS L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of South Carolina, was for a number of years rector of the church in Stateburgh, near which place he died, March 21, 1860, aged sixty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1861, p. 98.

Converse, JOHN KENDRICK, a Presbyterian and Congregational minister, was born at Lyme, N. H., June 15, 1801. His preliminary education was acquired at Thetford Academy. In 1827 he graduated from Dartmouth College, and during the two years following was a teacher and editor in Richmond, Va. Soon after his graduation from Princeton Theological Seminary he was ordained pastor, Aug. 9, 1832, at Burlington, Vt., where he continued to minister for twelve years; and then, for more than twenty-five years was principal of the Burlington Female Seminary. For a long time he was secretary of the Vermont Colonization Society, and was also general agent of the American Colonization Society. He died at Burlington, Oct. 3, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 20; Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881.

Converal is a Latin term for lay brothers of a monastery, as having forsaken the world.

Convert is a person who is converted. In a monastic sense, converts are lay friars, or brothers admitted for the service of the house, without orders, and not allowed to sing in the choir.

Conviction, in general, is the assurance of the truth of any proposition. In a religious sense, it is the first degree of repentance, and implies an affecting sense that we are guilty before God; that we can do nothing of ourselves to gain his forfeited favor; that we deserve and are exposed to the wrath of God; that sin is very odious and hateful, yea, the greatest of evils.

There is a natural and just conviction which arises from natural conscience, fear of punishment, moral suasion, or alarming providences, but which is not of a permanent nature. Saving conviction is a work of the Holy Spirit, as the cause; though the conscience, the law, the gospel, or affliction, may be the means (John xvi, 8, 9).

Convictions of sin differ very much in their degree and pungency, in different persons. It has been observed that those who suffer the most agonizing sensations are such as never before enjoyed the external call of the gospel, or were favored with the tuition of religious parents, but have neglected or notoriously abused the means of grace. To these, conviction is often sudden, and produces that horror and shame which are not soon overcome; whereas those who have sat under the gospel from their infancy have not often such alarming convictions, because they have already some notion of these things, and have much acquaintance with the gospel, which administers to a believing heart immediate comfort. As it is not, therefore, the constant method of the Spirit to convince in one way, it is improper for any to distress themselves because they are not, or have not been, tormented almost to despair: they should be rather thankful that the Spirit of God has dealt tenderly with them, and opened to them the genuine source of consolation in Christ. It is necessary, however, to observe that, in order to repentance and conversion to God, there must be real and lasting conviction, which, though it may not be the same in degree, is the same in nature.

Evangelical conviction differs from legal conviction thus: legal arises from a consideration of the divine law, God's justice, power, or omniscience; evangelical, from God's goodness and holiness as seen in the cross of Christ, and from a disaffection to sin; legal conviction still conceives there is something remaining good; but evangelical is sensible there is no good at all; legal wishes freedom from pain; evangelical from sin; legal hardens the heart; evangelical softens it; legal is only temporary; evangelical lasting.

Convocation, in the University of Oxford, consists of all persons admitted to regency, who have their names on their college books, and have paid all their fees. This assembly gives assent to statutes passed in congregation, confirms leases of lands, makes petitions to Parliament, elects burgesses, and confers honorary degrees, or those given by degree or by diploma.

Conwell, Henry, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Ireland, made bishop of Philadelphia, Pa., in 1820, and died in that city, April 21, 1842. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Catholic Church in the U. S. p. 126.

Conwell, W. T., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Hazel Green, Morgan Co., Ky., Feb. 19, 1849. He removed to Missouri in 1870, was converted in 1874, and the same year joined the Missouri Conference. He died at Savannah, Mo., May 23, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 318.

Conybeare, John Josias, A.M., an English divine, was born in 1779. He was elected professor of Anglo-Saxon in Oxford University in 1808, and professor of poetry in 1812. He delivered the Bampton lectures for 1824, on the Interpretation of Scripture; and in 1826 was published his Illustrations of Anglo-Saxon Poetry, edited by W. D. Conybeare. This work has done much to promote the study of Anglo-Saxon literature. Large portions of the Song of the Traveller and Beowulf will be found in the volume. Mr. Conybeare was a contributor to the British Bibliographer. He died in 1824.

Conyers, Josiah R., a Baptist minister and physician, was born in Bath County, Ky., March 4, 1812. He graduated as M.D. from Transylvania University, and for seven years practiced his profession at Quincy, Ill. He united with the Baptist Church in 1844. Several years afterwards he gave up a lucrative practice, and was ordained a minister at St. Mary's, O., where, and at Delphos, and Zanesville, he preached for six years. Although somewhat advanced in life, he became a student in the theological department of Madison University, N. Y., and studied one year at Princeton. In January, 1868, he entered upon the duties of his pastorate in Oneida, Ill. Subsequently he was pastor of the Church at Berwick. He died Aug. 6, 1870, near Tabo, Lafayette Co., Mo. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversaries, 1870, p. 11. (J. C. S.)

Conynghame, Daniel, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1586; was appointed to the living at Kilmalcolm in 1588; was a member of the Court of High Commission in 1619, continued in 1628, but resided at Lochwinnoch in 1646. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, ii, 249.

Conynghame, Hugh, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1634, became minister of the Presbyterian congregation at Ray, Ireland, but was compelled by persecution to leave that island; was called to the living at Mearns in 1649; became a temporary supply at Erskine in 1641, and continued in January, 1654. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticana, ii, 227, 245.

Conzié, François de, a French prelate, brother of the following, was born at Poncin, in Bugey, March 18, 1736. He was first grand-vicar, then bishop of St. Omer, and, in 1774, became archbishop of Tours. As deputy of the clergy to the states-general of 1789, he protested against the reunion of the three orders, resigned in 1791, and went to Aix-la-Chapelle. He afterwards wrote against the civil constitution of the clergy, and published, in June, 1791, a mandate which was condemned, in July of the same year, by the tribunal of Tours, to be torn and burned by the hand of the executioner. He retired to Holland, and died at Amsterdam in 1796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Conzié, Louis François Maro Hilaire de, a French prelate, was born at Poncin, in Bugey, Jan. 13, 1732. He served first as an officer of dragoons, but was soon made bishop of Arras. He proved himself one of the most violent adversaries of the Revolution. He refused to sit at the states-general, and in a riot came near losing his life in return for his devotion. An indictment being decreed in 1792, he took refuge in England and attached himself to the count of Artois. He exercised great influence in private, and directed the affairs of the royalist party. He became the centre of the intercourse and intrigue which fed the civil war in France. For many years his name was found in nearly all the projects of political insurrections. He is especially memorable as one of the directors of the plot of the machine infernale, Dec. 24, 1800. He died in London in December, 1804. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coo, Roger, an English martyr, was a native of Melford, in Suffolk. He was brought before the bishop, examined, and condemned to be burned, on account of his belief in the true God and his abhorrence of the worship of idols. The sentence was executed at Yoxford, Suffolk, in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 381.

Cook, Albert A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Warehouse Point, Conn., Sept. 24, 1817. He early gave proof of a noble character by caring for the family on the death of his father; joined the Church at the age of eighteen, and, after several years of study and teaching, united with the New England Conference in 1842, and began his pastoral life at Feeding Hills, Mass. He continued his ministry at Shelburne Falls, Chester Village (now Huntington), North Brookfield, Princeton, Oxford, and in 1851 at Milford (all in Massachusetts), where he died, Feb. 4, 1880. Mr. Cook spent his latter years as a dentist; was a member of the General Court of Massachusetts in 1850, 1855, and 1864; and served once in the Senate and twice in the House. He was a Christian gentleman, of fine presence and great urbanity; a natural, excellent preacher and expositor; was benevolent, and everywhere highly esteemed. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 66.

Cook, Alexander (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born at St. Monance, near Glasgow, Scotland, Feb. 4, 1760. He received a moderate English education at Glasgow, and learned the trade of a silversmith. He was at Berwick-on-Tweed in 1778, and emigrated to America in 1783; in 1797 was living in Pennsylvania; in 1802 was licensed, and went as a missionary to the Indians, but remained only a short time. In 1803 he was received into the Presbytery of Erie, and accepted calls from the congregations of Slippery Rock and New Castle, where he continued until 1809. In 1810 he was dismissed from the Presbytery of Erie, and connected himself with that of Hartford. About this time he took a commission to labor in South Carolina and Georgia as a missionary. He was also stated supply at Poland, O., from 1812 to 1814. In 1815 he was received into the Presbytery of Ohio, and installed pastor of the Church of Bethany, which relation was dissolved in 1820. In 1821 he was received by the Presbytery of Allegheny, and in the same year installed as pastor of the churches of Ebenezer and Bear Creek. In 1827 he was received into the Presbytery of Steubenville, and for a year supplied the churches of Annapolis and Bloomfield, O. In 1828 he left his home to organize a Church in a Scotch settlement in Ohio. While on this trip he died, Nov. 30, 1828. See Hist. of the Presbytery of Erie.

Cook, Alexander (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Keskasbig, County Donegal, Ireland, May 5, 1842. He joined the Wesleyans early in life; received a good common English education, and studied two years in the Wesleyan Institute; taught school four years; emigrated to America in 1865, and in 1866 entered the Central Ohio Conference, wherein he served the Church until his death, early in 1870. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 196.

Cook, Archibald, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1822; appointed to the North Church, Inverness, in 1837, after he had spent some years as missionary at Berriedale; joined the Free Secession in 1843, and became minister of the Free Church, Daviot, in 1844. He died May 6, 1865, aged seventy-four years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 259.

Cook, Chauncey, a Congregational minister, was born at Wallingford, Conn., March 9, 1778. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1808, studied theology with Dr. Asa Burton, was ordained in 1809, and labored as an evangelist in Vermont and New York. In 1811 he became pastor of the Church in Adams, N. Y., and his successive charges were as follows: Lima, Pittsford, Chili, Greece, Ira, Aurora (Presbyterian Church), all in New York state; Hennepin, Aurora, and Bristol, in Illinois. He died at Ottawa, Ill., March 21, 1860. Mr. Cook's ministry was blessed with many revivals. "He was a progressive man to the last." See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 344.

Cook, Cornelius, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Great Britain, where he was converted, and then called to preach in America. He labored three years in the ministry (in East Jersey, 1787; Dutchess, 1788; Schenectady, 1789), and died in August, 1789. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1790, p. 86.

Cook, Edward, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Long Wharton, Leicestershire, Nov. 4, 1806. He was converted in 1828, ordained in London for the missionary work in 1831, and on Jan. 14, 1832, sailed with Rev. Messrs. Edwards and Satchel in the Caledonia, for the Cape of Good Hope. His field was the Great Namaqua land. His work was interesting, successful, pursued with great love and enthusiasm, often amid dangers. His health finally giving way under his toils, he commenced a journey to Cape Town, but before he reached the station of his wished-for rest he died, on the banks of the Great Orange River, March 7, 1843. His remains were carried back over fifty miles to Nisbet Bath, and interred in the land of his labor. Besides establishing a church of more than four hundred members, and schools of more than one thousand children at Nisbet Bath, he made frequent journeys to the Damaras and more distant tribes. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1843; John Cook, The Life of Edward Cook (Liverpool, 1849, 12mo); Christian Watchman Magazine (Cape Town), March, 1843.

Cook, Edwin R. T., an Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1825. At the time of his death, July 25, 1865, he was rector of Wainwright Memorial Church, in New York city. Mr. Cook was an able, devoted, and eminently successful pastor. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1865, p. 644.

Cook, Elijah, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in the state of New York in 1793. He removed to the West in 1835, and was a preacher in Michigan. His ordination took place in 1845, and for nearly thirty years after he was engaged in his Master's work. He died at Cook's Prairie, Mich., Jan. 31, 1872. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1873, p. 83. (J. C. S.)

Cook, Émile F., a French Methodist preacher, son of Rev. Charles Cook, was born at Niort, June 15, 1829. The happy influence of his godly parents was shown by his conversion at the age of nine years. His mind was drawn to the ministry, and he pursued his classical studies in France and Switzerland; and, to qualify himself for preaching, entered the Wesleyan Theological College at Richmond, England, where, for three years, he manifested the aptitude for pastoral work which ever afterwards characterized his life and labors. He entered the itinerant ministry in France in 1854, when that country was made an independent conference, and labored successfully at Nismes, Nyons, Lausanne, and other important circuits. He was stationed in Paris during the siege, and heroically opened his house as a hospital, and had it filled with the sick and wounded, whom he gathered in person from the battlefield, and his devoted labors were greatly appreciated by both the conference and the citizens. The conference elected him president in 1872, and kept him in the office two years, as a mark of the confidence and affection of his brethren. At the close of his presidential duties he came to America to attend the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, and afterwards spent some time in pleading in Methodist churches for aid to his native land. He started for home in the steamer Ville-du-Haer, but was shipwrecked soon after leaving America. He was picked up, as by a miracle, with barely life left; resumed his journey in the steamer Lock Earn, and was again wrecked. Was again rescued, but with little hope of rallying, yet he strove hard to lead the dying to the Saviour. He at length reached England, got home greatly exhausted, and was sent to the south of France; but nature was worn out, yet his mind was calm and serene, and his strong faith remained unshaken. He died Jan. 9, 1874.

Cook, Finlay, a Scotch clergyman, was born at Arran in 1778. He became a catechist at Glasgow; was licensed to preach in 1816; ordained and sent as missionary to Halkirk, Watten, and Reay, and afterwards to Inverness; presented to the living at Cross in 1829; transferred to East Church, Inverness, in 1833, and thence to Reay in 1835; joined the Free Secession in 1843; and died June 12, 1858. He was remarkable for integrity and uprightness, faithful in reproving sin and error. His son, Alexander, was a minister in the Free Church. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 147, 259, 358.

Cook, George, D.D., a Scottish theologian, was born at St. Andrews between 1780 and 1795. He was pastor of Laurencekirk, and died in 1845. He wrote a History of the Reformation in Scotland (Edinb. 1811, 1819, 3 vols.):—a History of the Church of Scotland (Lond. 1815, 3 vols.):—Reality of Christ's Resurrection (1808), and some minor pieces.

Cook, Henry David, a Scotch clergyman, son of the professor of moral philosophy in St. Andrews, was born Feb. 24, 1791. He took his degree at the University of St. Andrews; was licensed to preach in 1813, and presented to the living at Kilmany in 1815. He died Sept. 19, 1857. He was well acquainted with the history of the Church, and with all its schisms and controversies. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 499.

Cook, Henry Preston, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Hancock County, Ga., Dec. 8, 1800. He received a careful religious training, experienced conversion in 1817, and in 1820 united with the Mississippi Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, in 1826. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1826, p. 506; Methodist Magazine, ix, 359.

Cook, Isaac M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1841, attended Princeton Theological Seminary for about one year (1842), was ordained by the Presbytery of Beaver, Dec. 17, 1845, and was pastor at Bridgewater, Pa., until his death, in January, 1854. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 136.

Cook, Israel B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1789. His name first appears in 1813, in connection with Lycoming Circuit of the Genesee Conference. In 1822 he became superannuated, but subsequently was readmitted into the East Baltimore Conference. He died March 7, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 29.

Cook, I. Russell, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Acton, Me., in 1821. He removed to Manchester, N. H., where he was converted in 1847, and ordained in 1852. His pastorates were in various places in Maine and New Hampshire, including Gilmanton, where he was pastor for four years, and Buxton, Me., for five years. He died in Rochester, N. H., July 1, 1862. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1863, p. 92. (J. C. S.)

Cook, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1648; was presented to the living at Eccles in 1663; deprived in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty. He died in 1691, aged about sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 412.

Cook, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1732; called to the living at Abercrombie in 1734, and ordained. He died June 24, 1751. His son John became professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, p. 403.

Cook, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, was born Nov. 24, 1771. He took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1788; was licensed to preach in 1792; appointed minister at Kilmany in 1793, and ordained; appointed professor of Hebrew at St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, and resigned in 1802. He died Nov. 28, 1824. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 499.

Cook, John (4), an early Wesleyan missionary, was sent to the island of Dominica, W. I., in 1794. On his arrival at Tortola he was seized with putrid fever, and in five days died, "in the prime of his life and the triumph of faith," in 1795 (according to Hill). See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, a. v.

Cook, John (5), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the divinity professor at St. Andrews, graduated at that university in 1823. He was factor to St. Mary's College in 1824, licensed to preach in 1828, presented to the living at Laurencekirk in 1829, and ordained; transferred to St. Leonard's, St. Andrews, in 1845; appointed convener of committee on education in 1849, of that for schoolmasters in 1850, and also of three other committees; was moderator of the General Assembly in 1859, assessor to the university court, elected professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in 1860, and one of the deans of the chapel in 1863. He died April 17, 1869, aged sixty-one years. Dr. Cook published works on Church Patronage, Church Defence, Relief of the Poor, School Statistics, a Catechism, and a few single Sermons. A handsome painted window, placed by his parishioners in the college church, St. Andrews, is one token of the high esteem in which he was held. He had scholarly ability, refined taste, exact and active business habits, affability, and courtesy. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 879.

Cook, John C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1837. He was educated at Dickinson College, where he was converted at the age of nineteen, and in 1860 entered the East Baltimore Conference, wherein he labored with earnest devotion until his death, April 22, 1862. Mr. Cook was a man of great promise, meek and lowly in heart, earnest, faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 10.

Cook, John Lovejoy, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Edinburg, Saratoga Co., N. Y., Jan. 7, 1819, of devout Christian parents. He spent his youth amid the quiet and peace of farm life, where he laid the foundation of his blameless, industrious, Christian character. He was employed in his young manhood by his brother as a manufacturer in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, at which time he was converted, became a class-leader, and received license to preach, and in 1846 was admitted into the Troy Conference. His last eight years were given to the pastorate of the Congregational Church at North Pownall, Vt., where he died May 15, 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 43.

Cook, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born in Bath, England. He was licensed to preach in 1776. He had previously served as associate pastor at Margate, on the Isle of Thanet, at Dover, Deal, and Folkestone. He then came to America, and was first pastor of a church in Eutaw Springs, S. C., but was obliged to leave during the Revolutionary War. When he returned he found his Church almost extinct, but through his efforts it grew in numbers, spirituality, and influence. He died Sept. 26, 1790. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 186.

Cook, Joseph B., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina about 1776. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and graduated from Brown University in 1797; pursued his theological studies with Rev. Dr. Furman; was ordained as an evangelist, and successively became pastor of the Eutaw, the Beaufort, and the Mount Pisgah churches. He died at his residence in Sumter District, S. C., Aug. 24, 1833. See Watchman and Reflector, Sept. 13, 1833. (J. C. S.)

Cook, Nehemiah Baldwin, a Congregational minister, was born at Hampton, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1798. He graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1821; in 1823 was appointed a home missionary in Wayne County, Pa., served one year, and was ordained Aug. 31, 1825; from that time till 1833 he was acting pastor of the Presbyterian churches in Babylon and Fresh Pond, L. I., and during the three succeeding years at Riverhead and Southold. He was installed pastor in Stonington, Conn., March 7, 1838, from which he was dismissed in May, 1859. From June, 1864, to October, 1867, he was acting pastor in Ledyard, and subsequently resided there without charge until his death, Nov. 17, 1879. He published two Funeral Sermons. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 16.

Cook, Pardon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1827, preached for thirty-four years, was a superannuate for nineteen years, and died at Marietta, O., in May, 1880, in his eighty-third year. He was pure-minded, cheerful, sweet-spirited, and beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 243.

Cook, Phineas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Greenfield, Mass., March 10, 1784. He experienced religion in 1800; and in 1803 entered the New York Conference, in which he was an effective preacher for forty years. He spent his latter years as a superannuate, and died May 26, 1861. Mr. Cook was of a warm and lively temperament, open-hearted and frank. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 80.

Cook, Richard, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1818. He was converted when quite young; joined the Oneida Conference in 1844; continued effective until 1860, when he took a superannuated relation, on account of ill-health; served as presiding elder in 1861 and 1862; and spent his last fifteen years in New Hartford. He died in September, 1876. Mr. Cook was a fearless advocate of all reforms, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 187.

Cook, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1813; was presented to the living at Clatt in 1820, and ordained; transferred to Ceres in 1844, and died at Monimail, Dec. 20, 1851, aged fifty-eight years. His publications are, Sermon on the Abundant Harvest, with Metrical Paraphrases (1831):—The Catechist's Poetical Manual (1834):—The Young Communicant's Manual (1849):—Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, iii, 554.

Cook, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born at Eastham, Mass., in 1791. When he was young his parents removed to Maine. In 1815 he was baptized, and united with the Baptist Church in Clinton. He completed a literary and theological course in 1821 at Waterville College. Soon after, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Effingham, N. H. The subsequent pastorates of Mr. Cook were at Brentwood, Hampton Falls, Hopkinton, Meredith and Dunbarton, all in New Hampshire. He acted, for some years, as the agent of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention, and, for eight years, was the chaplain of the state prison at Concord. He died Feb. 15, 1872. See Obit. Record of Colby University, Supplement No. 1, p. 5. (J. C. S.)

Cook, Thomas F., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, son of Rev. Valentine Cook, was a native of Kentucky. He professed religion in boyhood, labored a number of years acceptably as local preacher, and in 1848 entered the Mississippi Conference. In 1865 he was transferred to the Rio Grande Conference. He died of yellow fever, July 24, 1867. Mr. Cook was a meek, spiritual Christian, a faithful, laborious pastor, and a successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1867, p. 190.

Cook, Walter, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1709; was licensed to preach in 1722; appointed to the living at Cummertrees in 1728, and ordained. He died April 21, 1759, aged seventy-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 615.

Cook, W. B., a Universalist minister, was born at Marcellus, Onondaga Co., N. Y., Dec. 8, 1810. He entered the ministry in 1848, was ordained in 1846, and labored at the following places: Mottville, Alexander, Lockport, Gaines, Churchville, Newburgh, and Aurora, all in New York; went to Michigan in 1866, and there continued until his decease at Muskegon, June 5, 1871. Mr. Cook was a humble, faithful, diligent preacher. See Universalist Register, 1872, p. 144.

Cook, William W., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Princeton, Ky., May 2, 1818. He was converted in youth, licensed to preach in 1846, and joined the Louisville Conference in 1854. From 1861 to 1864 he was superannuated. Entering the effective ministry again he labored faithfully until compelled by poor health to take a superannuated relation once more, in which he remained until his death, Oct. 22, 1879. Though his early education was limited, Mr. Cook possessed good natural endowments, and by diligent study became a clear theologian and successful preacher. He was a kind, true man, and an efficient pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 164.

Cooke, Albert, A.B., an English Congregational minister, was born at Uttoxeter, Staffordshire, about 1842. He was educated at Alleyn's Grammar-school and at Lancashire Independent College. On leaving college, in June, 1866, he became pastor of the Church at Newport, Shropshire. In June, 1869, he accepted the pastorate at Acoc's Green, Birmingham. In 1874 he resigned this charge to take a school at Frome, in the hope that a more southern climate might repair his shattered health. He died July 30, 1879. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 815.

Cooke, Amos Starr, a Congregational missionary, was born at Danbury, Conn., in 1810, and graduated from Yale College in 1834. He went to the Sandwich Islands in the employ of the American Board of Foreign Missions, arriving there in April, 1837. Soon after his arrival he took charge of the education of the higher classes of that country, and remained at the head of the royal school for twelve years. He died at Honolulu, March 20, 1871.

Cooke, Charles, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of Protestant Episcopal parentage in St. Mary's County, Md., Sept. 3, 1799. He experienced religion in 1815, while attending school at the academy in Georgetown, D. C.; soon displayed marked talent as leader of a young people's prayer-meeting; was licensed to preach, and in 1820 entered the Baltimore Conference. In 1824 he became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference; in 1840 was made editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, and subsequently transferred to the Philadelphia Conference. He became superannuated in 1872, and died Aug. 24, 1875. Dr. Cooke was quiet and unobtrusive, firm and true, an exemplary Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 51; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cooke, Corbett, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Felmingham, Norfolk, Dec. 2, 1787. He commenced his ministry in 1809; was chairman of a district for twenty-seven years; retired to Guernsey after a ministry of half a century, where, blind but happy, he performed various pastoral duties until his death, May 16, 1866. Mr. Cooke was an argumentative and practical preacher, and his manner was simple and dignified, earnest and persuasive. He wrote Strictures on a Pamphlet, entitled An Attempt to Show that Election is Beneficial to Many and Injurious to None:—The History of Apostolical Succession (new ed. Lond. 1840, 12mo):—The Opinions of Rev. John Wesley in Reference to the Relation of Methodism to the Established Church (Exeter, 1844, 12mo):—A Plain Statement of Facts (ibid. 1835, 12mo):—Church Membership; Sermon on Acts ii, 47 (Lond. 1862, 12mo). See A Memorial Volume of the Rev. Corbett Cooke (Lond. 1868, 8vo); Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 31; Stevenson, Wesleyan Hymn-book and its Associations (Lond. 1870), p. 267; Osborne, Meth. bibliography, p. 87; Meth. Magazine (Lond. 1866), p. 941.

Cooke, Edward, LL.B., an English divine, was rector of Haversham, Bucks. He was an able scholar, and particularly well-versed in whatever related to history, antiquities, and jurisprudence. Besides the History of Whaddon Chase, the publication of which was interrupted only by his death, he had made ample collections towards a history of Buckinghamshire, which would probably, had his life been spared, have been completed in a few years. He died Feb. 27, 1824. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1824, p. 214.

Cooke (or Coke), George, D.D., an English prelate of the 17th century, brother to sir John Cooke, secretary of state, was born at Trusley, Derbyshire, of an ancient and honorable family. He was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, beneficed at Biggrave, Hertfordshire, made bishop successively of Bristol (1638) and Hereford (1636), and died in 1650. Bishop Cooke was a meek, grave, and quiet man, much beloved of such as were subjected to him, and was in the same condemnation with the rest of his brethren for subscribing the protest in parliament in preservation of their privileges. The times broke the body of his estate so that he had to be relieved by his rich relatives. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 371.

Cooke, Henry, D.D., LL.D., an Irish Presbyterian divine, was born at Grilagh, County Londonderry, in 1788. He studied at Glasgow University, and settled in 1808 at Duneean, County Antrim, and in 1811 at Donagon, in the same county. In 1817 he attended the medical classes in Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1818 removed as pastor to Killyleagh, County Down, where he engaged in a controversy with a Unitarian minister. In 1824 he was chosen moderator of the synod of Ulster, and three years later carried on a discussion on Arianism with Henry Montgomery. In 1829 he became pastor at Belfast, a position which he retained until his death, Dec. 13, 1868. During this period he was engaged in politico-ecclesiastic discussions, was three times moderator of the General Assembly, and at the close was professor of sacred rhetoric, in the New Presbyterian College of Belfast. Some of his polemical writings have been published. His Life was written by J. L. Porter (London, 1871; Belfast, 1875).

Cooke, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Gloucester in 1800. He was early converted, entered the ministry in 1822, and died Jan. 22, 1854. Kind and sympathetic, constant as a friend, his views of Christianity were lofty and comprehensive, his perceptions quick, and his judgments discriminating. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Cooke, James W., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Providence, R. I., March 5, 1810. He graduated from Brown University, was minister at Lonsdale, R. I., and then assistant to the late Dr. Milnor of New York city, after which he became rector of St. Michael's, Bristol, R. I. He made a voyage to Aspinwall to examine that place and Panama with a view to missionary operations, but was compelled to return on account of broken health. He died in New York, April 12, 1853, being at the time secretary and general agent of the foreign department of the Protestant Episcopal Missionary Board. Mr. Cooke was an ardent and efficient man. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1853, p. 302.

Cooke, John (1), an English clergyman of the latter part of the 18th century, rector of Wentnor, Shropshire, published a Sermon (1773):—and The Preacher's Assistant (Oxford, 1783, 2 vols.). This work contained an account of various preachers and sermons since the Restoration, and is considered valuable as a list of sermons from which the preacher might select for his library. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, v. v.

Cooke, John (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Atherstone, Warwickshire, March 25, 1799. He early became a Christian, entered Blackburn Academy in 1821, and was ordained in 1825 to the pastorate at Uttoxeter, where he labored forty years, and where, after a few years' retirement from the sacred office, he died, Feb. 11, 1871. Mr. Cooke was a master of one subject, human nature. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 309.

Cook(e), Joseph, an English Wesleyan preacher, became prominent as an advocate of certain theological tenets, which resulted in his exclusion from that body. He had travelled without objection from 1795. While on the Rochdale Circuit, 1803-5, he began to state the doctrines of justification and the witness of the Spirit differently from the received view. According to Myles, he hardly implied experimental religion, but a firm belief in what the Scriptures declare on these subjects. Promising not to promulgate his opinions, he was removed to the Sunderland Circuit. His friends in Rochdale, not so discreet as their late pastor, published his two sermons on the above subjects without his knowledge. This, of course, led to his arraignment before the conference, and, although treating him with respect and tenderness on account of the esteem in which he was held, they excluded him from their number in 1806, Cooke refusing to renounce his opinions. He then went to Rochdale, where he became the minister of a part of his former Wesleyan society. He published a defense of his doctrines, which was answered by Dr. Coke (q. v.) and Edward Hare (q. v.). Hare's treatise on justification has become a classic. Cooke died in 1811. "The breach which he made is not yet healed in the town of Rochdale" (Myles, 1813). See Myles, Chronol. Hist. of the Methodists, s. a. 1806; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, ii, 430, 432.

Cooke, Nathaniel Bowen, a Baptist minister, was born at Cambridgeport, Mass., Feb. 26, 1816. He graduated from Brown University in 1840, and passed the next three years as teacher of a select school in Bristol, R. I. He then spent a brief time in the Theological Institution in Newton Centre, Mass., and in 1844 began the study of medicine, attending a course of lectures at the medical school of Harvard University. On receiving his degree he began the practice of his profession, but subsequently returned to school teaching in Webster, Mass., and in Bristol, R. I. In 1862 he was ordained at Greenville, in the town of Leicester, Mass., and in 1869 settled in Lonsdale, R. I., where he died, April 14, 1871. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1870-80; Necrol. of Brown University, 1871.

Cooke, Patrick (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1627; was licensed to preach in 1630; admitted to the living at Stenton in 1631, and died Dec. 31, 1635, aged about thirty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 383.

Cooke, Patrick (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of the foregoing, was born July 21, 1626; called to the living at Prestonpans in 1653, and ordained in 1654; selected in 1670 as one of the "bishop's evangelists" for enlightening the Presbyterians of the West, and died in August, 1672. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 351.

Cooke, Samuel (1), a minister of the Congregational Church, was born at Hadley, Mass., in 1708. He graduated from Harvard College in 1735; was ordained pastor of the Church in West Cambridge, Sept. 12, 1739, and died June 4, 1783. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 73.

Cooke, Samuel (2), D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was educated at the University of Cambridge, and, having been admitted to holy orders, was sent to America, probably as early as 1749, under the auspices of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, his destination being Monmouth County, N. J. In 1765 he ministered to three churches, located at Shrewsbury, Freehold, and Middletown, but subsequently abandoned Freehold. In 1774 he went to England, but it does not appear that he returned after this to the United States, although he was still in the employ of the missionary society. In 1785 he was at Fredericton, N. B., where he remained until the close of his life. In 1790 he was commissary to the bishop of Nova Scotia. After a period of vacation, on account of ill-health, he resumed his ministerial duties in June, 1791. While crossing the St. John's river, on his return home with his son, the canoe was upset and both were drowned, May 23, 1795. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 224.

Cooke, Theodore, a Congregational minister, was born at Northampton, Mass., Oct. 27, 1815. In 1842 he graduated from Williams College, and in 1845 from Yale Divinity School. After preaching in various places for a time, he was ordained June 10, 1847, and until 1852 was pastor in Stowe, Mass. In 1854 he went to Menasha, Wis., as a home missionary, and remained until 1857, when he returned to New England, taking charge of the Church in Woonsocket, R. I., and preached there nine years. His health failing, in 1867, he returned to Stowe to reside upon his farm, and died Aug. 27, 1871. For a short time he was editor of the Worcester Gazette. See Cong. Quarterly, 1872, p. 437.

Cooke, William, a Congregational minister, was born at Hadley, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1716; was ordained at Sudbury, March 20, 1723, and died Nov. 12, 1760, aged sixty-four years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 386.

Cookman, ALFRED, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of the renowned George G. Cookman, was born at Columbia, Pa., Jan. 4, 1828. He was early consecrated to the ministry by his pious mother; experienced religion while attending the grammar school of Dickinson College; was a diligent and earnest student; received license to preach in 1846, and in 1848 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he filled prominent appointments, as also he did successively in the Pittsburgh, Wilmington, New York, and Newark conferences. He died Nov. 13, 1871. Mr. Cookman inherited a measure of his father's ardent temperament, magnetic power, and earnest religious feeling. He everywhere won many to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 35; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cookson, JOHN, an English Baptist minister, was born in Leeds in 1800. He was converted at the age of thirteen, and early in life became a local preacher. He came to the United States, and prosecuted his theological studies under the Rev. Dr. Sharp of Boston, his maternal uncle. In 1824 he was ordained in Malden, Mass., and subsequently was pastor in South Reading, now Wakefield, and in some other places of the vicinity. In 1862, being somewhat broken in health, he returned to England, and after a time was so far recovered as to be able to take charge of the Church in St. Benedict's Square, London, where he remained till his death in April, 1878. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1874, p. 265. (J. C. S.)

Cool, PETER, a Flemish engraver, flourished about 1690. He executed a number of plates, among which is one after Martin de Vos, representing Christ Bearing the Cross, with St. Veronica and other figures.

Cooley, Eli Field, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Sunderland, Mass., Oct. 13, 1781. He received careful training from his parents, and was educated in the Academy at Hartford, Conn., whither his parents had removed. In 1806 he graduated from the College of New Jersey; in October, 1809, was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery; in 1811 was installed at Cherry Valley, N. Y., where he labored until 1819, and then accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at Middletown Point, N. J.; in 1823 accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church in Trenton, where he labored till 1857. He died April 22, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 82.

Cooley, Henry Edwards, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., April 5, 1833. He received his preparatory education at Phillips Academy, Andover, graduated from Yale College in 1863, and from Yale Divinity School in 1866; was ordained at the First Church, Plymouth, Aug. 7 of that year, and remained there until March 31, 1869; was acting pastor at the First Church, Winsted, the next year, and the year following at South Weymouth, Mass. He was pastor at Littleton from May 9, 1872, until Oct. 29, 1874, and at Leominster from Nov. 10, 1874, until his death, Feb. 17, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Cooley, Timothy Mather, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at East Granville, Mass., March 18, 1772. He graduated at Yale College, delivering his oration in Hebrew, and became pastor, at the age of twenty-three, of the Church in his native village, where he continued until 1854, with only an absence of four months on home missionary work. Soon after his settlement he opened a classical school in his own house, and continued it during most of his life. For fifty-seven years he was an active and influential member of the board of trustees of Westfield Academy, and for forty-seven years held the same relation to Williams College. He died at East Granville, Dec. 14, 1859. Dr. Cooley was one of the lights of the New England pulpit. Several of his sermons and addresses have been printed. The number of his publications, including his journal articles, is not far from sixty. He assisted in preparing a collection of the memoirs of all the members of the class of 1792, and in 1850 he presented the volume in MS. to the library of Yale College. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1860; Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 272.

Cooley, William J., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born Oct. 18, 1818. He was converted in 1840 or 1841; received license to preach, and was admitted into the Tennessee Conference in 1844, in which he labored as his health permitted until 1856, when he became superannuated. He died Dec. 11, 1859. Mr. Cooley was intellectual, and labored with a fair degree of acceptability and success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 212.

Coolhaas, Gaspard, a Protestant German theologian, was born at Cologne in 1536. After serving several churches he was appointed to Leyden in 1575; presided at the inauguration of the university of that place, and there taught theology until the arrival of William Fougereau, titular professor. Coolhaas had several discussions with his colleagues; he maintained against Peter Cornelissen that the intervention of the civil magistrate was necessary in the election of elders and deacons. Brandt says that this was the beginning of the dissensions concerning the authority of the civil government in ecclesiastical matters. Coolhaas did not approve the dogma of absolute predestination. In 1578 the synod of Middleburg condemned his writings, but he appealed to the states-general of Holland, who confirmed the synodal sentence, and prohibited him from exercising his ministerial functions. The burgomaster of Leyden sustained Coolhaas in his heterodoxy, and, in spite of a new excommunication of the synod of Harlem, continued to pay him his allowance. After about two years he withdrew. He died in that city in 1615, leaving a large number of works, polemical or apologetic of his opinions, which are now of small account. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coolhaas, Willem, a Dutch theologian of the family of Gaspard, was born at Deventer, Nov. 11, 1709. He completed his studies at Utrecht, where he received the degree of doctor, after having sustained a thesis upon the sentiment of the motto πιστις, πατρις, and notivus. He was appointed minister to Langerak; then, in 1753, professor of languages and Oriental antiquities at Amsterdam, but in 1755 was called to the pastoral functions of the same city. Here he died, in 1772, leaving, Analogia Temporum et Modorum Hebrææ Lingue:—Observationes Philologico-Ezergetica in Quinque Novis Libris:—De Interrogationibus in Sacro Codice Hebræo, and two volumes of Sermons in Dutch. See Hoefcr, Novæ Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coombe, THOMAS, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born in Philadelphia about 1746, and graduated from the college there in 1766. He was chosen, Nov. 30, 1772, assistant minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's, in that city. On account of having exhibited a disposition inimical to the American cause, he was imprisoned in September, 1777. Although an appeal was made in his behalf, the executive council of Philadelphia determined to send him from the country. In July, 1778, he went to England and did not again return to America. For some time he was chaplain to Lord Carlisle, in Ireland, by whom he was presented with a parish. He was a prebendary of Canterbury, and one of the forty-eight chaplains to the king. He wrote some poems. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 280.

Coombes, WILLIAM JAMES, an English Congregational minister, was born in 1844. He was apprenticed to a printer at Hertford, in his boyhood; experienced religion at the age of eighteen, and soon distinguished himself for piety, intelligence, and Christian usefulness. In 1866 he entered Cheshunt College, and in 1869 began his ministry at St. Ives, Cornwall. Here he labored beyond his strength, and in 1871, being obliged to quit his charge, sailed to Australia, was much invigorated by the voyage, and soon after his arrival accepted the pastorate at Hawthorn, where he died, Aug. 2, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 319.

Coombs, Abner, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Brunswick, Me., Dec. 1, 1794. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, licensed by the Sebec Quarterly Meeting Jan. 9, 1830, and ordained Sept. 22 of the same year. The following churches were organized by him: Foxcroft, Sangerfeld, Kilmarnock, Corinth, Dover, and Hopkinton, all in his native state. He also visited the province of New Brunswick. In September, 1842, he went to Wisconsin, and, for seven years, was pastor of the Honey Creek Church. He performed pastoral work in several other churches in that state, residing in Rochester, Racine Co., where he died, March 15, 1880. See Morning Star, May 5, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Coombs, Benjamin, an English Baptist minister, was converted in 1800, at the age of fourteen. He studied at Stepney College for four years, and then became, for a time, a supply at East Dereham, Norfolk. Subsequently he preached for another Church in the same county, and afterwards for a Church in Herefordshire. His longest settlement was in Bridport, in Dorsetshire, where he died, Feb. 4, 1850. Mr. Coombs was a contributor to the pages of his denominational periodicals, "his attainments as a scholar being of no mean order." See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, p. 302, 303. (J. C. S.)

Coon (or McCoon), ABRAM, a Seventh-day Baptist minister, was born at Hopkinton, R. I., in 1763. In 1786 he professed faith in Christ, and was ordained as a minister Aug. 26, 1798. He died in Hopkinton, Sept. 29, 1813. He was an eloquent speaker, sound in doctrine, wise in council, kind and faithful, and as such won and held a high place in public esteem.

His brother ASA, and his nephew WILLIAM, were also ministers among the Seventh-day Baptists.

Also, his son DANIEL was a Sabbatarian minister, born in Hopkinton, Jan. 9, 1792. He was licensed to preach March 22, 1818, ordained April 4, 1819, became pastor in Brookfield, N. Y., and performed some missionary work. In 1836 he returned to Hopkinton, and took charge of the Church of which his father had been pastor. He died May 21, 1858. He was a man of fine presence, and of a genial, sympathetic nature. He spoke with ease, fluency, and vehemence, and was fervent and impassioned in prayer. See R. I. Biographical Cyclop. p. 164, 240. (J. C. S.)

Coons, ANDREW NELSON, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born March 20, 1825, of Lutheran parents. In early manhood he was converted, joined the Church, and served efficiently as a local preacher; in 1862 entered the Erie Conference; in 1865 became superannuated, removed to Illinois, worked a short time as an evangelist, and finally went to Oak Ridge, Mo., where he died, May 31, 1866. Mr. Coons was a man of rare talent and culture, and possessed deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 123.

Cooper, ABRAHAM, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to the island of Tobago, W. I., in August, 1835. After two years and three months labor, he returned to England, a victim of consumption, and died at the house of his brother-in-law, in Oldland-Common, near Bristol, June 8, 1838, aged twenty-nine years. "His valuable life was too short." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1838.

Cooper, ALEXANDER (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1645; was admitted to the living at Sorbie before 1665; continued in 1671; transferred to Selkirk about 1677, and continued in 1682. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 540, 745.

Cooper, ALEXANDER (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1690; appointed to the living at North Uist in 1692, and ordained; submitted to the Presbyterian Church government in June, 1699; and was drowned in August, 1706. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 185.

Cooper, ALEXANDER (3), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1692; refused a call to Durrisdeer in 1697; accepted a call to Traquair in 1698, and was ordained in 1699; in 1711 he had an assistant, and died Aug. 11, 1754. He published An Essay upon the Chronology of the World (Edinb. 1722). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 257.

Cooper, BENJAMIN, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Perry County, O., June 3, 1802. He received a careful religious training; was a bright example of early piety; acquired a good English education; loved the society of the aged and upright from his youth; was very retiring and modest; and in 1827 was admitted into the Ohio Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until his superannuation in 1836. He died May 13, 1846. Mr. Cooper possessed a sound mind, respectable preaching talents, and a sweet spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 74.

Cooper, DAVID (1), M.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach at Rotterdam; appointed to the living at Auchinleck in 1732, and ordained; and died July 9, 1751. He published two single Sermons. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 97.

Cooper, DAVID (2), a Baptist minister, was a pioneer of his denomination in south-west Mississippi. He was both physician and preacher in the region where he went in 1802. His labors extended throughout that section of the state, and also into eastern Louisiana. Being an educated man, he exerted his influence in establishing and maintaining institutions of learning. He assisted in the formation of the Mississippi Baptist Association, of which, for several years, he was the moderator. His "circular letters," published in the minutes of the association, are timely and valuable documents. He died in 1830. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 274. (J. C. S.)

Cooper, Ebenezer, a Presbyterian minister, was born in South Carolina in 1795. After receiving a careful academical education, he entered the South Carolina College; studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church at Philadelphia; was licensed to preach by the Philadelphia Presbytery in 1827, and was pastor, for several years, of Hephzibah Church, in West Tennessee. He died at Cedarville, O., Nov. 13, 1858. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 170.

Cooper, Edward, an English clergyman, became rector of Yoxhall in 1809, and died in 1833. He published, Practical and Familiar Sermons (7 vols. 12mo): — The Crisis; Prophecy and Signs of the Times (1825). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, Elijah, an English Methodist minister, was born at Norton-in-Hales, Aug. 6, 1828. He lost his parents in youth; was removed to Tunstall, where he attended the Primitive Methodist Sunday-school; became a teacher; was early converted, being always serious; and was accepted as a local preacher, winning many souls to Christ. He began to itinerate in 1854, and for twenty-three years preached faithfully and lovingly in the Tunstall district, his earnest appeals being very successful. In 1878 he settled at Shrewsbury as a supernumerary, working till his death, May 17, 1882.

Cooper, Elisabeth, an English martyr, was a native of Norwich, and dwelt in Lynn. She was at one time made to recant her religion, but being much troubled she entered a popish church while they were having service, and openly revoked her recantation. She was taken immediately and burned, dying happy amid the flames, in 1557. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 380.

Cooper, Eugene Becklard, a Universalist minister, was born at Russell, N. Y., May 6, 1852. He received an early Methodist training, and became an exhorter; but soon after embraced Universalism; graduated from the theological school at Canton in 1876, and took charge of the Universalist society in Mexico, Oswego Co. One year later he removed to Dexter, where he performed but one Sunday's service, when he was taken sick and suddenly died, Sept. 24, 1877. Mr. Cooper was industrious, modest, true to his convictions, amiable, and faithful; an able and acceptable preacher. See Universalist Register, 1878, p. 94.

Cooper, Ezekiel F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kent County, Del., May 18, 1830. He received a careful moral training; was thoughtful and upright from childhood; was converted at the age of thirteen; received license to preach in 1854, and in 1855 entered the Philadelphia Conference. His health declining, he became a supernumerary in 1861, and died June 28, 1862. Mr. Cooper's early disadvantages for acquiring an education were overcome by his natural thirst for knowledge. His prominent mental trait was his power of investigating, analyzing, and reasoning. His sermons were short, concise, clear, instructive, systematic, and uttered with much fervor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 47.

Cooper, George A. C., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of North Carolina, after his ordination became a teacher, in 1877, in St. Augustine Normal School, Raleigh, N. C., and continued to hold that position until his death in October, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Cooper, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1663; admitted to the living at Wighton before 1664; transferred to Mochrum in 1667, and thence to Humbie in 1681; deprived in 1695 for non-jurancy; instituted to the curacy of Holy Island the same year, and died in 1701. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 337, 730, 740.

Cooper, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Walsall, Jan. 1, 1782, of pious parents. He removed with them to Birmingham, became a Christian in early life, and after suitable trial was employed in preaching in the surrounding villages. In 1803 he was sent to Rotherham College, and on completing his course settled at Wirksworth, Derbyshire, where he labored but one year, then removed to West Bromwich, where he was ordained, and preached twenty years. After this his course was very checkered; having preached at various places, he finally retired to Norwich, where he died, May 27, 1868. Mr. Cooper wrote a book on Death Personification. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 202.

Cooper, James Ransom, an English Congregational minister, was born at Gosport, Jan. 3, 1792. He received a religious training, joined the Church at the age of seventeen, and soon after removed to London. He obtained his ministerial education at Gosport Academy, and was ordained at Emsworth, Hants, in 1819; removed thence in 1839, and became pastor successively at Pontypool, Wincanton, Old Gravel Lane, London, and finally at Seaford, Sussex. He died Aug. 17, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 264.

Cooper, John (1), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1742; ordained in 1752 as missionary at Fort William; presented to the living at Glass in 1756, and died Dec. 20, 1795, aged seventy-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 199.

Cooper, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, fifteen years in the itinerancy, was modest, blameless, subject to much dejection and sorrow, often in want, and died in great peace in 1789. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1789, p. 33.

Cooper, John (3), an English Baptist minister, was born at Evesham, Worcestershire, in 1821. When he was about fourteen years of age he joined the Wesleyans, and subsequently became a local preacher, but when about twenty-two joined the Baptists. For two years he remained at home, devoting himself to theological studies, and preaching in the villages. In 1844 he entered Horton College, and in 1849 settled at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he remained about two years, and then removed to Newark-on-Trent, commencing his pastorate in that place in December, 1851. He died Feb. 28, 1853. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1854, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Cooper, John (4), a Scotch clergyman, studied at Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1824; became assistant minister at Clackmannan, and afterwards at Arbroath; was appointed minister at Pittenweem in 1833; admitted in 1834, and died March 26, 1854, aged fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 457.

Cooper, John (5), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in England. He emigrated to Woodstock, Conn., in early manhood, for the purpose of engaging in a special branch of woollen manufacture; was there converted in 1842; began earnest Christian work at once; was licensed to preach in 1843, and admitted into the Providence Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity to the close of his life, Oct. 18, 1878. Mr. Cooper possessed a clear and vigorous intellect, and a glowing Christian experience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 79.

Cooper, John (6), an English Baptist minister, was called to preach at the age of twenty-four by the Church at Rattlesden, Suffolk, and at once employed in the chapels and villages around. The following year he was unanimously chosen to the pastorate of the Church at Wattisham, where he labored faithfully for more than forty-nine years, retiring in September, 1879. For the last fifteen years of his life he was secretary of the Suffolk and Norfolk Association. He was also co-secretary with Samuel Collins (q. v.) of the Home Mission, and an able editor of the Gospel Herald. He died

Feb. 22, 1880, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1882, p. 300.

Cooper, John H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was a member of the Memphis Conference seven or eight years, and died in 1862 or 1863. He was gentle in spirit, an able preacher, and a faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1863, p. 434.

Cooper, Joseph (1), an English nonconformist divine, was born in 1636, and died in 1699. He published, Eight Sermons on 1 Pet. v. 15 (1663):—Domus Mosæica Clavis (1673). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, Joseph (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Rotherhithe, Surrey, in 1800, and was converted when somewhat mature in years. His first ministerial services were at Orpington and Oxford. In 1835 he was instrumental in forming a church in Garden Row, London Road, which called him to be its pastor, and he remained there till his death, Feb. 17, 1862. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1863, p. 113. (J. C. S.)

Cooper, Joseph Calvin, a Congregational minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass., May 10, 1820. In early life he rejected the Bible. At the age of seventeen he became a sailor, and led a seafaring life about eight years. After he had settled at Denmark, Ia., he was converted. In 1848 he was engaged as a colporteur of the American Tract Society, and became specially successful in combatting infidelity for two years in southern Iowa. After this he studied theology at home, and commenced preaching in the church at Denmark, while the pastor was absent on vacation. In October, 1852, he was licensed by the Denmark Association, and was ordained May 1, 1853. His roving sailor habits followed him through life, and he went from place to place, especially in southern Iowa, and was always acceptable as a preacher. He labored, in 1856, in Fairfield, and an addition of twenty-five was made to the Church; was settled for some years in Hillsboro', and also preached for a time at Salem, but the most of his ministerial career was spent as an evangelist. He died at Cincinnati, Ia., Aug. 28, 1872. See Cong. Quarterly, 1874, p. 315.

Cooper, J., an English Baptist minister, was born at Bath, Oct. 24, 1793. He united with the Church at the age of seventeen, and soon after began to preach in the villages around his native city. He was ordained, April 8, 1819, pastor of a church at Amersham, and remained there until June, 1823, when he resigned; but immediately another church was formed in Amersham, and he became its pastor. His labors were greatly blessed during the seventeen years of his pastorate. In 1840 he removed to Leighton-Buzzard, his ministry here lasting seven years. He next went to Soham, then to Aberdare, and finally returned to Amersham, where he died, Nov. 23, 1871. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1873, p. 253. (J. C. S.)

Cooper, Myles, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1735, and educated at the University of Oxford, taking the degree of A.M. in 1760. He arrived in New York in the fall of 1762, and was at once appointed professor of moral philosophy in King's College, in that city. The following year, upon the resignation of Dr. Johnson, the president of the college, he was elected to fill his place. His administration, supported as he was by able assistants, was very successful. When the war of the Revolution commenced, the affairs of the college became embarrassed. Dr. Cooper was a loyalist, and he found his position so unpleasant that, in 1775, he resigned, returned to England, and became one of the ministers of an Episcopal Church in Edinburgh, in which city he died, May 1, 1785. He was the author of several literary works. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v.; Sabine, Loyalists of the Amer. Revolution, i, 335. (J. C. S.)

zen and philanthropist, was born in the city of New York, Feb. 12, 1791. His early education was confined to one year's schooling. He learned the trade of a hatter with his father, continued at this employment until he was seventeen years of age, and then found a position in a grocery store at twenty-five dollars a year. When he was of age he went to Hempstead, L. I., and worked in a woollen factory, then returned to New York and opened a grocery store. After this he changed his business five times, and finally commenced the manufacture of glue and isinglass, and exerted himself in the development of iron, and railroad and telegraph interests. Ultimately he employed in his various business engagements upwards of two hundred and fifty hands, not one of whom ever went unpaid. In all the panics and business failures in New York his finances were firm, and his wealth increased with his years, which may be attributed to his engaging in no hazardous speculations. When a young man, he conceived the idea of establishing an industrial school of science and art for indigent young men who were obliged to depend upon their own resources, and he established the Cooper Union in New York city, open for instruction in all branches of science and art. He resolved, wisely, to be the executor of his own estate, and see the fruits of his liberality. Yearly three thousand students receive gratuitous education in its halls. He contributed to the building and endowment of the institute nearly one million dollars. He died April 7, 1883, wealthy and honored. See N. Y. Observer, April 12, 1883; Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.; Men of the Time, s. v.; Autobiography (N. Y. 1877). (W. P. S.)

Cooper, Peter (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at St. Neots, Huntingdonshire, in 1804. He was converted when nineteen years of age, entered the ministry in 1830, retired from active work in 1864, and died at Blackheath, April 20, 1878. His insight into character and his broad common-sense gave him power in dealing with the problems of life. He was a plain, practical preacher; his style was quaint, sometimes epigrammatic; his piety was cheerful and lowly. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 88.

Cooper, Preston, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Warren County, Tenn., Dec. 29, 1806. He was converted in 1827, and in 1828 united with the Mississippi Conference. His health failing, obliged him to become a supernumerary in 1857, and he died in July, 1858. Mr. Cooper was a man of extraordinary mental ability, and a laborious student; a courageous preacher, and an energetic pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1858, p. 86.

Cooper, Richard (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Woodend, Staffordshire, in 1782. He was converted at the age of twenty, entered the ministry in 1814, travelled eighteen circuits, became a supernumerary in 1846 at Windsor, and died Nov. 30, 1848. He was a faithful and godly minister. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1849.

Cooper, Richard (2), an English Methodist preacher, son of the foregoing, was received by the British Wesleyan Conference in 1857, sailed for West Africa, labored with success for a short time, and died at St. Mary's, on the Gambia, Aug. 13, 1859, in his twenty-sixth year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Cooper, Robert (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Mochrum, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1744; was licensed to preach in 1749; appointed minister at Girthon, and ordained; and died Nov. 7, 1776, aged fifty-one years. He was a useful pastor, a worthy man, and a good Christian, having extensive knowledge in several branches of philosophy. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 714.

Cooper, Robert (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in the north of Ireland about 1732. He removed to America with his mother in 1741; graduated at New Jersey College in 1763; studied theology privately, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, Feb. 22, 1765. In the same year he received a call from the Presbyterian Church at Middle Spring, Cumberland County, Pa., where he labored with great zeal and effect for thirty-one years. He died April 5, 1805. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 270.

Cooper, Robert (3), a missionary of the Church of England, was a native of Wales. He was sent to South Carolina in 1758, and became rector of Prince William parish. The following year he was chosen assistant minister of St. Philip's Church, Charleston. St. Michael's Church was opened in February, 1761, and from that year until June, 1776, he was its rector. His parishioners declared the pulpit vacant because he espoused the royal cause. Afterwards he went to England and received a pension of one hundred pounds yearly in consideration of his sacrifices for the king. Soon after he was appointed joint curate and joint lecturer at St. Andrew's, Holborn, and evening lecturer at St. Michael's, Cornhill, of which he afterwards became rector. He died in England about 1812, more than eighty years of age. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 171.

Cooper, Samuel (1), D.D., an English divine of the latter part of the last century, rector of Morley and Yelverton, Norfolk, published Sermons (1776-90). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, Samuel (2), D.D., an English divine, was minister of Great Yarmouth, and died in 1800. He published, Definitions and Axioms Relative to Charity, Charitable Institutions, and the Poor Laws (1764);—Sermons (1782-90);—Letters to Dr. Priestley (1800). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, Samuel (3), an English Baptist minister, was born in 1766, baptized Dec. 16, 1787, and united with the First Church in Birmingham. He was ordained Jan. 18, 1807, and first became pastor at Romsey, Hampshire, having for a few years served the Church in Wallingford as an assistant. Subsequently he settled at Cholesey, where he died, March 7, 1839. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1839, p. 24. (J. C. S.)

Cooper, Samuel Milroy, a Presbyterian minister, was born in the Kishacoquillas Valley, Pa., in 1814. He graduated at Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, in 1836; studied one year (1837) at Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Huntingdon Presbytery, April 16, 1840, and ordained Oct. 15 following, as pastor at Lick Run Mills, Centre Co., Pa., and continued to preach there until the spring of 1852. He was also at this time in charge of a female seminary at Jacksonville, and continued in this position for about a year and a half after his pastoral relation closed with the Lick Run Church, when he received a call to Clearfield, and there spent two years. After a trip to Florida for his health, he became stated supply at Little Valley, Pa., but soon returned to the female seminary, the buildings of which belonged to him. His health shortly failed altogether, and he died at East Kishacoquillas, Aug. 16, 1860. See Hist. of Presbyterianism in Huntingdon, 1874; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 114.

Cooper, Solomon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Easton, Talbot Co., Md., in 1824. He was converted when quite young; removed to Towanda, Pa., in 1844; there joined the Wesleyan Methodists; served faithfully as an exhorter and local preacher several years; and in 1869 was admitted into the Delaware Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and labored in it with great acceptability until his death, Dec. 26, 1877. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 6.

Cooper, Sylvester W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Troy, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1839. He received a careful religious training; was converted in 1857, and in 1861 entered the Troy Conference, wherein he served the Church with marked zeal and devotedness until his decease, Nov. 23, 1864. Though young, Mr. Cooper was an excellent preacher, a devoted Christian, and a successful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 76.

Cooper (or Couper), Thomas (1), D.D., a learned English prelate, was born at Oxford about 1517. He was educated in the school adjoining Magdalen College, of which he became a fellow in 1540. In 1546 he applied himself to the study of physic, and practiced some time in Oxford, being secretly inclined to the Protestant religion; but resumed his study of divinity, in March, 1567, and soon after became dean of Christ-church. In 1569 he was made dean of Gloucester, and in 1570 bishop of Lincoln. In July, 1572, he preached a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, in vindication of the Church of England and its liturgy, which did him much credit. In 1584 he was translated to the bishopric of Winchester, where he died April 29, 1594. His writings were numerous, among them are, Cooper's Chronicle (1559);—Thesaurus Linguae Romanae et Britannicae, and Dictionarium Historicum et Poeticum (1565, fol.). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, Thomas (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Staincross, near Wakefield, in 1760. At an early period in his life, his parents, who were members of the Established Church, were converted under Methodist preaching. In 1779, Thomas, after prolonged and severe struggles, was himself converted, and on the invitation of Wesley attended the Kingswood School for fifteen months. He travelled twenty-three circuits, and in 1821 settled in Liverpool, where he died after long and complicated affliction, Oct. 1, 1832. "He was a man of sound sense, and of more than ordinary ministerial talent; so that his labors were not only acceptable, but popular and useful." He was a good historian and grammarian, somewhat taciturn, and occasionally sarcastic. See Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1835, p. 1, 81; Minutes of the British Conferences, 1833; Wesleyan Takings, i, 331.

Cooper, Thomas W., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born Jan. 28, 1818. He embraced religion in his sixteenth year; was a pupil in the Manual Labor School near Covington, Ga., in 1837-38; was then licensed to preach, and received into the Georgia Conference. He afterwards became a member of the Florida Conference, and in it did faithful work until his decease, Feb. 24, 1860. Mr. Cooper was a very eloquent declaimer, a successful revivalist, and zealous in all his work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 269.

Cooper, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was tutor to Alexander, lord Garlies; called to the living at Mochrum in 1701, and died June 1, 1747. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, i, 740.

Cooper, William (2), D.D., was admitted archdeacon of York, Jan. 21, 1777, and prebendary of Southwell the 20th of the same month. He published Discourses (1795, 2 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cooper, William (3), an English Congregational minister, was born in Warwickshire, Aug. 28, 1776. He delivered his first sermon Feb. 1, 1795, and a few months later became the most popular preacher of his day. Multitudes pressed to hear him at Spa Fields and Tottenham-Court-Road chapels, as well as in the Tabernacle. He discoursed to the Jews in Zion Chapel, London, Aug. 28, 1796, on his twentieth birthday. The throng was so great that thousands could not gain entrance, and while he was speaking inside four other ministers preached outside. He undertook a tour through various parts of Ulster, Ireland, in the summer of 1799, addressing thousands, and also made a second tour the following summer. He was then called to the pastorate of the Plunket Street Congregational Church, Dublin, and entered upon his labors in April, 1802, where he continued till March, 1828, when he was forced to retire from public effort. He died Jan. 22, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 217.

Cooper, William (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Beaver County, Pa., March 25, 1814. He experienced religion in 1836; was licensed to preach in 1837, and in 1840 entered the Pittsburgh Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until the close of 1867. The last year of his life was spent in the service of the Western Seamen's Friend Society, as an agent. He died in 1868 or 1869. Mr. Cooper was of a sober, retiring disposition, a faithful minister, an excellent pastor, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 45.

Cooper, William Hawes, an English Congregational minister, was born in the city of Bath in 1798. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and entered Hoxton Academy to prepare for the ministry in 1816. In 1819 he commenced his labors in a temporary place in Dublin, and soon succeeded in building up a new Congregational Church in that city. He was for some years the resident tutor of the theological seminary of the Irish Evangelical Society, and the secretary of the Congregational Union in Ireland. He endured many and sore trials; was in labors most abundant; refused offers of augmented income to allure him from his chosen duties. He was a warm and generous friend, an affectionate parent, an able tutor and preacher, but troubled occasionally with an infirmity of temper. He died at Manor Street, Dublin, March 1, 1847.

Cooper, William H., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Pittstown, N. Y., June 27, 1808. He studied for a time under Rev. C. Bogardus, and finished his preparatory course at the New Brunswick Classical School. He graduated from Rutgers College, N. J., in 1830, and entered the theological seminary there, where he remained two years. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Onondaga, and installed pastor of the Church of Wampsville, N. Y., Nov. 23, 1833. After ministering to this church twenty-four years, he was called to the pastorate of the United Presbyterian churches of Belleport and South Haven, Suffolk Co., N. Y., where he was installed Sept. 23, 1856. He died at Parsippany, N. J., Feb. 24, 1880. Dr. Cooper was eminently a preacher and a pastor; a faithful member of the presbytery and synod, and several times represented his presbytery in the general assembly. See N. Y. Observer, March 11, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Cooper, W. B., a Baptist minister, was born in Abbeville District, S. C., in 1807. He received a good early education under the direction of his father, a man of rare culture and intellect, and graduated from Columbian College in 1837. He was ordained in Augusta, Ga., in 1838, and in 1839 or 1840 went to Florida, taking up his residence at Madison Court-House. For a period of about thirty-eight years he labored chiefly in Middle Florida, sometimes itinerating in Georgia. He accomplished much for his denomination, which frequently called him to preside at conventional and associational meetings. He died in 1878. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 277. (J. C. S.)

Coore, Richard, D.D., an English divine, who died in 1687, published Practical Exposition of the More Difficult Texts that are Contained in the Holy Bible (1663), in the preface of which he says, "The dreams in Daniel, and the visions of all the prophets, and the two mystical books of the Canticles and the Revelation are all clearly opened." See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coots, Charles, a Scotch clergyman, held a bursary of theology at Glasgow University in 1698; was licensed to preach in 1702; called to the living at Govan in 1711; ordained in 1712; was chaplain in the royal army at Sterling in 1715, and died Dec. 31, 1745. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 69.

Cop (Lat. Copius), BALTHAZAR, a German poet and philosopher, lived in the latter half of the 16th century. He taught at the gymnasium of Lemgo, embraced the doctrines of the reformed religion, went to the Palatinate, and became superintendent at Neustadt. He wrote, De Christi Prasentia in sua Ecclesia (1565):—Erklärung der Epistel an die Galater (1587):—Elegia:—Eptigrammata. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cope (from cop, a covering, or caput, the head, over which it was thrown, or capere, from taking in the whole body). We give additional particulars concerning this clerical garment from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.:

"There were several kinds of this cloak-like vestment: "1. The Processional or Ceremonial Cope, called the Pluviale, worn out of doors, whence its name—a protection from rain in processions. It appears to have been modelled by pope Stephen, in 256, on the Roman lacerna, a large, square-hooded cloak, fastened with a brooch upon the breast, and worn by soldiers and civilians in the last age of the Republic, and it resembled the Greek mandyas or chlamys, a habit of smaller dimensions than the palium. The lacerna was usually sad-colored, purple or red. The open part of the cope denoted that eternal life was offered to the minister of holy deportment; and the entire habit was an imitation of the purple robe of mockery, or sakkos, which our Lord was compelled to wear. It was also often called the byrrhus. The cope was originally a great cloak, worn in processions principally, which in time was gradually enriched with embroidery and gems, so that in the 18th century it had become one of the most magnificent vestments in use, and was known as 'precious.' It frequently had superb orphreys and a hood splendidly worked with figures of saints and other patterns. In pre-Norman times there were, in England, tassels and movable hoods of thin beaten gold and silver, such as William's stole at Ely. Some examples had fringes of bells, like one at Canterbury, which had a little chime of one hundred and forty, in 1108, and others sent by William I to Clugny, or presented by Lanfranc, Ernnlph, and Conrad to their minister. One is still preserved at Aix-la-Chapelle, having silver bells round the hem, said to have been given by pope Leo III at the coronation of Charlemagne. There are three copes of the 14th century at Durham, one of which is of crimson silk, with the behead of Goliath; two at Langharne; one of green velvet, of the 14th century, at Ely; two at Carlisle of the 15th and 16th centuries; one of crimson velvet, with crowns and stars of Bethlehem, at Chipping-Camden; some of the date of James II, at Westminster; several of the 14th century at Spire; one of the 15th century, found at Waterford Cathedral, at Oscott; some of the 17th century at Riechholme, worn by the bishops of Lincoln at coronations; and others at Wardour Castle, Weston Underwood, and Stonyhurst; some traditionally being said to have been brought from Westminster. The silken copes were distributed in choir by the precentor to the various members, upon great festivals; at other times they were carefully folded and put away in triangular cope-chests. Every canon, at his installation, presented one of these precious or processional copes to the fabric; and every abbot or bishop gave a cope of profession, on his appointment, to Canterbury Cathedral. In England, at the Reformation, the precious copas were, unhappily, too often desecrated to garnish beds as coverlets. Bishop Cosin wore a cope of white satin. Portions of copes are still, in several English churches, used as altar or pulpit cloths.

"2. The Canonical or Choral Cope was a large, full, flowing cloak of black woollen stuff, worn by canons and vicars in cathedrals. It is mentioned at Chichester, in the 12th century, as without corsets and open. It opened downwards from the breast, and was sewed up as far as the throat, round which was a hood. In the 15th century, the almuce was sewn on to the cope like a hood, except when it was carried across the shoulders, or thrown over the left arm.

"S. The Close or Sleeveless Cope, an ample hood lined with fur, did not open in front, whence its name. The hood was of ermine, like that of the proctors at Oxford. It is seen depicted on the famous wall-painting of Chichester Cathedral—bishop Sherborne being habited in it. In the 18th century all clerks were required to wear close copes in synods, and in the presence of prelates and parochial clergy in their parish; they were to be laid aside on journeys. Black canons, Benedictines, and nuns were to use black, and not colored copes, and faced only with black or white fur of lambs, cats, or foxes. They were forbidden caps by H. Walter's canons in 1200. In 1196 priests were forbidden to wear sleeved copes. In 1222 monks and canons were proscribed burnet or irregular cloth, or girdles of silk, or gold embroidery in their habit, and the nuns were to use no veil of silk. At the close of the 12th century dignitaries were allowed the use of sleeved copes; but in 1222 it was found necessary to forbid the gay colors of red and green adopted for copes. The monk retained the sombre hue of black. At Cambridge doctors of divinity still wear, on formal occasions, a cope of scarlet cloth with ermine bands in front. By the Laudian statutes of Oxford on formal occasions, they are required to wear either the close or open cope; and bachelors of arts, when reading in the Bodleian library, were enjoined to be attired in 'their habit or cope, cowl, and cap.'

"The Cappa Magna, worn in processions and during certain functions in Italy at this day, corresponds to the English close cope. It is a large violet-colored habit, with a train and an ermine cape when worn by bishops, but only furred when canons use it."

Cope, Alan, an English Roman Catholic, who died about 1580, published Historia Evangelice Veritatis (Lond. 1572):—and, under his own name, the Latin work of Nic. Harpsfield, entitled Dialogi seu Contra Summi Pontificatus Monasticam Vitam, etc. (Antw. 1566). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, & v.

Cope, David, a minister of the Society of Orthodox Friends, was born at East Bradford, Chester Co., Pa., Jan. 24, 1787. His first appearance as a minister occurred in his own monthly meeting, when he was about twenty-four years old, but he was not fully approved as such until 1814, four years thereafter. His ministerial labors were mostly within the limits of Philadelphia, but in 1852 he visited the subordinate meetings of Ohio. He died Sept. 24, 1864. See Memorials, etc., for Pennsylvania, 1879, p. 479.

Cope, Edward, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lisbon, N. Y., May 25, 1806. He joined the Church in 1827, studied two years (1833 and 1834) at Centre College, one year in the Western Theological Seminary; graduated from the Auburn Theological Seminary in 1836; was ordained as a missionary to India, and, after a service of ten years, returned on account of ill-health; preached at Norwich, N. Y., and the vicinity, from 1854, and died at Gilbertsville, May 10, 1884. See Presbyterianism in Central N. Y. p. 503; Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 46, 289. (W. P. S.)

Cope, James (1), an English Congregational minister, was born Jan. 8, 1800. He joined the Church at King Street Chapel, Birmingham, when in his twenty-second year, entered Cheshunt College in 1824, and preached first at Middleton, near Manchester, Sept. 2, 1827, where for some years he labored, and at Sleaford, Warrington, Farrington, and Alfriston successively, until his settlement over the Independent Church, Newmarket, in 1840. At the end of about six years he removed to Chatteris, then to Godmanchester, which he left in April, and accepted an invitation to Ashford in September, 1851. He died there, Oct. 12, 1852. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 208.

Cope, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Sept. 16, 1781. He was brought up by a pious mother, converted in early life, and educated at Hoxton Academy; was ordained at Weytown, near Bridport, in 1815; retired from the pastorate in 1823; accepted a call to St. Austell in 1828, and resigned in 1848. He died while on a visit to Plymouth, May 28, 1863. Mr. Cope generally supported himself by keeping a boarding-school. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 204.

Cope, Richard, LL.D., F.A.S., a distinguished English Congregational minister, was born in London, near the spot where the Craven Chapel now stands, Aug. 23, 1776. Becoming a junior clerk in St. Albans Street, he was made chaplain of the lady of the house. He was next engaged with Kenneth Mackenzie, of Loch Torridge, Rosshire, Jan. 21, 1798, and while there employed his vacant hours in studying theology. On Dec. 9, 1795, he became the clerk of Edward Leigh, Esq., of Tooke's Court, but his desire for the ministry reviving, he entered Old College, Hoxton, March 5, 1798, and there continued until his removal to Lancaster, June 28, 1800. At the last-named place he conducted a boarding and day school with extraordinary success, preached in sixteen villages, enlarged the chapel four times, and saw numbers added to the Church. He removed to Dublin as professor or tutor in New College, Manor Street, Aug. 1, 1820, but resigned after two years. He then travelled through the north of Ireland on behalf of the Irish Evangelical and London Missionary societies. On Sept. 30, 1822, he became pastor of Salem Chapel, Wakefield, where he was very successful, and removed, April 8, 1836, to Penryn, where the house soon became crowded. In 1840 he erected a chapel at Poliphant, near Launceston, and another at Mylor Bridge, near Penryn, where he preached every Sunday afternoon. His labors for fifty-six years were abundant. During that time he preached three times on Sundays and several times through the week. He died Oct. 26, 1856. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 172.

Cope, Samuel, a minister of the Society of Orthodox Friends, was born at East Bradford, Chester Co., Pa., Feb. 28, 1789. His mother, Jane Cope, was a minister for more than fifty years, and died March 28, 1834, aged seventy-three years. When thirty-nine years old Samuel became an elder, and in 1835 was duly acknowledged as a minister. He visited several yearly meetings in the United States. He died Nov. 11, 1871. See Memorials for Pennsylvania, 1879, p. 495; The Friend, vii, 208.

Cope-chest is a deep and broad wooden chest, semicircular in shape, for containing copes unfolded—an ordinary piece of furniture in the sacristies of our largest and most important churches in past years. Examples are to be seen, among other places, at Wells Cathedral, at Salisbury Cathedral, at York Minster, at Lockinge, Berkshire, and at Brampton, Northamptonshire. See Chests.

Copeland, Adoniram Judson, a Congregational minister, was born at Brewer, Me., in March, 1814. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1840, and from the Bangor Theological Seminary in 1843. After preaching for a time in Maine he removed to Illinois, and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Church at Como, in that state. He died in 1855. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 541. (J. C. S.)

Copeland, David, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister and educator, was born in Braintree, Vt., Dec. 21, 1832. He graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1855, joined the Genesee Conference in 1858, and was the same year appointed principal of the Springville (N. Y.) Academy. In 1865 he was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference, and became president of the Hillsborough (O.) Female College. In 1872 he was elected principal of the Wyoming Seminary, and in 1878 was transferred to the Wyoming Conference. He died in Royalton, Vt., Dec. 6, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 88.

Copeland, Edmund, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Braintree, Vt., July 3, 1811. He was converted in 1825, licensed in 1829, and joined the New Hampshire Conference in 1833. In 1834 he was ordained deacon, and in 1836 elder. He was a successful preacher and pastor, and filled several of the best appointments in the conference. In 1852 that body sent him as a delegate to the General Conference. When on Middlesex and Montpelier Circuit he was prostrated by excessive labors, from which he never recovered. He died at Barre, April 16, 1881. Mr. Copeland was modest, retiring, prudent, thoughtful, and devoted. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 94.

Copeland, George W. Doane, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Boston, Mass., Feb. 22, 1833. In 1860 he graduated from the German Theological Seminary, and was ordained deacon in that year, and priest in 1863. His ministerial life was spent in connection with St. Luke's Church, New York city, though his labors were frequently interrupted by bodily suffering. He died in Boston, May 21, 1864. His character was distinguished by marked piety. See American Quarterly Church Review, April, 1865, p. 139.

Copeland, Henry, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was admitted into the Memphis Conference in 1846, located in 1850, removed to Vicksburg, and in 1856 entered the Mississippi Conference, wherein he labored until he became superannuated, in 1868. Not long afterwards he removed to British Honduras, and from that time to the close of his life labored constantly and successfully as a missionary there. He died July 24, 1879, aged about sixty years. He was a substantial Christian, faithful minister, and a devoted father and friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 49.

Copeland, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Reynolds County, Mo., Aug. 21, 1836. He experienced religion, joined the Church South, was licensed to preach, and admitted into the St. Louis Conference in 1853. Being anti-slavery in sentiment, he removed to Illinois at the beginning of the Rebellion, and was admitted into the Southern Illinois Conference. Failing health obliged him to become a superannuate in 1871, which relation he sustained until his death, Oct. 12, 1872. Mr. Copeland was a man of strong convictions, and a plain, practical, earnest, faithful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 137.

Copeland, John (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Holderness, Yorkshire, and is referred to as having been "well educated." In 1657 he went to America with Christopher Holder and other Friends, his "companions in tribulation." Returning to his native land, he passed through the vicissitudes which fell to the lot of the Quakers of his age. In 1687 he came again to America. After enduring much persecution, he died, Jan. 9, 1718, at a good old age. See Bowden, Hist. of Friends in America, i, 137. (J. C. S.)

Copeland, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Vermont in 1801. He was converted in 1821, began preaching in 1822, and joined the Genesee Conference in 1823. His first appointment was Eden Circuit, south of Buffalo, and embraced thirty appointments to be filled every four weeks. He became one of the leading men of his conference, eminently useful to the Church. As a presiding elder he was abundant in labors and wise in administration. He was superannuated during the last years of his life, and died at Lima, N. Y., Oct. 7, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 327.

Copeland, William, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of seventeen. He commenced his labors in 1806, and retired, on account of ill-health, in 1819, settling at Waterford, where he died, Sept. 22, 1822, aged forty-one. He was a man of superior attainments and excellence. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1823.

Copeland, William Ransom, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jackson County, O., Feb. 14, 1835. He united with the Church in 1853, was licensed to exhort in 1856, to preach in 1857, and in the same year entered the Ohio Conference. He died May 4, 1870. Mr. Copeland was a good preacher, a laborious, faithful, and successful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 249.

Copenhagen, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Hafniense). The place in which this council was held is not altogether certain; it was assembled by Peter Lukina, archbishop of Lund, in 1425. His suffragans, and some other bishops, abbots, etc., were present. A synodal letter was drawn up for the re-establishment of discipline, and the reformation of morals among both clergy and laity. These rules forbid luxury, drunkenness, frequenting wine-shops, carrying arms, having concubines, etc. All troublers of State or Church were excommunicated; nuns were forbidden to leave their convent without permission, and bishops to ordain any one belonging to another diocese without the consent of the bishop of that diocese. See Labbe, Concil. xii, 880.—London, Man. of Councils, a. v.

Copia, in Roman mythology, was the goddess of wealth, an allegorical figure, personifying plenty. See ABUNDANTIA; AMALTHEA.

Copinists were a sect of Universalists (q. v.) who denied the resurrection of the body.

Copland is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. GEORGE, was licensed to preach in 1722; called to the living at Birsay and Harray in 1730, and ordained. He died Aug. 9, 1735. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 398, 394.

2. PATRICK (1), was licensed to preach in 1671, and appointed to the living at Cushnie in 1672. He died in 1710. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 562.

3. PATRICK (2), was licensed to preach in 1704; called to the living at Tough in 1706, and ordained. He died Sept. 22, 1745, leaving a son, Dr. Samuel, minister of Fintray. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 566.

4. ROBERT, was ordained in 1814 as missionary at Euzie, and presented to the living at Durris in 1823. He died July 3, 1860, aged eighty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 499.

5. SAMUEL, D.D., took his first degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1738; was licensed to preach in 1739; called to the living at Fintray in 1745, and ordained. He died Feb. 19, 1795, aged eighty years. He published, An Essay on the Christian Character (1785). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 508.

6. THOMAS, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1603; was appointed in 1615 to the living at Redkirk (Renpatrick), and transferred to Temple in 1620. He died in August, 1631, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 307, 619.

7. WILLIAM, was born at Tough in 1709; took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1731; was licensed to preach in 1740, ordained as a minister at large in 1753, and presented to the living at Forres in 1763. He died May 8, 1772. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 578.

Copley, WILLIAM, an English Baptist minister, was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, in 1796. He was converted under the ministry of Rev. Dr. Steadman, at an early age; pursued the usual course of study at the academy in his native place, and was for a short time pastor in Haslingden, Lancashire. In 1821 he removed to Watford, Herts, where he remained till 1825, and then went to Oxford to become co-pastor with Rev. James Hereton, the relation continuing till 1839, when he went to Eythorne, Kent. He remained here until 1846, at which time he became pastor at Blakeney, (Gloucestershire, where he died, April 19, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858, p. 48. (J. C. S.)

Copp, JOHN B., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Lebanon, Me., March, 1811; his father, also, being a minister. He united with the Church at an early age. About 1833 he removed to Detroit, in the same state, where he was licensed to preach; and in 1835 was ordained. While teaching in the winter of 1836, in Corinna, a powerful revival commenced in his school and spread in different directions. In 1838 he went to St. Albans, where he resided nine years, preaching mostly in that place and in the adjoining towns. In July, 1847, he went to Ashtabula County, O. A part of his time was devoted to preaching in Geneva, Austinburg, Trumbull, and other places. In 1853 he removed to Flushing, Mich., where he died, Nov. 10, 1855. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1857, p. 86. (J. C. S.)

Coppa, STEFANO, an Italian engraver, practiced the art at Rome about 1775. He engraved a number of plates, among which is a print of The Ascension.

Coppenstein, JOHANN ANDREAS, a German Jesuit, who became a famous preacher at Coblenz in 1614, pastor of St. Peter's, at Heidelberg, in 1629, and died there, March 3, 1638, is the author of Excalvinizatio Catechismi Calvinio-Heidelbergensis:—Castigatio Apologiae Calvinio-catecheticæ et Apologiae Amstelrodamiensis:—Controversiarum Lutheri Calvinista Quadriceps:—Luthero-Calvinismi Antichristus, Genealogia et Anti-papista Mendax:—Calvinistica fidei Speculum:—Luthero-Calvinismi Infidelitas de Christo et Antichristo. Most of his writings were published under the title, J. A. Coppensteinii Controversia inter Catholicos et Hæreticos (1643). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coppi, JACOPO, an Italian painter, was born at Peretola, near Florence, in 1523. There is a fine picture by him, of The Crucifixion, in the Church of San Salvatore, at Bologna. He died in 1591.

Coppin, JEAN, a French voyager, was born about 1615, and became a cavalry captain in the war between France and Austria. He embarked in 1638 for Egypt, where he spent two years. On the second voyage he visited Tunis and Syria, and was appointed consul at Damietta in 1644. After a sojourn of three years in the East, he returned to Europe with the project of a crusade, in which he vainly attempted to interest the pope. He then addressed the public in a book, entitled Bouclier de l'Europe (Puy, 1686; Lyons, 1720). He died about 1690. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coppola, GIOVANNI CARLO, an Italian prelate and poet of the first half of the 17th century, was a native of Gallipoli, and became bishop of Muro in 1643. He lived five years on intimate terms with Campanella, and wrote some poems, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coptic Monks are the monks of Egypt living in the seven regular convents of that country, two of which are situated in the eastern desert near the Red Sea, four in the Natron Valley, and one at Jebel Koskun, in Upper Egypt. There are also several secondary monasteries, in which the priests are seculars, and into which women are admitted. The Coptic monks practice great austerities, living in deserts, sleeping in their clothes on the ground, and every evening prostrating themselves one hundred and fifty times with their face and breast on the earth. They spring from the lowest class of the people, and live on alms. A period of severe probation is required of all persons applying for admission into the monastic order. Besides making a vow of celibacy, they must perform, in some sequestered convent in the desert, such menial services as fetching wood and water, sweeping the rooms, or waiting upon the monks. See Histoire du Clergé (Amst. 1716), i, 98 sq. See CORTA.

Coq (Lat. Coquæus), LÉONARD, a French Augustinian monk, was a native of Orleans. He acted as professor of theology and ancient languages at Paris, Florence, and Rome; was confessor to the grand-duchess Christina of Florence; and died Nov. 27, 1615, leaving, among other writings, Augustini de Civitate Dei cum Commentariis:—Examen Prafontionis Monitoria Jacobi I Magnæ Britannia:—Anti-Morneus, etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coquelin, François, a French monk of the order of St. Bernard, was born at Salins, and lived in the 17th century. He wrote, Compendium Vitæ et Miraculorum Sancti Claudii (Rome, 1652). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coquelin, Jérôme, a French historian, was born at Besançon, July 21, 1690. He entered the Benedictine order, and was the last abbot of Faverney. He died Sept. 1, 1771, leaving in MS. some works relating to the history of Franche Comté. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coquelin, Nicolas. See COQUELIN.

Coquerel, Athanase Josué, D.D., son of the following, was born at Amsterdam, June 16, 1820. He studied at Geneva, and was ordained in 1843 by his father, at Nîmes. On account of his advanced liberal theological views, he had to resign his office, in 1862, and became the head and leader of liberal Protestantism in France. He died at Fismes, July 25, 1875. He was one of the founders of the Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français, in the year 1852. He also published a volume of unedited letters of Voltaire, on Tolerance, in 1863, and wrote, Jean Calas et sa Famille (Fismes, 1857; 2d ed. 1870). He left an unfinished work, L'Histoire de l'Eglise Réformée de Paris. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Coquerel, Athanase Laurent Charles, a French Protestant divine, and president of the Presbyterian Council of Paris, was born in that city, Aug. 27, 1795. He pursued his theological studies at Geneva and Montauban, and in 1816 was ordained pastor. During the following twelve years he resided in Holland, and preached with acceptance before Calvinistic congregations at Amsterdam, Leyden, and Utrecht. In 1830 he was called to Paris, and there spent the rest of his life. The first year he was there he established a periodical, entitled Le Protestant, which was continued till December, 1833, when he was chosen a member of the consistory. In January, 1834, the first number of the Libre Examen appeared, under the joint editorship of Coquerel and Artaud, and was carried on until July, 1836. He rapidly acquired the reputation of a great pulpit orator, and the liberal views which he announced with fearless freedom brought him more and more into antagonism with the rigid Calvinists. He was chosen a member of the Legion of Honor, at Paris, in 1835. After the revolution of February, 1848, Coquerel was elected a member of the National Assembly; and after the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, he confined himself to the duties of his pastorate, which he had not ceased to discharge. He died at Paris, Jan. 10, 1868. A large number of his Sermons were published, in eight volumes, between 1819 and 1832. Other works by him are, L'Orthodoxie Moderne, a reply to Strauss's Life of Jesus (Paris, 1841; transl. into Dutch and English):—

Le Christianisme Expérimental, a christology (ibid. 1858; transl. into German by H. Althaus, Hanover, 1859, 2 vols.)—Histoire Sainte (1839):—Projet de Discipline pour les Églises Réformées de France (ibid. 1861):—Bibliographie Sacrée (1825–26), etc. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 243; Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Coquerel, Charles Augustin, brother of the preceding, was born in Paris, April 17, 1797. He studied theology at Montauban, but after his return to Paris he also studied medicine and other sciences. He was one of the founders of the Archives du Christianisme and of the Annales Protestantes in 1819, and in 1825 of the Revue Protestante. He also published Histoire des Églises du Désert (Paris, 1841; Germ. transl. by Schilling, Stuttgart, 1846). He died Feb. 1, 1851. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 243. (B. P.)

Coracion was chief of the Millenarians of Arsinoë, in Egypt, about the middle of the 3d century. He was converted from his chiliastic views by Dionysius, the patriarch of Alexandria (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii, 24).

Coral, Pierre, a French chronicler of the 13th century, abbot of St. Martin of Toulouse, wrote a chronicle of this monastery. Coral left this abbey in 1276, in order to enter another, and his chronicle does not extend beyond this term. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coras (Lat. Corasius), JACQUES DE, a French Protestant theologian and poet, was born at Toulouse in 1630. He was a pastor in Guienne, and fulfilled several other religious functions. He died in 1677, leaving several poems on Old-Test. characters, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corbanus. See CERBAN.

Corbeil (Lat. Corbelius), PIERRE DE, a French theologian of the 13th century, was at first canon and doctor at Paris, then bishop of Cambray, and finally archbishop of Sens in 1200. While he taught theology at Paris he had for pupil Innocent III, who, on rising to the papacy, favored his former master, and confided to him important missions. Rigord, Alberic, Vincent of Beauvais, Trithemius, and Henry de Gand all eulogize Corbeil. He died June 3, 1222. Only fragments of his synodal ordinances remain. At the National Library of Paris there is a MS. entitled Petri de Corbellio Satyra Adversus eos qui Uzares Ducunt, which is perhaps his. He also wrote some Scriptural comments, still in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Corbellin, Pierre, a French theologian, was born in Maine about 1480. He taught belles-lettres at the College of Navarre, as John of Launoy attests. Du Verdier includes among his works, De Divino Missae Sacrificio:—De Hæreticorum Confutatis Opinionibus (Toulouse, 1523):—Petri Corbellini Cenomanensis Adagios Flosculi (Paris, 1520). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corbet, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1623; became school-master at Renfrew; was appointed minister at Bonhill in 1637; declined the authority of the general assembly in 1638; was deposed in April, 1639, and fled to Ireland, where he played a deceitful part, for which he was "hewed in pieces by two swine-herds in the arms of his wife," in 1641, aged about thirty-eight years. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 346.

Corbet, John (2), an English nonconformist divine, was born at Gloucester in 1620. He was educated at a grammar school there, and graduated at Oxford in 1639. He preached successively at Gloucester and Chichester, and became rector at Bramshot, in Hampshire, but was ejected in 1662, and afterwards lived privately in London, where he died Dec. 26, 1680. He published an account of the siege of Gloucester, besides several tracts, for which see Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Corbet, Richard, D.D., an English prelate and poet, was born at Ewell, in Surrey, in 1582, and was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, where, in 1605, he entered into holy orders. In 1618 he went to France, and wrote his Epistle to Sir Thomas Aylesbury, and his Journey to France, one of his popular poems. King James I made him one of his chaplains in ordinary, and in 1620 advanced him to the deanship of Christ Church. At this time he was vicar of Cassington, near Woodstock, in Oxfordshire. He was promoted to the see of Oxford Sept. 24, 1628, and April 7, 1632, was translated to that of Norwich. He died July 28, 1635. His poems, after passing through three editions, were carefully revised and published by his biographer, Mr. Gilchrist. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Corbett, James, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to the West Indies in 1833. He died after a short illness at Spanish Town, Jamaica, June 9, 1836. He was an amiable young man of promising talents. See Minutes of the British Conferences, 1836.

Corbett, Thomas, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born in Leicestershire. He began his labors in 1774, and died in 1789. He was a plain, pious, honest man, and though with but ordinary gifts, was generally acceptable. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Corbichon (or Corbechon), JEAN, a French writer, lived about 1350. He was an Augustinian monk, chaplain of king Charles V, and made himself known by a translation of a Latin treatise, entitled De Proprietatibus Rerum. This work, reviewed and corrected by another monk of the order, named Pierre Ferget, was published under the title, Le Grand Propriétaire (Lyons, 1482, 1485, 1491, 1500; Paris, 1510; Rouen, 1556). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Corbicus. See MANES.

Corbin, Ira Hamline, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Russia, Herkimer Co., N. Y., Sept. 1, 1812. He was converted at eighteen; licensed to preach at twenty-three, and in 1840 entered the Black River Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until his death, Dec. 11, 1856. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 365.

Corbitt, John A., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tipton County, Tenn., Dec. 28, 1836. He was converted at twenty-one; licensed to preach in 1872, and joined the White River Conference in 1876, when he was ordained deacon. In 1877 he was transferred to the Memphis Conference. He died Jan. 2, 1880, having been for a year a superannuate. He was a faithful preacher, and a close student. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 167.

Corbley, John, a Baptist minister, was born in England in 1733. He came to America and took up his residence in Virginia, where he gave himself to the work of the ministry. In 1768 he was forced to leave the state, on account of the persecutions which were inflicted upon the Baptists. He went to South-western Pennsylvania, and assisted in establishing churches in that region. The Goshen Church in Green County called him to be its pastor in 1775. While here his wife and five children were killed by the Indians. After a life of great usefulness he died in 1803. See Catholic, Baptist Encyclop. p. 277. (J. C. S.)

Corbmac (or Cormac) is the name of some forty-eight early Irish saints, of which we here present the best authenticated:

1. Priest in Achadh-finnich, commemorated May 11, according to the Mart. Doneg. (Todd and Reeves, p. 125). Colgan mentions a king by this name, son of Diarmaid, who turned monk in his old age, and likewise gives two Cormacs, priests, venerated on the above day (Acta Sanctorum, p. 360, a).

2. Of Armagh, venerated Feb. 17, seems to have been born near Mt. Usneach, and was baptized by St. Patrick. His father is said to have been Enna (Eunius or Enda), and he was coarb or abbot of Armagh, A.D. 482-497.

3. Of Trim (then Ath-truim), likewise venerated Feb. 17, seems to have been descended from the same family as the preceding, his mother being Fuinecta (Fuineacht), his brothers also bishops of adjoining sees, and his father's name Colman. He died A.D. 742.

4. Called Ua Liathain, abbot of Dermagh (now Derragh), and venerated June 21, was the son of Dima, and is surnamed "Corbmac the Navigator," from his voyages in the Northern Ocean. He afterwards founded a monastery in his own country, but there is no clue to his exact date.

Another anchorite of the same name is assigned to A.D. 865, but is otherwise unknown.

5. Of Munster, commemorated Dec. 14 (some erroneously March 26), was the son of Eugenius, and had several brothers who were saints. He retired to one place of solitude after another, and finally settled in a monastery at Mayo, on the Moy, probably about the middle of the 6th century.

Corbold, Alfred, an English missionary to India, was born at Ipswich, May 7, 1821. Having studied at Bedford, and subsequently at Colton End, he was accepted by the London Missionary Society and appointed to the Guzerat Mission. He was ordained Aug. 7, 1850, at Bunyan Meeting, Bedford; sailed in company with his wife for India, and arrived at his destination in January. From the beginning of 1856 the entire charge of the mission rested on Mr. Corbold. Early in 1860 the mission was transferred to the Irish Presbyterian Missionary Society; and he and his wife, having suffered in health, returned to England. Having been appointed to join the Madras Mission, he again sailed with Mrs. Corbold, arriving in Madras Jan. 31, 1862. There he took charge of the Tamil congregation, at Pureswakum, and three out-stations; while his wife took the superintendence of the native female boarding-school, and three vernacular day-schools for girls. But health again failing them, they returned to England in 1870. Three years later they resumed their labors in Madras. In 1875, illness rendering it necessary for Mr. Corbold to visit England, he returned home with his wife. It soon became evident that the faithful missionary's career was at an end. He died Sept. 28, 1877. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, Nov. 1877, p. 688.

Corbyn, A. D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Woodstock, Conn., in 1810. He graduated at Yale in 1838; and being admitted to orders, served twelve years in Missouri, and removed to the diocese of Mississippi in 1852, to take charge of St. Paul's Church, Columbus. He was next called to the rectorship of the College of St. Andrew, in 1853, and subsequently to the charge of St. Andrew's Church, in Jackson, where he faithfully served until his death, Oct. 18, 1855. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 638.

Corbyn, Candia, a Welsh minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Pontypool, Monmouthshire, about 1671. Through the ministry of Thomas Wilson she was brought to the knowledge of the truth in the eighteenth year of her age, and a few years after received "a call to the ministry," in the exercise of which "she was sound and clear." Through a long life she manifested the power of her religion. She died in Worcester, April 28, 1767. See Piety Promoted, ii, 428. (J. C. S.)

Corcan (Curcnaeus, or Corcunutan) is the name of three Irish saints, two of them commemorated Jan. 7, and one Sept. 30; but their identification is very uncertain.

Corcaria (or Corcair). See CURCACH.

Corcodemus (Corcodomus, Cocordanus, Curcodemus, etc.), Saint, was ordained deacon of Auxerre by pope Sixtus II, and preached in France in the 8d century. He died after the martyrdom of St. Peregrinus, and his relics were translated to the basilica of St. Amatoa. He is commemorated May 4. See Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, May, i, 452.

Cord, INVESTITURE WITH THE, is a name applied to the ceremony of introducing the young Brahmin into the sacred caste at the age of seven or nine years. Before this time he is regarded as no better than a Sudra; he has no privilege, no rank. By the laws of Menu, a Brahmin is to be distinguished from individuals of the secular classes by a cord (paṭa), which is worn hanging from the left shoulder, and resting on the right side below the loins. It consists of three thick twists of cotton, each formed of numerous smaller threads. These three separate twists, which on marriage are increased to three times three, are considered as emblematical of the three persons in the Hindû Trinity—Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. The cotton from which the cord is made must be picked from the plant by the hands of Brahmins only, and the thread must be spun and twisted by persons of the same caste. When the cord has been properly manufactured, the father of the young candidate endeavors to ascertain, by the rules of astrology, the month, the week, the day, the hour, the minute which will be most favorable for his son's investiture with the cord. The ceremony and the entertainment last four days, and at the close of each the guests receive numerous presents. For a description of the ceremony see Dubois, The Hindoos. See BRAHMINS; INDIAN CASTE.

Cord, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harford County, Md. He was converted in 1806; officiated some time as exhorter and local preacher, and in 1811 entered the Illinois Conference. A severe loss by fire necessitated his location for a few years, with the exception of which he labored faithfully and successfully until 1826, when failing health obliged him to become a superannuate. He died full of hope, March 28, 1827. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1828, p. 573.

Cordemoy, Gérard de, a French historian and philosopher, who died Oct. 8, 1684, was a native of Paris. He first practiced law, but soon abandoned his profession, and betook himself to the study of philosophy, especially that of Des Cartes. Bishop Bossuet introduced him to the French court, and he was appointed lector to the dauphin. In the year 1675 he was elected a member of the French Academy. He wrote, Histoire de France (from the beginning of the monarchy to the year 987, 2 vols.);—Six Discours sur la Distinction de l'Âme et du Corps;—Lettre à un Savant Religieux de la Compagnie de Jésus pour Défense le Système de Descartes;—Traité de Métaphysique;—Traité de l'Infaillibilité de l'Eglise. See Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 404; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v. (B. P.)

Cordemoy, Louis Gérard de, a French theologian, son of the foregoing, was born at Paris, Dec. 7, 1651. He took holy orders, was made doctor of theology, and applied himself to the conversion of the Protestants. After having aided the missions of Saintonge, he was appointed, in 1679, abbot of Fenières, of the order of Cistercians, in the diocese of Clermont, in Auvergne. He died in Paris, Feb. 7, 1722, leaving a number of religious letters and treatises, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Corder (Lat. Corderius), BALTHASAR, a Belgian theologian, was born at Antwerp in 1592. He entered the Jesuit order in 1612, and taught theology at Vienna. He was learned in Greek. He died at Rome, June 24, 1650, leaving Catena LXXV Græcorum Pa- trum in S. Lucam (Antwerp, 1628):—Jocannis Philoponi in cap. I Genes. de Mundi Creatione Libri IV (Vienna, 1681):—Expositio Græcorum Patrum in Psalmos, Digesta in Cutenum (Antwerp, 1648):—Job Elucidatus (ibid. 1646):—Symbola Græcorum Patrum in Evangelium Matthæi (Toulouse, 1646, 1647):—S. Cyrilli, Alexandrini Archiepiscopi, Homilias XIX in Jeremiam Prophetam, Hactenus Inedita (Antwerp, 1648). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cordes, EUTYCHÉ DK, a Belgian theologian, was born about 1520 at Antwerp. He entered the Benedictine order, in the monastery of St. Justin of Padua, of the congregation of Monte Cassino, was elected abbot of San Fortunato, near Bassano, and was invested with this title when he assisted, Feb. 26, 1562, at the eighteenth session of the Council of Trent, being one of the theologians chosen to arrange the catalogue of suspicious or pernicious books. After the close of the council he returned to the abbey of St. Justin, where he died in September, 1582. He left in MS. Commentarius in Omnes Epistolas Pauli:—Commentarius in Symbolum Apostolorum:—Dictionarium Biblicum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cordicôles (from cor, the heart, and colo, to worship) were a sect of Roman Catholic devotees which arose in France about the middle of the 18th century, professing to worship the sacred heart of Jesus and the heart of the Virgin Mary. See SACRED HEART.

Cordier, a French Jesuit of the 18th century, was chancellor of the University of Pont-à-Mousson, and wrote Éclaircissements sur la Prédestination (Pont-à-Mousson, 1746). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordier, Claude Simon, a French ecclesiastic, canon of Orleans, was born at Orleans in 1704, and died at the same place, Nov. 17, 1772, leaving La Vie de Sainte-Françoise de Chantal (Orleans, 1768, 1772). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cordier, François, a French monk of the Oratory, who died in 1693, wrote Vie d'Anne des Anges (Paris, 1694). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cordier, Jean, a French Jesuit, taught rhetoric, philosophy, and theology at Rheims; was afterwards rector of the college at Chalons, and died at Dijon, Nov. 22, 1673, in his seventy-fifth year, leaving a work entitled Familia Sancta. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cordier, Mathurin, a distinguished French priest, was born in 1479, taught languages at several places in France, and finally in Geneva, where he died in 1564, leaving some grammatical treatises, for which see Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Cordiner, James, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1808; became schoolmaster at Gartly in 1825; was licensed as an assistant preacher for nine years; presented to the living at Forgue in 1834, and died March 4, 1849, aged sixty-three years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 656.

Cordley, Christopher Mintz, a Congregational minister, was born at Oxford, England, in 1821. He emigrated to the United States when twelve years old; graduated at the Western Reserve College, Ohio, with the highest honors, in 1844, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1847; was ordained two years after in Hopkinton, N. H., and served successively at West Randolph, Mass., in 1852, West Brookfield in 1858, and Lawrence in 1862, where he died, June 26, 1866. Mr. Cordley was a man of great mental acuteness and originality, an earnest and critical student, a powerful and pungent preacher, and one who deeply sympathized with the people at large. See Cony. Quarterly, 1867, p. 374.

Cordon, James R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in England, March 7, 1835. He was converted in Detroit, Mich., in 1858, and in the same year entered the Detroit Conference, in which he labored for eighteen years with general acceptability and usefulness. He died April 18, 1876. Wherever Mr. Cordon was known, he was regarded as a devout, earnest, and successful minister; especially in the Sunday-school was he greatly beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 100.

Cordona, Juan Bautista, a Spanish prelate, who lived in the latter half of the 16th century, wrote, De Dislychiis (Tarragona, 1587):—De Bibliotheca Regia S. Laurentii in Hispania. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordova, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Cordubense). Two of these provincial synods are mentioned:

I. Held A.D. 847 or 848, by Osius, bishop of Cordova, which reaffirmed the action of the Council of Sardica (Labbe, ii; Hardouin, i).

II. Held A.D. 852, by order of Abderahman, the Moslem king, who caused the metropolitans of the different provinces to assemble. In this council voluntary martyrdom was condemned. This was not a legitimate synod. Eulogius speaks of it as a pseudo-council, not gathered together lawfully in the Holy Spirit, but collected by the advice of the infidels, and by order of a king, the impious enemy of the Christians. See Labbe, Concil. viii, 76; Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Cordova, Alfonso de, a Spanish theologian, was born at Salamanca in the latter half of the 15th century. He studied medicine at Paris, was first to introduce the doctrine of nominalism into the University of Salamanca, and died in 1542, leaving Principia Dialectices in Terminis Suppositiones Consequentius (Salamanca, 1519). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordova (or Corduba), Antonio de, a Spanish casuist, lived in the latter half of the 16th century. He belonged to the order of Minorites, and remained for a long time in a convent at Alcala de Henares. He wrote, Annotaciones in Dominicum Cotum (Alcala, 1553):—Expositio Regula Fructum Minorum (Louvain, 1554):—Commentaria in Quatuor Libris Magistri Sententiarum (Alcala, 1569):—Tratado de Casos de Consciencia (Toledo, 1575):—Questionarium Theologicum (ibid. 1578):—Additiones in Compendium Privilegiorum Fructum Minorum Alphonsi de Casarubis (Naples, 1595). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordova, Antonio Fernandez de, a Spanish Jesuit, who died at Grenada in 1634, wrote Instruccion de Confesores (Grenada, 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordova, Fernando de, a Spanish scholar, was born in 1422. He distinguished himself by the extent of his knowledge in theology, philosophy, medicine, mathematics, music, and in the languages, as Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee, and was also familiar with astrology, as well as acquainted with the works of the scholastics, philosophers, and physicians of Europe and the East. He had served with distinction against the Moors, under the colors of the king of Castile, John II, went to Paris, but his great wisdom caused him to be regarded as a sorcerer, and he repaired to Rome, where he found favor with popes Sixtus IV and Alexander VI. He died near the close of the 15th century, having composed a number of works, the more remarkable of which is an introduction to the treatise of Albert the Great, De Animalibus; this was published at Rome for the first time in 1478. Among his productions remaining in MS. we cite a commentary upon the Almagesta of Ptolemy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cordovero, Moses. See MOSES CORDOVERO.

Corella, Jaime dk, a Spanish theologian, was born in 1657. He entered the Capuchin order, was minister of Charles II, king of Spain, and died in 1699, leaving, Methodus qua Piusime Fiat Exercitium Vias Sacras (St. Sebastian, 1689):—Clavis Calii (1694):—Practica de el Confessionare (Pampeluna, 1742):—Summa de la Theologia Moral (Madrid, 1707). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coren, Jacques, a French theologian of the order of St. Francis, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, wrote, Clypeus Patientia (Lyons, 1622):—Observationes in Evangelia (ibid. 1627):—Civitas Avenionensis Pestilentia Laborans (Avignon, 1630). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corentinus, Saint, born in Brittany, is said to have been consecrated bishop of Cornwall (some say of Quimper, in Brittany) by St. Martin of Tours, and therefore in the 4th. century. His day is May 1 (others give Sept. 5 or Dec. 12). See CHORENTINUS.

Corentius. See CARENTIUS; CHORENTIUS.

Corenzio, Belisario, a Greek painter, was born in 1558. At the age of twenty-two he went to Venice and entered the school of Tintoretto. One of his best productions is The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes, in the refectory of the Benedictines, which he finished in forty days. He painted many admirable works for the churches of Naples. Some of his principal pictures are, The Virgin Crowned by the Trinity; The Visitation; The Presentation in the Temple; Life of the Virgin. He died in 1648. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Coret, Jacques, a Belgian theologian, was born about the middle of the 17th century. He entered the Jesuit order, and became celebrated by his virtue and zeal for souls. It is said that so many wished to confess to him that he absolved them en masse, not being able to take them singly. He died at Liege, Dec. 16, 1721, leaving several mystic works, under the titles of, Journal des Anges:—Maison de l'Éternité:—Le Cinquième Ange de l'Apocalypse; and a historic work, entitled Vie d'Anne de Beauvois (Lisle, 1667). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coret, Pierre, a Belgian theologian, was born at Ath, in Hainault, about the middle of the 16th century. He was at first curate of St. Crepin, and afterwards canon of the cathedral of Tournay, in 1574, where he died in 1602, leaving, Defensio Veritatis (Antwerp, 1591); which is a refutation of the Discours Politiques et Militaires of Lanoue:—Anti-Politicus (Douay, 1599), a work especially directed against the République of Dodin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coret-y-Peris, Cristoval, a Spanish theologian and grammarian, was priest of Alboraya, in the kingdom of Valencia, and taught Latin and eloquence at the episcopal school of Valencia. He died about 1760, leaving, Explicacion de la Syntaxis de Torrella (Valencia, 1712):—Noches i Dias Feriados (ibid. 1750). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Corey, Abel Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Fostoria, O., July 23, 1833. He experienced religion at the age of eighteen; acquired a good academic education; began preaching in 1860, and in the following year entered the Central Ohio Conference. After laboring in obscure places several years, he was elected state senator, in which capacity he served with much credit four years. In 1871 he again entered the effective itinerant ranks, and continued with marked zeal and success until his death, Oct. 4, 1875. Mr. Corey was clear in thought, apt in expression, generous in sympathy, self-sacrificing in labor, and strong in friendship. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 105.

Corey, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1797. He was converted in 1814; soon after began preaching in northern Vermont; located, and engaged in farming; moved to central New York, joined the Oneida Conference, and, after three years' labor, went west and entered the Illinois Conference. He became a superannuate, and died Aug. 23, 1844. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 585.

Corey, John Edwin, a Congregational minister, was born at Mansfield, Mass., July 29, 1825. He graduated at Amherst College in 1850; was ordained in 1853; labored as an evangelist for a short time in northern Ohio; preached in Massachusetts in the following places: Freetown, Chesterfield, Yarmouth, and North Wrentham, at which latter place he died, Nov. 30, 1865. Mr. Corey was an indefatigable student, and a clear and logical thinker. At the time of his death he had nearly ready for the press a Manual of Congregational Policy and Principles. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 201.

Corgen, Pierre, a French theologian who lived in the early half of the 18th century, belonged to the diocese of Quimper, was doctor of theology, and wrote, La Dispute Entre le Pape, Saint-Étienne et Saint-Cyprien (Paris, 1725):—Dissertation sur le Concile de Rimini (ibid. 1872):—Mémoire Touchant les Juges de la Foi (ibid. 1736):—Sur le Monothélisme et sur le Sixième Concile Général (ibid. 1741):—Défense des Droits des Evêques dans l'Eglise. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corinth. The following additional particulars concerning this once famous city are taken from Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on 1 Cor. i, 1:

"This great and wealthy city was the metropolis of Achaia, and situated upon the isthmus of the same name, which joins the Peloponnesus to the continent. Its position was highly favorable for that commerce which ultimately rendered it one of the most luxurious cities of the world. For, having two ports, one of which was open to the eastern and the other to the western navigator, while its geographical situation placed it, as it were, in the centre of the civilized world, it became the point where the merchants from every quarter of the globe met and exchanged their treasures. It was also celebrated for the Isthmian Games, to which the apostle makes some striking and remarkably appropriate allusions in his Epistles to the Corinthians. Nor should it be unnoticed that in the centre of the city there stood a famous temple of Venus, in which a thousand priestesses of the goddess ministered to licentiousness, under the guise of religion. From such various causes Corinth had an influx of foreigners of all descriptions, who carried the productions and the vices of all nations into a city in which the merchant, the warrior, and the seaman could have them for money. Devoted to traffic, and to the enjoyment of the wealth which that traffic secured, the Corinthians were exempt from the influence of that thirst for conquest and military glory by which their neighbors were actuated; hence they were seldom engaged in any war except for the defence of their country, or in behalf of the liberties of Greece; yet this city furnished many brave and experienced commanders to other Grecian states, among whom it was common to prefer a Corinthian general to one of their own state. As might be expected, Corinth was not remarkably distinguished for philosophy or science; but its wealth attracted to it the arts, which assisted to enrich and aggrandize it, till it became one of the very finest cities in all Greece. The Corinthian order of architecture took its name from that rich and flowery style which prevailed in its sumptuous edifices, its temples, palaces, theatres, and porticoes. [Yet it is noteworthy that no specimen of this style of architecture has been found there.]

"Corinth still exists as an inhabited town, under the same name Korinthos. It is a long, straggling place, which is well-paved, and can boast of a few tolerably good buildings, with a castle of some strength, which under the Turkish rule was kept in a good state of defence. There are still considerable ruins, to attest the ancient consequence of the city, and the taste and elegance of its public buildings. The extensive view from the summit of the high mountain which commands the town, and which was the Acropolis (Acro-Corinth) of the ancient city, is pronounced by travellers to be one of the finest in the world." Corio, Haymo, an Italian theologian and moralist, a native of Milan, became famous as a preacher, and was appointed consultant to the inquisition by Clement IX. Several times he was offered a bishopric, but declined. He died Sept. 17, 1679, leaving, Epitome Decretorum Conciliorum S. Mediolanensis Ecclesiae (Milan, 1640):—Manuale Regularis Disciplina (ibid. 1659):—Concordantiae Morales in Exodum (ibid. 1655):—

Coriolano, Bartolommeo, a Bolognese engraver, second son of Cristoforo, was born in 1599, and was instructed by his father and in the academy of the Caracci. The following are his principal plates: St. Jerome in Meditation Before a Crucifix; Herodius with the Head of the Baptist; The Virgin, with the Infant Sleeping. He died in 1676. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coriolano, Giovanni Battista, a Bolognese painter and engraver, elder brother of Bartolommeo, was born in 1589, and studied under Gio. Lodovico Valesio. He was employed somewhat upon the churches of Bologna. In the Nunziata is an altar-piece by this master, representing St. John, St. James, and St. Bernard. He did not attain much distinction. He died in 1649. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coriolis, GASPARD HONORÉ DE, a French theologian, was born at Aix about 1735. He became senior clerk at the parliament of Provence, canon of Notre Dame, and vicar-general of Mende. He died at Paris, May 14, 1824, leaving, Traité de l'Administration du Comté de Provence (Aix, 1788):—Exercices de Piété (Paris, 1816):—Des Chapitres et des Dignitaires (ibid. 1822). He also left several MSS., especially Abrégé de l'Histoire Ecclesiastique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corker, JAMES, an English theologian of the Benedictine order, who lived in the second half of the 17th century, wrote, The Roman Catholic Principles (Lond. 1690):—Stafford's Memoirs (ibid. 1682). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corlett, JOHN, an English Methodist minister, was born on the Isle of Man. He was converted in early life, offered himself to the conference in 1824, and, after a brief appointment to Kendal, entered upon mission work in Newfoundland, where he labored with indefatigable zeal and much success until 1830. He was then sent as chairman to the Bahama District, and there, as also in Barbadoes, Demerara, and Antigua, continued his toil with unabated devotedness until 1860, when he was welcomed back to Jamaica. He still labored abundantly in powerful preaching, in prayer, in erection of chapels, and the introduction of the Gospel into neglected localities, becoming a supernumerary after fifty years' missionary toil. He died Aug. 6, 1877. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 53.

Corley, ROBERT J., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Marianna, Fla., in 1840. He served in the Confederate army during the war, and entered the Georgia Conference in 1865; became superannuated in 1880, and returned to his birthplace, where he died, March 17, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 360.

Cormac. See CORBMAC.

Cormack, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was brought up as a blacksmith. He gained a prize at Edinburgh University for the best essay, and took his degree there in 1803; was licensed to preach in 1804, and ordained assistant at Stow in 1807. He died Dec. 20, 1840, aged sixty-four years. He published, A Sermon at the Opening of the Synod (1810):—Pastoral Hints to his Parishioners (1823):—Inquiry into the Doctrine of Original Sin (1824):—On Voluntary Church Association:—Illustrations of Faith (1839):—Memoir of the Rev. William Stark:—besides many contributions to the Edinburgh Christian Instructor. He also translated from the French Fénelon's Lives of the Ancient Philosophers (1803, 2 vols.), and The Church of Rome Examined, by Dr. C. Malan. Dr. Cormack was an ardent student, a faithful minister, and a judicious friend. His fervent piety was enlivened by a natural turn for racy humor. He formed an association for the improvement of servants in his parish. See Festi Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 534.

Cormacus, a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of Mortlach, translated to the see of Dunkeld, and is also spoken of as bishop of Aberdeen. He died in 1177. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 75.

Corman is thought by some to be the austere cleric (called by others Paulensis) who, about A.D. 635, endeavored to convert the Northumbrians. He is commemorated as a bishop and apostle of Anglia, March 12 or 20.

Cormick, DANIEL, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1838; appointed to the living at the South Church, Forfar, in 1839, and ordained; joined the Free Secession in 1843. He died May 23, 1848. See Faust Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 778.

Corn, ALLOWANCE OF, was a provision for the maintenance of the clergy, connected with the early stages of the recognition of Christianity by the empire. Constantine, in his zeal for his new creed, ordered the magistrates of each province to supply an annual amount of corn (ἐτήσια ἀντίδοτα), not only to the clergy, but to the widows and virgins of the Church (Theodoret, i, 11). When Julian succeeded, he transferred the grant to the ministers of the heathen cultus, which he revived (Sozom. v, 5; Philostorg. vii, 4). Jovian restored it, but on the lower scale of one third of the amount fixed under Constantine. The payment continued, and was declared permanent by Justinian (De SS. Eccles. cod. i, tit. 2).

CORN, EARS OF, in Christian Art, is not so frequent an emblem as might be supposed. See LOAVKA. The thought seems to have gone always to the bread of life with sacramental allusion. The corn and reaper are represented in a compartment of a vault in the catacomb of Pontianus. Again, the harvest corn is opposed to the vine and cornucopia of fruit (Catacomb of Callixtus).

The more evidently religious use of the ears of corn is in various representations of the fall of man. On the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (probably A.D. 358) Adam and Eve are carved—the former bearing the corn, in token of his labor on the earth, and the latter a lamb, indicating woman's work, spinning. In a bass-relief from the catacomb of St. Agnes there are two human forms, apparently both male, standing before a sitting figure, supposed to represent the First Person of the Trinity. This may represent the offering of Cain and Abel; at all events, the corn-ears and lamb are either received or presented by the standing figures. As these figures are of no more than mature (even of youthful) appearance, the Second Person may be supposed to be intended by them.

Cornac, JEAN, a French preacher, abbot of Villevin, was a man of high standing with his ecclesiastical superiors, and became intimate counsellor of the duke of Mayenne. He died in 1614. Historians do not mention him, and his works are unpublished. The National Library has four large volumes of his Sermons. He was learned in ecclesiastical history. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cornæus, MELCHIOR, a German Jesuit, was born at Brilon, in Westphalia, in 1598. He was professor of philosophy at Toulouse, afterwards of theology at Mayence and Würzburg, and died March 13, 1665. He wrote, Miracula Ecclesiæ Catholice Defensio:—Mores Lutheri et Calvinii Judicati:—Ena Rationis Lutheri-Calvinici:—Curriculum Philosophiæ Peripateticæ:—Murus Papyrachus Purgatorii, etc. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cornara, CARLO, an Italian painter, was born at Milan in 1605. He painted some works for the churches at Milan, one of the best of which is an altar-piece for the Church of St. Benedict, in Pavia. He died in 1673. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cornara, FLAMINIO. See CORNELIUS.

Cornelle, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter and engraver, brother of Michel the Younger, was born at Paris in 1646. He was instructed by his father, visited Rome, where he studied several years, and on his return to Paris was received into the Royal Academy in 1676. He died in 1695. Some of his works are, St. Peter Delivered from Prison; Christ Appearing to St. John; The Baptist in the Wilderness; Christ and the Samaritan Woman; St. Francis. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cornelle, MICHEL, the Elder, a French painter, was born at Orleans in 1603, and studied under Simon Vouet. He executed twelve large pictures for the churches, and was one of the twelve original members of the Royal Academy at Paris. Some of his works are, The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth; The Murder of the Innocents; Christ Appearing to Magdalene, and The Virgin Suckling the Infant Jesus. He died at Paris in 1664. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cornelle, MICHEL, the Younger, a French painter and engraver, son of the foregoing, was born at Paris in 1642. He studied at Rome, and soon after his return to Paris was received into the Academy, painting for his reception-piece The Culling of Peter and Andrew to the Apostleship. He engraved a great number of plates, among which are the following: God Appearing to Abraham; Abraham Setting out with his Son Isaac for the Sacrifice; The Conception of the Virgin; The Baptist Preaching in the Desert; Abraham Sending away Hagar; Christ and the Virgin Appearing to St. Francis; Jacob Wrestling with the Angel. He died in 1708. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cornejo, DAMIANO, a Spanish theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, wrote Chronica Seraphica, etc. (Madrid, 1682-1698). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cornejo (de Pedrosa), PEDRO, a Carmelite of Salamanca, who died March 31, 1618, was one of the most famous interpreters of the philosophy of Thomas of Aquinas, which he taught at the university of his native place. After his death some of his lectures were published, under the title Theologia Scholastica et Moralis, etc. (Bamberg, 1671), preceded by a biographical sketch written by Sanchez d'Avila, bishop of Piacenza. See Hurter, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cornellians was a name given to the ancient orthodox Christians by the Novatian party, because they held communion with Cornelius, bishop of Rome, rather than with his antagonist. See NOVATIANS.

Cornelison, JOHN, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Nyack, N. Y., in 1769. He studied under H. Meyer and J. H. Livingston, and was licensed by the synod of the Reformed Dutch Church in 1791. His first work was as missionary to the northern and western states (1791-93). From 1793 to 1806 he was pastor at Bergen avenue, Jersey City, and at English Neighborhood, Bergen Co., N. J. In 1794 he visited the settlements on the Delaware and Susquehanna rivers (Hanover), and was at Bergen avenue again from 1806 to 1828, when he died. Mr. Cornelison had a noble zeal for the glory of God, and an anxiety for the souls of men. He took great interest in the colored people, many of whom were slaves, and opened a special service for them in his own house. He furnished them into classes, teaching them to read, and filling their minds with Gospel truth. See Cornwin, Manual of the Reformed Church in America, 3d ed. p. 222.

Cornelisz (or Cornelissen), JAKOB, a Dutch painter, was born at Oost Zanen, in Holland, about 1470. There is a picture by him, of The Circumcision, in the old church at Haarlem, painted in 1517, much praised; and a Descent from the Cross, at Alkmaar. He died at Amsterdam in 1570.

Cornelius, Saint. (1) The centurion, is commemorated as bishop of Caesarea, on Feb. 2 or Dec. 10; (2) pope, is commemorated as a martyr under Decius, on Sept. 14.

Cornelius is the name of several other early Christian notables:

1. The fourth patriarch of Antioch, A.D. 129-143.
2. Head of the monastery called Mochanseo (Jerome, Op. ii, 86, ed. Vall.).
3. A converted Manichean mentioned by Augustine (Epist. 259 [126]; ii, 1073).
4. A monk and bishop of Forum Corneli, in the 5th century, of noted virtue, the teacher of Chrysostomus (Migne, Patrol. Lat. liii, 31).

Cornelius (or Cornara), Flaminius, senator of Venice, where he was born in 1692, and died in 1778, is the author of, Monumenta Ecclesie Venetæ (1750, 15 vols.)—Creta Sacra (1755, 2 vols.)—Ecclesia Torcellana (1756, 3 vols.)—Chiese e Monasteri di Venezia e di Torcello (Padua, 1758). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 870; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cornelius, Samuel (1), D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Devonport, England, in 1794, and came to the United States with his parents when he was a child. Early in life he joined the Church, in Philadelphia, of which Rev. Dr. William Staughton was the pastor. His first settlement in the ministry was in Norfolk, Va., where he remained from 1817 to 1824, and then took charge of the Church in Alexandria, sustaining this relation thirteen years. He was next pastor of the Church in Mount Holly, N. J., eleven years, a part of this time acting as agent of the Colonization Society. For several years he preached in different places in Michigan, his last pastorate being at Ann Arbor. In all good causes in which his denomination was concerned, Dr. Cornelius took an abiding interest. He died in 1870. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 279. (J. C. S.)

Cornelius, Samuel (2), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Baltimore in 1827. He was at first a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but in 1867 connected himself with the Protestant Episcopal, officiating at first in Severn Parish, Md. In 1870 he was rector of St. Paul's Church, in Calvert County; in 1878 he removed to Baltimore. He died in October, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Cornelius, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Nov. 12, 1823, of devout Methodist parents. He experienced conversion in his eleventh year, and in 1845 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference. In 1848 an attack of hemorrhage of the throat obliged him to desist from all active service. He, however, recovered, and in 1850 did regular work, until his sudden death, Oct. 8, 1851. Mr. Cornelius was a young man of great promise, intelligent, dignified, and becoming, and highly exemplary in his daily life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 12.

Cornelius, William Huff, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Clark County, Ind., April 4, 1819. He removed with his parents in early life to Kentucky, where he was converted, joined the Church, and was licensed to preach in 1846. He was received on trial in the Indiana Conference in 1849, and subsequently served the following charges: Fredericksburg, Hellowville, Leesville, Springville, Bloomfield, Sullivan, Mount Vernon, Cannellton, Corydon, Paoli, Ellettsville, Putnamville, Gasport, Linton, Harrodsburg, Graysville, Bruceville, and Hymers. He was superannuated in 1880, and removed to his farm near Linton, where he died, July 31, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 308.

Cornell, Frederick Frelinghuysen, D.D., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, son of Rev. John Cornell, was born at Allentown, N. J., Nov. 16, 1804. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1825, and was licensed by the presbytery of Newtown, L. I., in 1829. He was professor of languages in the College of Mississippi, Natchez, in 1828; missionary at Stuyvesant, N. Y., three months in 1829; at Columbiaville, in 1830; Marshallsville, N. J., 1831, 1832; Montville, 1833-35; New York city, Manhattan Church, 1836-56; Pluckemin (Presbyterian), N. J., 1857-64. He was thereafter without a charge till his death, Aug. 7, 1875. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 222.

Cornell, John, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Northampton, Pa., in 1774. He pursued his classical studies at the Log College, Pa., completing them with Dr. Wilson, in New York city; prosecuted his theological studies under Dr. J. H. Livingston, and was licensed by the classis of New York in 1798. He became pastor of the Presbyterian churches of Allentown and Nottingham, Pa., in 1800, and served them for twenty years. His health becoming impaired, he removed to Somerville, N. J., where he acted as principal of the academy from 1821 to 1828. He removed, in the latter year, to Millstone, and died there in 1835. As an instructor, he was noted for great thoroughness and ability. As a preacher, he was clear, discriminating, and marked by sound judgment; his sermons were instructive, methodical, and impressive. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 223.

Cornell, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born at Swansea, Mass., Feb. 11, 1747. He began preaching in 1780, was pastor at Manchester, and at Galway, N. Y.; travelled under the Massachusetts Missionary Society in New York and Upper Canada, and died July 26, 1826. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 269.

Cornell, William, D.D., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Seneca County, N. Y., in 1834. He graduated from Rutgers College in 1859, and from the New Brunswick Seminary in 1862; was licensed by the classis of Geneva the same year, and became pastor at Minisink, Sussex Co., N. J.; teacher at Freehold, in 1863; pastor at Woodstown Presbyterian Church, in 1864; teacher at Somerville, in 1868, and died there Sept. 11, 1876. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 224.

Cornell, William Augustus, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated from Rutgers College in 1841, from the New Brunswick Seminary in 1844; and was licensed by the classis of New Brunswick the same year. He served the Church at Athena, Greene Co., N. Y., until 1848; Blooming Grove, Rensselaer Co., until 1852, and died in August, 1876. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 224.

Corneo, GIAMBATTISTA, an Italian theologian, was born at Milan in 1607. He was apostolic prothonotary and archivist to the archbishop of Milan, and died in 1690, leaving, De Sancto Blasio Sebastæ, in Armenia (Milan, 1645):—De Sancto Manricillo (ibid. 1646):—Il Sacro Chindlo (ibid. 1647):—Vita del B. Gio. Angelo Parro (ibid. 1649):—Origine dell' Instituzione dell' Orazione delle XL Ore (ibid. eod.). Corneo also left thirty-two volumes of MS. upon other ecclesiastical matters. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corner-stone is the first stone of a church, properly laid on the north-east side, as determined by the orientation of the sun on the day of the feast, or patron saint. At Beaulieu only one stone was found on the ground, and it was in this position; that of Avranches, the solitary relic of a cathedral, is still pointed out. In modern churches the most prominent or convenient corner is selected, and the corner-stone is a square block of suitable size, laid at the angle of the topmost course of the foundation. It is customary to hollow it out in a box-like manner, and to deposit within it memorial papers, etc.

Cornet, NICOLAS, a French theologian, was born at Amiens in 1592. He was educated in his native city at a Jesuit school, made doctor of theology at Paris in 1626, and afterwards became grand-master of the College of Navarre, and syndic of the faculty of theology. He refused to be the confessor of Richelieu, but corrected the Méthodes de Controverse of that minister, and, it is said, composed the preface. He denounced to the faculty of theology seven propositions, five of which were afterwards condemned at Rome as extracts from the Augustinus of Jansenius. This orthodox zeal exposed Cornet to the attacks of the writers of Port Royal. He died at Paris, April 12, 1663. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Corney, GEORGE, an English Congregational minister, was born at Keymer, Sussex, in 1794. He was converted when about eleven years old, educated for the ministry at Hackney, became pastor first at Cratfield and Newmarket, and eventually at Barking, where he labored twenty-four years, and died April 28, 1862. Mr. Corney was an earnest and conscientious preacher. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 218.

Cornford, SAMUEL, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1792. He united originally with the Church in Maidstone, for several years was pastor of the Independent Church at Marden, but returned to Maidstone, where he was for a time pastor of the Third Baptist Church, and then of the Fourth Baptist Church. He died Dec. 24, 1837. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1838, p. 25. (J. C. S.)

Cornforth, COLUMBUS, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1833. He was converted at the age of eighteen, received his collegiate education at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., and his theological at the Rochester Seminary. He was ordained at Smithport, Pa. During the late civil war he was, for a time, a member of the 42d Pennsylvania Regular Volunteers, and was severely wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Fredericksburg. Subsequently he served as chaplain of the 150th Pennsylvania Volunteers till the close of the war, and then became inspector and examiner of the Soldiers' Orphan School of Pennsylvania. In 1879 he removed to Kansas, and died at Clyde, in that state, Feb. 10, 1883. See The Chicago Standard, March 1, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Cornforth, DAVID, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Brompton, Yorkshire, Oct. 30, 1786. He was converted at the age of sixteen, entered the ministry in 1814, and died Oct. 3, 1855. He used to preach in barns, private houses, and in the open air. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Cornice. We add the following particulars from Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v.:

"In Classic architecture each of the orders has its peculiar cornice.

"In the Norman style of architecture, a plain face of parapet, slightly projecting from the wall, is frequently used as a cornice, and a row of blocks is often placed under it, sometimes plain, sometimes moulded or carved into heads and other ornaments, when it is called a corbel-table.

table. These blocks very commonly have a range of small arches over them. A small plain string is also sometimes used as a cornice.

"In the Early English style, the corbel-table continued in use as a cornice, but it is generally more ornamented than in the Norman, and the arches are commonly trefoiled, and well moulded; the blocks, also, are more delicately carved, either with a head or some other ornament characteristic of the style, and if there are no arches above them they often support a suite of horizontal mouldings; sometimes there is a range of horizontal mouldings above the arches of the corbel-table, and sometimes the cornice consists of mouldings only, without any corbel-table. The hollow mouldings of the cornice are generally plain, seldom containing flowers or carvings, except the toothed ornament.

"In the Decorated style, the cornice is usually very regular; and though in some large buildings it has several mouldings, it principally consists of a slope above, and a deep-sunk hollow, with an astragal under it; in these hollows flowers at regular distances are often placed, and in some large buildings, and in towers, etc., there are frequently heads, and the cornice almost filled with them; other varieties of cornice may also be occasionally met with in this style.

"In the Perpendicular style, the cornice is often composed of several small mouldings, sometimes divided by one or two considerable hollows, not very deep; in plain buildings the cornice-mouldings of the preceding style are much adhered to; but it is more often ornamented in the hollow with flowers, etc., and sometimes with figures and grotesque animals. In the latter end of this style, something very analogous to an ornamented frieze is perceived, of which the canopies to the niches in various works are examples: and the angels so profusely introduced in the late rich work are a sort of cornice ornament."

Cornides, DANIEL VON, a Hungarian historian, was born in 1782 at Szent-Miklos, in the Liptau province. He studied philosophy and theology at Erlangen, and was appointed teacher at the Reformed College in Klausenburg. He accompanied count Teleki on his travels through Italy, Germany, and France, and the count's son to Göttingen. In 1784 he was appointed librarian at the Pesth University, and died Oct. 4, 1787, leaving, Regum Hungariorum, qui Saeculo XI. Regnaverunt, Genealogia (Pesth, 1778):—Bibliotheca Hungarica (Pesth, 1791):—Commentatio de Religione Veterum Hungarorum (Vienna, 1791). (B. P.)

Corning, WILLIAM H., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1822. He was educated in his native place, at Trinity College, was licensed by the Hartford Congregational Association in 1846, and made pastor of the Congregational Church at Clinton, Mass. In 1858 he took charge of the Presbyterian Church at Whitehall, N. Y., where he remained until his death, Oct. 8, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Almanac, 1863, p. 291.

Cornish, Andrew H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, and rector of St. Paul's Church, Pendleton, S.C., for about a quarter of a century. He died May 24, 1875, aged sixty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Cornish, George, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Redruth, Cornwall, Dec. 24, 1801. He was a coppersmith by trade. As a minister, he did not exercise his gifts beyond his own society. He died Jan. 29, 1877. See Annual Monitor, 1878, p. 48.

Cornish, John, an English Presbyterian minister, was born in 1687; was chosen assistant to Joshua Bayes, at the Leather Lane meeting, early in the century, and continued to minister there with acceptance and success till his death, Nov. 28, 1727. He was pious, serious, wise, prudent, and useful. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 399.

Cornish, John Cory, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Bridgerule, Devon, in 1819. He was converted in his youth, during a revival among the Bible Christians; became a class-leader and a local preacher, and entered the ministry in 1839. He died at Bridgerule, March 17, 1845. His zeal for God knew no limit except that of his strength.

Cornish, John Hamilton, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1815; ordained in 1842; and from 1843 to 1868 was rector of St. Thaddeus's Church, Aiken, S. C. In 1870, though still residing in Aiken, he performed missionary service at Kaolin, and continued to do so until 1875, when he was employed as a missionary at Barnwell and John's Island, in the same state. From 1875 he preached at Barnwell, Toogoodoo, and Pinewood until his death, which occurred in Charleston, May 24, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Cornish, Joseph D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., March 26, 1764. He was converted in 1817, and moved, in 1826, into Chautauqua County, where, in 1827, he was baptized, and united with the Free-will Baptists. In 1830 he commenced preaching, and was ordained in 1836. He died at Sherman, Chautauqua Co., Nov. 17, 1854. He was a good minister, and universally beloved. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1856, p. 9. (J. C. S.)

Cornish, Samuel B., a colored Presbyterian minister, was born in New York in 1798. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 31, 1819, and in 1823 was called to the First African Church of Philadelphia, where he preached for some years. From 1845 to 1847 he served as a missionary to the colored people of New York city, and during this time organized Emmanuel Church. In 1855 he joined the Nassau Presbytery of Brooklyn, L. I., where he labored till his death, in 1858. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 69.

Cornon, JEAN, a French martyr, was a husbandman of Mascon, and unlettered, but one to whom God gave such wisdom that his judges were amazed, when he was condemned by their sentence to be burned for listening to the reading of the Scripture, in 1585. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 397.

CORNU EPISTOLÆ is the epistle horn of a Christian altar, i. e. the right-hand corner; so reckoned when the looker faces the western side or front of the altar.

CORNU EVANGELII is the gospel horn of a Christian altar, i. e. the left-hand corner, the looker facing the western side or front of the altar.

Cornutus, a presbyter of Iconium, who boldly confessed himself a Christian, and was beheaded Sept. 12 (his festival day), apparently under Decius.

Cornwall, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, son of Robert, minister at Linlithgow, was licensed to preach in 1622; ordained minister at Muiravonside in 1627, and presented to the living there in 1633. He was in necessitous circumstances in 1639; suspended in 1640 for using insulting language; and resigned in 1641. He had pecuniary aid from the Kirk-Session in 1646 and 1649; became a schoolmaster and precentor in 1650; in 1652 was charged with marrying and baptizing irregularly, for which he was excommunicated. He was living in poor circumstances in 1659. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 194.

Cornwall, John, a Scotch clergyman, was presented by the king to the living at Linlithgow in 1626, and died in April, 1646. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 159.

Cornwall, Nathaniel Ellsworth, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Granby, Conn., Feb. 6, 1812. He graduated from Trinity College, Hartford, in 1831, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1834. From that year to 1853 he was rector of Trinity Church, in Southport; until 1855 of St. Andrew's Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.; in 1859 of Christ Church, Pelham, N. Y., where he remained until 1862, when he removed to New York city, as rector of the Free Church of St. Matthias. He died there, Aug. 28, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Cornwall, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1583; was appointed to the living at Ecclesmachan in 1588; transferred to the second charge at Linlithgow in 1597; presented to the living in 1599; transferred to the first charge in the same place in 1608, and died June 5, 1626, aged about sixty-three years. He was a member of the assembly in 1590, 1602, and 1608; and was nominated constant moderator of the presbytery in 1606. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 159, 162, 184.

Cornwall, William, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was converted at an early age, under the ministry of Gideon Ouseley. Being a good Celtic scholar, he was appointed a missionary to the Irish, chiefly in his own province of Connaught. After undergoing numerous privations and hardships, which induced premature decline, he became a supernumerary in 1848, and died May 11, 1860. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Cornwallis, Frederick, an English prelate, son of the first Lord Cornwallis, was appointed canon of Windsor, May 21, 1746; installed a prebendary of Lincoln, April 11, 1747; consecrated bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, Feb. 19, 1750, and appointed prebendary of London, Nov. 8, 1760, and dean of London, Nov. 14, 1766. He was enthroned archbishop of Canterbury, Oct. 6, 1768, and died March 19, 1788. He published several Sermons. See Le Neve, Fasti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cornwallis, James, an English prelate, was born in 1743. He received the early part of his education at Eton, whence he removed to Merton College, of which he became a fellow. He was appointed chaplain to the marquis of Townshend, when that nobleman was lieutenant of Ireland, and on his return therefrom was made a prebendary of Westminster in 1770, and presented to the valuable rectories of Wrotham, in Kent, and of Newington, in Oxfordshire. In 1775 he was installed dean of Canterbury, and in 1781 consecrated bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. In 1791 he succeeded to the deanery of Windsor and Wolverhampton, which, in 1794, he exchanged for that of Durham. On the death of his nephew, marquis Cornwallis, without male issue, Aug. 16, 1823, the dignities of earl Cornwallis and viscount Brome devolved upon him. He died in 1824. He published Sermons (1777, 1782, 1811). See The (Lond.) Annual Register, 1824, ii, 205; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cornwell, Francis, an English Baptist minister, lived in the time of Charles I. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; was an object of persecution at the hands of archbishop Laud, because he objected to the surplice, kneeling at the Lord's Supper, and making the sign of the cross in baptism. He became an avowed Baptist about 1644, and published, not long after, a work in defence of his principles, entitled, The Vindication of the Royal Commission of King Jesus, which "created much excitement and some wrath." He gathered a company of Christians whose faith was in harmony with his own, and became their pastor. Neal speaks of him as "one of the most learned divines that espoused the cause of the Baptists." See Catholic Baptist Encyclop. p. 280. (J. C. S.)

Cornwell, Waite, a Presbyterian minister, went to Yale College from Middletown, and graduated in 1782. He preached occasionally, but never had charge of a parish. He moved, late in life, to some part of the state of Ohio, where he died in March, 1816. See Old Redstone.

Cornwell, W. E., a German Reformed minister, was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 8, 1807. In early life he was a Presbyterian. In 1836 he became a licensed minister in the German Reformed Church, and took charge of a congregation in Montgomery County, Pa. Later, he was pastor at Böhms (in Whitpain), Pleasantville, and Whitemarsh. In 1850 he left the German Church and was immersed by Rev. Mr. Smith. From 1853 to 1857 he was pastor of the Baptist churches at Norristown, Pa., and Bridgeton, N. J., and later at Princeton. He died March 29, 1858. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iii, 488.

Cornyn, John Kinkrad, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Carlisle, Pa., Aug. 16, 1815. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1842, and was a student in the Western Theological Institute for three years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Allegheny, April 3, 1845, and for two years supplied various churches in his presbytery. In 1847 he entered the Presbytery of Erie, where he preached to the congregations of Sturgeonville, Girard, and Harbor Creek. From 1850 he preached in several places, especially at Troy, Pa., but failing health soon obliged him to retire from the active duties of the ministry. He died Dec. 22, 1853. During his period of ill-health he published a work called Dick Wilson, or, the Rum-seller's Victim. See Hist. of the Presbytery of Erie.

Corōna, a martyr in Syria, with Victor (q. v.), under Antoninus, is commemorated May 14.

Corōna Clericālis is a name given to the tonsure (q. v.) of the clergy in the ancient Church.

CORONA LUCIS (crown of light). Crowns of candles or tapers, or, as they were often called, phari, in distinction from cankari, or oil-lamps, were at an early date suspended in the choir; they were circles, covered with tapers or lamps, hung by chains or ropes from the vault. We extract the following account of them from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. & v.:

"At Tours a standing lamp, with three tapers, is a lingering relic of the custom in France, where glass lanterns are now common, but the hanging crown has been revived in England. At Aix-la-Chapelle there is an octagonal crown of the latter part of the 12th century, which was the gift of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa; it is made of bronze gilt, and enamelled, and supports small circular and square towers, which serve as lanterns, sixteen in number; between them are courses of tapers tripled, making in all forty-eight lights. It appears to descend from the dome, as from the vault of heaven, over the tomb of Charlemagne. Another crown of great beauty, the gift of bishop Otto, brother of William of Normandy, adorned the choir of Bayeux, until his destruction in 1562. The earliest on record is that given by pope Leo, which was made of silver, and had twelve towers and thirty-six lamps. Another, of cruciform shape, given by pope Adrian, was hung before the presbytery of St. Peter's at Rome, and lighted with one thousand three hundred and seventy candles. Constantine gave a pharus of gold to burn before St. Peter's tomb; and Leo III added a lustre of porphyry, hung by chains of gold, to burn before the confession of the apostles. Sixtus III gave a silver pharus to St. Mary Major; Hilary presented ten to St. John Lateran; and Walafrid Strabo mentions one hanging by a cord before the altar at St. Gall. At Durham, in the 12th century, we read that in honor of St. Cuthbert lights were arranged like a crown round the altar, on the candelabrum, and lighted on greater festivals. This is the earliest instance in England. Crowns had little bells, called clamacteria, pendent from them. The corona, the luminous crown or circlet of lights, whether a single hoop or a tier of many, is the most beautiful of all modes of lighting—hanging and flashing like a cloud of fire before the sanctuary in some grand cathedrals, such as those suspended in the midst of the choir of St. Remi at Rheims, Clugny, Toul, and Bayeux, and representing the heavenly Jerusalem, with its gates and towers and angelic warders. The crown of Hildesheim, of the 18th century, is of large dimensions, and is enriched with statues; thirty-six oil-lamps burn upon the double gateway towers; seventy-two wax tapers, arranged in threes, blaze on the intermediate battlements. When these hundred and eight lights, like diamonds of living fire, are seen from a distance, they fuse into a disk-like glory, or a sun. In the Greek churches of the present day there is often a wooden cross, hung with ostrich eggs, suspended from the dome, which, almost in mockery of ancient splendor, is furnished with lights upon festivals. Formerly hanging phari burned before the altar: a lustre of seven branches in the centre of the church, and twelve lights on the sides of the chancel-screen. The lights arranged along the rood-beam were only another form of the crown, in a right line instead of a curve. Three or seven lights typified the divine graces, and twelve the Gloriosa Company of the Apostles. At the Temple Church (Bristol) there is a beautiful crown, with twelve branches; on the top is the Blessed Mother and the Holy Child, and under them are St. Michael and the dragon. A luminous cross of copper, with intersecting arms, and oil-lamps hanging by chains, of the 13th century, is suspended under the dome of St. Mark's (Venice), and is lighted on great festivals. A perpendicular crown, formerly at Valle Crucis Abbey, and now at Llanarmon, has a figure of the Blessed Virgin, canopied, and four tiers of branches for lights."

CORONA NUPTIALIS is the nuptial crown, i. e., the wreath or ornament placed on the head of the bride in the Western, as well as on the head of the bridegroom in the Eastern Church, at the time of marriage.

CORONA VOTIVA. In the early ages of Christianity it was by no means unusual for sovereigns and other royal personages to dedicate their crowns to the use of the Church. The gifts thus devoted were known as Dona, and were suspended by chains attached to their upper rim, above an altar or shrine, or in some conspicuous part of the church. Other chains were attached to the lower rim, supporting a lamp, from which usually depended a jewelled cross. The crowned cross thus suspended above the altar was felt to be an appropriate symbol of the triumphs of Christianity, and its use became almost universal.

The custom for sovereigns to dedicate their actual crowns to the Church's use led to the construction of imitative crowns, formed for votive purposes alone. Of this usage we find repeated notices in ancient chronicles and documents. They are usually described as having been suspended over the altar, and very frequently mention is made of jewelled crosses appended to them.

The convenience of the form of these donative crowns for the suspension of lamps doubtless gave rise to the custom of constructing large chandeliers after the same model. In these pensile luminaries the shape and character of the royal circle were preserved, but frequently in much larger proportions.

The name pharus, though sometimes used for a corona, was more properly a standing candelabrum supporting lamps or candles, which, from their number of spreading branches, were sometimes called arbores, trees.

Corona, Leonardo da Murano, an Italian painter, was born at Murano in 1561, and gained much by the study of the works of Titian and Tintoretto. In the Church of San Fantino is his master-piece, representing The Crucifixion. He died at Venice in 1605. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Corona, Matthias, a Dutch theologian of the order of Carmelites, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, wrote, Potestas Infallibilis Petri et Successorum Romanorum Pontificum (Liege, 1668):—De Dignitate et Potestate Spirituali Episcoporum (ibid. 1671). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corona, Tobias, an Italian theologian, originator of the "Milanese" monks, entered into orders in 1583, was confessor of cardinal Justiniani, and general of the community to which he belonged. He was sent to France and to Savoy by pope Gregory XV, and died at Naples in 1627, leaving I Sugri Tempi, etc. (Rome, 1625). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coronach was a lamentation at funerals, formerly universal throughout Scotland and Ireland, and still very common in parts of those countries. Combined cries of lamentation were intermingled with expostulations and reproaches bestowed upon the deceased for leaving the world, and the wailing was continued by a train of females which followed the corpse to the burial. The ὀλολυγή of the Greeks and ululatus of the Latins designated similar practices among the classical nations; and the resemblance of these words to the common Celtic cries on funeral occasions, uloghone and hullulu, indicates an etymological affinity. See MOURN.

Coronati Dies. See FESTIVAL.

Coronati Quatuor, LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF, is the title given to four martyrs, Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, who suffered martyrdom at Rome in the reign of Diocletian. The tradition respecting them is to the effect that they refused to sacrifice to idols, and were then, at the command of the emperor, beaten to death before the statue of Æsculapius, with scourges loaded with lead. The bodies having lain where they died for five days, were then deposited by pious Christians in a sandpit on the Via Lavicana, three miles from the city, near the bodies of five who had suffered martyrdom on the same day two years before, Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphonianus, Castorius, and Simplicius. See, e. g. the Martyrology of Ado, Nov. 8 (Migne, Patrol. cxxiii, 392), who gives the legend more fully than others.

It is stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (ibid. cxxviii, 699), that pope Honorius I (died A.D. 638) built a church in Rome in their honor. To this church the remains of the martyrs were subsequently transferred by pope Leo IV (died A.D. 855), who had been its officiating priest, and who, finding it in a very ruinous condition on his ascension to the pontificate, restored it with much splendor, and bestowed upon it many gifts. This church was situated on the ridge of the Cœlian Hill, between the Coliseum and the Lateran; and on its site the present church of the Santi Quattro Inconcrati was built by pope Pascal II.

As to the appointment of the festival of these martyrs on Nov. 8, which is said to be due to pope Melchiodes (died A.D. 314), a curious difficulty has arisen. Thus, in the notice of the festival in the editions of the Gregorian Sacramentary (for the words would appear to be wanting in MS. authority), the remark is made that, it being found impossible to ascertain the natal day of the four martyrs, it was appointed that in their church the natal day of the five other saints, near to whose bodies they had been buried, should be celebrated, that both might have their memory recorded together (Patrol. lxxviii, 147).

Coronation of kings and emperors, the most august ceremony of Christian national life, affords a striking example of the manner in which Christianity breathed a new spirit into already existing ceremonies, and elevated them to a higher and purer atmosphere. Under her inspiration a new life animated the old form: heathen accessories gradually dropped off; fresh and appropriate observances were developed; and the whole ceremonial assumed a character in harmony with the changed faith of those who were its subjects. It has been remarked by Dean Stanley (Memorials of Westminster Abbey, p. 42) that the rite of coronation, at least in early Christian times, represents two opposite aspects of European monarchy. It was (1) a symbol of the ancient usage of the choice of the leaders by popular election, and of the emperor by the Imperial Guard, derived from the practice of the Gallic and Early Christian Diadem.

Teutonic nations; and (2) a solemn consecration of the new sovereign to his office by unction with holy oil, and the placing of a crown or diadem on his head by one of the chief ministers of religion, after the example of the ancient Jewish

Church. In modern times, the custom has been kept up of calling upon a high ecclesiastical functionary to take a prominent part in this act of public inauguration of a sovereign, in all the countries of Europe where monarchy prevails. See CROWN.

CORONATION OF THE VIRGIN is a ceremony performed annually at Rome, in which the pope takes a conspicuous part. An image of the Virgin Mary is arrayed in velvet or satin, adorned with silver and gold, and trimmed with the most costly lace. It is gorgeously decked with necklaces and earrings, and bracelets of precious stones. At the appointed time this figure is placed on an altar, in a church hung round with tapestry and brilliantly lighted. In the presence of immense crowds a service is performed, after which the priests approach the image and crown it. In the course of these ceremonies the priests burn incense before the figure, bow down before it, and mutter prayers to the Virgin. In many respects these ceremonies resemble those followed by the ancient Romans in crowning the statues of their heathen gods. See Seymour, Pilgrimage to Rome.

Coronel, Gregor Nuñez, a Portuguese priest who lived in the 16th century, was preacher to the duke of Savoy. Clement VIII, whose confessor he was, appointed him first secretary and consulor of the Comgregatio de Auxiliis. His treatise against Molina is preserved in MS. in the Anglican. He died at Rome in 1620, leaving, De Vera Christi Ecclesia (Rome, 1594); —De Optimo Republicæ Statu (ibid. 1597); —Apologeticum de Traditionibus Apostolicis (ibid. eod.). See Ossinger, Bibl. Aug. p. 636; Lanteri, Sac. Ser. ii, 280; Schmalhus, Hist. Relig. et Eccles. Christ. v, 244 (giving the substance of Coronel's treatise against Molina); Keller, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coronel, Paolo, a Spanish convert from Judaism, was born at Segovia in 1480. After his baptism, in 1492, he studied theology, and was appointed professor at the University of Salamanca, where he died, Sept. 30, 1534. He was a celebrated Talmudist, and deeply versed in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and the Oriental languages. He contributed to the famous Complutensium Polyglot. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 189; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 965; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews in Spain, p. 358. (B. P.)

Coronet. This ornament first appears in the effigy of John of Eltham, who died in 1332. The addition of a marquis's coronet to an archiepiscopal mitre does not date back before the time of Sheldon. Edmundson speaks of it as a novelty. It has since then been drawn as a ducal coronet. The bishops of Durham, who took their title by the grace of God or by divine providence (in distinction from other bishops, who are styled, by divine permission), while still palatine, until 1833, used the coronet by right, or in lieu of it a plume of feathers.

Coronidian Maidens, in Greek mythology, were Metioche and Menippe, the daughters of Orion, both endowed by Minerva with wisdom and rare beauty. When their father had been killed by Diana, a pestilence broke out. The oracle, on being consulted, declared that, in order to atone to the subterranean deities, two maidens must be sacrificed. Then Metioche and Menippe offered themselves as victims, but Pluto changed them into two comets. A temple of the Coronidian Maidens was built by the Æolians.

Corophites is the same as Agonistici (q. v.).

Corporal is a word used in the Sacramentaries by Gregory the Great, Isidore of Seville, and in the capitulars of the Frankish kings in 800, meaning a fine linen, or canvas, cloth of pure white, according to the Council of Rheims, on which the sacred elements are consecrated, and hence called the corporal, in allusion to the body of Christ, of which bread is the sacrament. Isidore of Pelusium called it the eileton, the wrapping-cloth; and Isidore of Damascus speaks of it as the winding-sheet. The centre, on which the chalice and paten stood, were quite plain, the ends alone being of silk, or worked with gold or silver. It was ordered to be used by pope Sixtus I in 125, and Sylvester I, cir. 314, directed it to be of linen and not of stuff, as before. It was also known as the pull-veil, or sindon, and represented the fine linen in which Joseph of Arimathea wrapped the Lord's body in the garden tomb. The altar, by canon law, had two palls, and one corporal of plain linen cloth. The removal of the cloth from the consecrated elements typified the manifestation of the mysteries of the Old Test. by the death of Jesus. The earliest corporals covered the entire altar, and hung down at each side; two deacons were required to spread them. See ALTAR-CLOTH; ANTIMENSION.

Corporal Acts of MERCY is an ecclesiastical phrase for (1) feeding the hungry; (2) giving drink to the thirsty; (3) clothing the naked; (4) harboring the stranger; (5) visiting the sick; (6) ministering to prisoners; (7) burying the dead (Matt. xxv, 35; Tobit i, 17).

Corporal Punishment subsisted during the first five centuries of the Christian æra under its most usual forms, as a social degradation, but the liability to it was afterwards greatly extended.

I. Civil.—The equality before the law which might have been reached through the extension of Roman citizenship had been by no means attained, but the character of that prerogative itself had become debased, and the exemption from corporal punishment, which still fluttered, like a last rag of the toga, on the shoulders of the civic officers, had already been blown off for some. There were decurions who had been flogged, and decurions who could be flogged. Exemption was, indeed, growing to be a privilege attached to the mere possession of wealth. Thus delation, if proved false, or where the delator did not persevere, should he be of mean fortune, which he did not care to lose, was to be punished with the sharpest flogging.

Among the offences which entailed corporal punishment, besides the one already mentioned, may be named false witness. The use of it multiplied, indeed, as the character of the people became lowered, and the Novels are comparatively full of it. The eighth enacts flogging and torture against the taking of money by judges; the one hundred and twenty-third punishes with "bodily torments" those persons, especially stage-players and harlots, who should assume the monastic dress or imitate or make a mock of Church usages; the one hundred and thirty-fourth enacts corporal punishment against those who detained debtors' children as responsible for their father's debt, or who abetted illegal divorces, and requires the adulterous wife to be scourged to the quick. On the other hand, a husband chastising his wife, otherwise than for conduct for which he might lawfully divorce her, was by the one hundred and seventeenth Novel made liable to pay to her, during coverture, the amount of one third of the ante-nuptial gift. The last chapter of the one hundred and thirty-fourth Novel, indeed, professes to inculcate moderation in punishment, and enacts that from henceforth there shall be no other penal mutilation than the cutting off of one hand, and that thieves shall only be flogged. Already, under Constantine, it had been enacted (A.D. 315) that branding should not be in the face, as disfiguring "the heavenly beauty," a law in which the influence of Christian feeling upon the first Christian emperor is strikingly displayed.

Passing from the legislation of the East to that of the West, we find on the whole a very similar course of things. Among the ancient Germans, according to the account of Tacitus, corporal punishment was rare. He notes as a singularity that, in war, none but the priest was allowed to punish, bind, or even strike a soldier. A husband might, indeed, flog his adulterous wife naked through the streets; but otherwise even slaves were rarely beaten.

Among the Anglo-Saxons corporal punishment seems in general to have been confined to slaves, as an alternative for compensation, wherewith the slave "redeemed" or "paid the price of his skin," as it is expressed; e.g. for sacrificing to devils (A.D. 691-725), for working on Sundays (A.D. 688-728). In certain cases of theft the accuser himself was allowed to flog the culprit. A foreigner or stranger wandering out of the way through the woods, who neither shouted nor blew the horn, was to be deemed a thief, and to be flogged or redeem himself.

Capital punishment is again prominent in the Capitularies. The first Capitulary of Carloman (A.D. 742), imposes two years' imprisonment on a fornicating priest, after he has been scourged to the quick. The Capitulary of Metz, 755, following a synod held at the same place, enacts that for incest a slave or freedman shall be beaten with many stripes, as also any "minor" cleric guilty of the like offence. The same enactment, confined to the case of marrying a cousin, and in slightly different language, occurs elsewhere in the general collection. A savage law on conspiracies (A.D. 805) is added to the Salic law, enacting that where conspiracies have been made with an oath—the principal suffering death—the accessories are to flog each other and cut each other's noses off; even if no mischief shall have been done, to shave and flog each other. For conspiracies without an oath, the slave only was to be flogged, the freeman clearing himself by oath or compounding. The same law occurs in the General Capitularies. Another law enacts public flagellation and decalvation for the slave marrying within the seventh degree of consanguinity, and there is also embodied much of the rigorous Visigothic Code as towards the Jews, who are to be decalvated and receive one hundred lashes publicly if they marry within the prohibited degrees. The Visigothic provision against marrying without priestly benedictions, or exceeding in any wise the laws as to dowry, is by this extended to Jews as well as Christians.

II. Ecclesiastical.—Here, indeed, we find at first a much higher standard than that of the civil law. Among the persons whose offerings the Apostolic Constitutions require to be rejected are such as "use their slaves wickedly, with stripes or hunger, or hard service." Soon, however, a harsher law must have prevailed. The Council of Elvira (A.D. 305), enacted that if a mistress, inflamed by jealousy, should so flog her handmaid that she should die within three days, she is only to be admitted to communion after seven years' penance (unless in case of dangerous illness), if the act were done wilfully, or after fine, if death were not intended—a provision which speaks volumes indeed of the bitterness of Spanish slavery at this period, but which nevertheless shows the Church taking cognizance of the slave-owner's excesses, and endeavoring to moderate them by its discipline, at least in the case of women. On the other hand, the right of personal chastisement was often arrogated by the clergy themselves, since the Apostolic Canons enact that a bishop, priest, or deacon, striking the faithful who have sinned, or the unfaithful who have done wrong, seeking thereby to make himself feared, is to be deposed, and Augustine clearly testifies to the fact of corporal punishment being judicially inflicted by bishops, in a letter to the præfect Marcellus, in which, while exhorting him not to be too severe in punishing the Donatists, he praises him at the same time for having drawn out the confession of crimes so great by whipping with rods, inasmuch as this "mode of coercion is wont to be applied by the masters of liberal arts, by parents themselves, and often even by bishops in their judgments."

Corporal punishment seems, moreover, to have formed from an early period, if not from the first, a part of the monastic discipline. The rule of Pachomius, translated into Latin by Jerome, imposes the penalty of thirty-nine lashes, to be inflicted before the gates of the monastery (besides fasting), after three warnings, on a monk who persists in the "most evil custom" of talking, as well as for theft. Cassian (end of 4th or beginning of 5th century) places flogging on the same line with expulsion as a punishment for the graver offences against monastic discipline (some of which, indeed, may appear to us very slight), as "open reproaches, manifest acts of contempt, swelling words of contradiction, a free and unrestrained gait, familiarity with women, anger, fightings, rivalries, quarrels, the presumption to do some special work, the contagion of money-loving, the affecting and possessing of things superfluous, which other brethren have not, extraordinary and furtive reflections, and the like." In the rule of Benedict (A.D. 528) corporal punishment seems implied: "If a brother for any, the slightest, cause is corrected in any way by the abbot or any prior, or if he lightly feel that the mind of any prior is wroth or moved against him, however moderately, without delay let him lie prostrate on the earth at his feet, doing satisfaction until that emotion be healed. But if any scorn to do this, let him be either subjected to corporal punishment, or, if contumacious, expelled from the monastery." Here, it will be seen, corporal punishment is viewed as a lighter penalty than expulsion.

In the letters of Gregory the Great, 590-603, the right of inflicting, or at least ordering, personal chastisement is evidently assumed to belong to the clergy. In a letter to Pantaleo the Notary, on the subject of a deacon's daughter who had been seduced by a bishop's nephew, he required either that the offender should marry her, executing the due nuptial instruments, or be "corporally chastised" and put in penance in a monastery, and the pope renews this injunction in a letter to the uncle, bishop Felix, himself. Bishop Andreas of Tarentum, who had had a woman on the roll of the Church cruelly whipped with rods, against the order of the priesthood, so that she died after eight months, was nevertheless only punished by this really great pope with two months' suspension from saying mass. Sometimes, indeed, corporal punishment was inflicted actually in the church, as we see in another letter of the same pope to the bishop of Constantinople, complaining that an Isaurian monk and priest had been thus beaten with rods, "a new and unheard-of mode of preaching." But the same Gregory deemed it fitting that slaves guilty of idolatry, or following sorcerers, should be chastised with stripes and tortures for their amendment. Elsewhere the flogging of penitent thieves seems to be implied.

Towards the end of the same century, the sixteenth

Council of Toledo (A.D. 693), enacted that one hundred lashes and shameful decalcatio should be the punishment of unnatural offences. With this and a few other exceptions, however, the enactments of the Church as to corporal punishment chiefly refers to clerics or monks. The Council of Vannes, in 465, had indeed already enacted that a cleric proved to have been drunk should either be kept thirty days out of communion, or subjected to corporal punishment. The first Council of Orleans, in 511, had enacted that if the relict of a priest or deacon were to marry again, she and her husband were, after "castigation," to be separated, or excommunicated if they persisted in living together. Towards the end of the 7th century, the Council of Autun (about 670) enacted that any monk who went against its decrees should either be beaten with rods, or suspended for three years from communion. In the next century, Gregory III (731-741), in his excerpt from the Fathers and the Canons, assigns stripes as the punishment for thefts of holy things. The Synod of Metz, 753, in a canon already quoted in part above as a capitulary, enacted that a slave or freedman without money, committing incest with a consecrated woman, a gossip, a cousin, was to be beaten with many stripes, and that clerics committing the like offence, if minor ones, were to be beaten or imprisoned.

Corporax Cups are vessels of precious metal, suspended by a chain under a canopy, and used for the reservation of the eucharist for the sick. They sometimes took the form of a tiara of crowns, in allusion to Rev. xix, 12, and were covered often by a thin veil of silk or muslin, called the "kerchief of cobweb lawn." At Durham it was of very fine lawn, embroidered with gold and red silk, and finished with four knobs and tassels. That used by St. Cuthbert formed the banner carried to victory at the Red Hills.

Corpus Christi (French, Fête Dieu), the Feast of the Body of Christ, kept on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday (or the octave of Pentecost), was instituted in 1264, by pope Urban IV, for a procession bearing the eucharist, with an office and prose composed by Aquinas; the office is also attributed to Robert, bishop of Liege, in 1249. Colleges at Oxford and Cambridge bear this dedication. It afterwards became the chief occasion on which the mysteries were acted by the clergy, and the miracle-plays by guilds. The mother churches began the procession on this day, and subordinate churches on or within the octave. It was an immemorial custom in Spain for the priests to carry the tabernacle upon these occasions raised upon their shoulders. In England, on Corpus Christi day, they carried the silver pyx under a canopy of silk and cloth-of-gold, borne by four men, preceded by a pageant—Ursula and her maidens, St. George with spear and dragon, the devil's house, St. Christopher bearing the Infant, St. Sebastian pierced with arrows, St. Catharine with sword and wheel, St. Barbara with the chalice and cakes, followed by banners, crosses, candlesticks, reliquaries, cups, and images, which the priests lifted on high, while before them went many sacring bells and musicians, St. John pointing to the Lamb, upon which two, clad as angels, cast sweet-smelling flowers. The highway was strewn with boughs, every wall and window was decorated with branches. In villages the husbandmen went among the cornfields with crosses and banners; and the priest, carrying the blessed bread in a bag round his neck, read the gospel at certain stations, as an amulet against the wind, rain, and foul blasts.

Corradi, Domenico (called Ghirlandajo), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1451, and was instructed in the school of Alessio Baldovinetti. Two of his best pictures are, The Resurrection, and The Calling of St. Peter and St. Andrew to the Apostleship. There are many of his works in the churches of Rome, Florence, Pisa, and Rimini. He died in 1495. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. a. v.

Corradi, Ridolfi (also called Ghirlandajo), an Italian painter, son of Domenico, was born at Florence in 1485. He studied under Fra Bartolommeo di S. Marco, and made such rapid advance that he was intrusted by Raphael to finish a picture, begun by him, of the Virgin and Infant, for one of the Sienese churches. Several of his first productions are in the churches at Florence, viz., Santi Girolamo and Jacopo. He died in 1560. See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. a. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Corradini, Pietro Marcellino, a learned Italian antiquary and prelate, was born at Sezza, June 2, 1658. He became an eminent lawyer, and was afterwards canon of St. John Lateran, and finally cardinal in 1712. He was employed in several diplomatic embassies, and died at Rome, Feb. 8, 1743. He wrote several works on ecclesiastical jurisprudence and history, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.

Corrado, Carlo, an Italian painter, was born at Naples in 1698, and studied under Solimena. He painted a number of altar-pieces for the churches at Rome, and also a large fresco painting in the ceiling of the Church of Buono Fratelli, which represented Christ Glorified, and Surrounded by his Saints. He died in Italy in 1768. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Corrado, Pirro (Lat. Pyrrhus Corradus), an Italian theologian, born in the diocese of Rossano, Calabria, lived in the 17th century. He was prothonotary apostolical, canon of the metropolitan church of Naples, and minister-general of the inquisition at Rome. He wrote, Praxis Beneficiaria (Naples, 1656):—Praxis Dispensationum Apostolicarum (Cologne, 1672, 1678, 1716; Venice, 1735). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Corrado, Quinto Mario, a learned Italian, was born at Oria, Otranto, in 1508. He studied at Bologna under Romulo Amaseo; entered holy orders, and opened a school in his native place. He spent some years at Rome as secretary of cardinals Alexander and Borgia. He afterwards taught belles-lettres at Naples and Salerno, and died in his native country in 1575, leaving several educational and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.

Corranus (or De Corro), ANTONIUS, an Italian Protestant divine, was born at Seville, Spain, in 1527, and educated for the Roman Church, but went to England in 1570, and was admitted to the Anglican Church. In 1571 he was made reader in the Temple, London, and afterwards at St. Mary's and Hart Hall, Oxford, and finally prebendary in St. Paul's. He died in London in March, 1591, leaving several Latin works on language and practical religion, including notes on Canticles and Ecclesiastes.

Corraro (Lat. Corrarius), ANTONIO, an Italian prelate, was born at Venice in 1359. He was one of the institutors of the society of St. George in Alga, and was appointed bishop of Ostia, and afterwards cardinal, by pope Gregory XII, his uncle. After having performed the functions of legate in France and Germany, he passed the last years of his life in a monastery. He died at Padua, Jan. 19, 1445, leaving some works on festivals and casuistry, which have perished.

Another Antonio Corraro, a Benedictine of Venice, who died the same year, had been bishop of Brescia and Ceneda. See Biog. Universelle, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Corraro, Gregorio, an Italian writer and ecclesiastic, was born at Venice in 1411; became prothonotary apostolic at Rome, and in 1464 patriarch of Venice. He died at Verona the same year, leaving several works of an ethical rather than strictly religious character, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Correa, Diego, a Spanish painter, flourished about 1550. At Piacenza, in the convent of San Vincente, are two pictures by him, representing subjects from the Life of the Virgin, and in the Madrid Museum are several pictures representing The Passion.

Correa, Manoel (1), a Portuguese Jesuit, was born in 1636 in St. Paul de Loanda, in the African colony of Angola. He went to Lisbon and entered the Jesuit order May 31, 1651; afterwards taught at the University of Evora, received the degree of doctor in 1685, and became rector of the University of Coimbra. Being called to Rome, he was there promoted to the dignity of provincial, appointed assistant of P. Tyro Gonzalez, and died in 1708, leaving Idea Complanaria (Rome, 1712). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Correa, Manoel (2), a Portuguese Jesuit, was born in 1712. He entered upon the life of a monk in 1729, went to Brazil, taught at Bahia and at Pernambuco, but was arrested in 1758, for an attack upon Joseph I, and sent to Rome, where he died in 1789. His life, written in Latin, contains interesting particulars upon the religious institution to which he belonged. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Correa, Pelagio (or Payo) Perez, surnamed the Portuguese Joshua, was born in the early part of the 13th century, according to some historians, at Evora, according to others, at Santarem. He entered the new order of St. James, and was soon regarded as one of the most formidable adversaries of the powerful Mussulmans in the Peninsula. In 1242 he was elected grand master of the order, and at this time the Spanish chroniclers give to his history a truly legendary character. In 1248 he aided in the conquest of Seville by Ferdinand III of Castile. When Alfonso III was securely fixed upon the throne of Portugal, he called to his aid Correa, for the purpose of pushing his conquests. Correa died in 1275. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Correggio. See ALLEGRI, ANTONIO.

Correspondences is the name applied to one of the principal doctrines which Swedenborg (q. v.) believed himself specially commissioned to promulgate. He taught that there are certain links of harmony and correspondence between the seen and the unseen worlds, so that every object ought to suggest to the mind of man its own appropriate divine truth. The fundamental idea of his system was that matter and spirit are associated together and connected by an eternal law, and all analogies were converted in his mind into predetermined correspondences. See Vaughan, Hours with the Mystics.

Corrie, DANIEL, a bishop of the Church of England, was born about 1777. Having been nominated a chaplain on the Bengal Establishment, he proceeded to India towards the close of 1806. His first station up the country was at Chunar, where he was soon able to speak to the natives in Hindostanee, of which he had acquired the rudiments on his voyage out. Benares had also the benefit of his visits and ministrations. By the assistance of friends he raised a small church at Secrole, soon after another at Benares, and in 1818 the beautiful church at Chunar, together with a small chapel at Buxar, to the poor invalids and native Christians of which place he extended his labors of love. In 1810 he was removed to Cawnpore to labor with his friend, Henry Martyn, and continued there about a year, until obliged, by illness, to proceed to Calcutta. At the close of 1812 he removed to Agra, and two years later returned to England for the benefit of his health, and while there was much engaged in preaching for the Church Missionary Society in behalf of India. On resuming his missionary labors at Benares he devoted much of his care to establishing schools for the native Hindûs and Mohammedans. In 1819 he became presidency chaplain, and in 1823 archdeacon of Calcutta; but this appointment did not prevent him from working for the native congregations, besides translating Sellon's Abridgment of Scripture, the Prayer-book, and many of the homilies, into Hindostanee. He likewise drew up Outlines of Ancient History, in English, for the benefit of the native youth. In 1834, after a sojourn of nearly twenty-eight years in India, archdeacon Corrie was called to England to be consecrated bishop of Madras. He returned at once to India, but died Feb. 5, 1837. Bishop Corrie was a man in whose character the Christian graces were beautifully developed. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, July, 1837, p. 442.

Corrington, Elijah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harrison County, Ky., Jan. 28, 1797. He embraced religion in 1827, was licensed to preach in 1828, removed to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1830, and in 1836 entered the Illinois Conference. With but one year's exception as a superannuate, he labored zealously and successfully until his second superannuation, in 1863. He died late in 1863 or in 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 191.

Corrington, James B., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kentucky, Oct. 24, 1801. He was converted in 1828, licensed to preach soon after, in 1830 went to Illinois, and in 1838 joined the Illinois Conference. He located in 1842, but in 1847 was readmitted into the same conference. In 1849 he was appointed presiding elder of the Sparta District, subsequently filling that position on different districts with great acceptability and usefulness. He was a model presiding elder, possessing great executive ability, and being peculiarly adapted to that work. In 1872 he became superannuated, and continued in that relation until his death, Nov. 15, 1880. Dr. Corrington was a delegate to each session of the General Conference from 1852 until 1868. He was a man of marked ability, eminently popular among the masses. His sermons were clear, eloquent, full of pathos and power. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 323.

Corrington, William H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of godly parents in Kentucky in 1826. He removed to Greene County, Ill., at the age of four, with his parents; experienced religion while a student at McKendree College, where he graduated in 1849; for some time afterwards was tutor in that institution, and its financial agent; labored as a teacher in Chester, Mount Carmel, Rockford, and elsewhere, with marked success; became president of Southern Illinois Female Seminary, and in 1861 entered the Southern Illinois Conference. After two years in the ministry he again resumed the presidency of the college. He subsequently re-entered the regular work, and afterwards became presiding elder, which position he resigned but a few weeks before his death, June 6, 1872. Mr. Corrington was a man of sound sense and excellent judgment. His words were few, but plain and practical. His career was an undoubted success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 186.

Corrody is (1) a payment, in kind or money, made by a monastery to the nominee of a benefactor, who had the right of appointing often an indefinite number of such persons; (2) an allowance by a monastery to servants or outside persons.

Corsawr, JOHN, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1661, had a unanimous call by the parishioners to the living at South Leith in 1664, and was transferred to Dalgety in 1669. He died May 20, 1680, aged thirty-seven years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 105; ii, 589.

Corse is a plaited or woven silk ribbon, used as an ornament of vestments.

Corse, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1783; called to the living at Abernethy in 1789, and ordained. He died Jan. 26, 1754. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 702.

Corse, David (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed minister at the second charge, Aberdeen, in 1704, and transferred to the first charge in 1706. He died before Oct. 23, 1712. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 485, 487.

Corse, David (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1726; was assistant minister at Dunnottar, and appointed to that living in 1734; ordained in 1735. He died in February, 1736, aged thirty years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 862.

Corse, Hugh, a Scotch clergyman, studied at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in 1701; appointed to the living at Bower the same year, and ordained. He died July 6, 1738, aged sixty-two years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 357.

Corse, John, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1737; appointed to Gorbals Chapel of Ease, Glasgow, in 1739; called to Tron Church as assistant minister in 1743, and ordained. He died Feb. 5, 1782, aged sixty-seven years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 12.

Corser, Enoch, a Congregational minister, was born at Boscawen, N. H., Jan. 2, 1787. He attended the academy in Salisbury, and in 1811 graduated from Middlebury College. For three years he taught school in Danvers, Mass.; commenced the study of divinity in May, 1814, with the Rev. Dr. Harris, of Dunbarton, and was licensed in 1815 by the Hopkinton Association. After preaching in Middleton, Mass., and Colebrook, N. H., he was invited to Loudon, where he was ordained as pastor, March 17, 1817. His labors here were attended with great success, and ended Dec. 13, 1837. At Sanbornton Bridge he preached for nearly six years, and in May, 1843, began service as stated supply to the Church at Plymouth. He held the same relation to the Church in Epping for three years, from May, 1845, after which he removed to Boscawen. During the two years following he supplied, for short periods, the churches in Fisherville, Henniker, and Warner. At this time he was compelled to relinquish ministerial labors for several years, on account of an attack of palsy; but in August, 1857, he began service at Loudon, which continued until his death, June 17, 1868. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 285.

Corsicus, a presbyter, is honored June 30 as a Christian martyr in Africa.

Corsini, Andrea, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Florence, Nov. 30, 1302. He entered the order of Carmelites in 1319, was ordained priest in 1328, and became distinguished by his sermons, and still more by the sanctity of his life. According to the Bibliothèque Socrée, he was made bishop of Fiesole in 1359 or 1360, in spite of his efforts to avoid it, and his life was one of deep humility. He was sent as legate to Bologna by pope Urban V, and appeared the seditions which disturbed that city. He died Jan. 6, 1373, and is commemorated on Feb. 4. Urban VIII canonized him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corsini, Lorenzo. See CLEMENT XII.

Corsinus. See CORVINUS.

Corsned (from kur, trial, and snæd, a slice) was an ordeal among the Saxons, mentioned as early as 1015, consisted of eating barley-bread and cheese, over which prayers had been said by the priest. The eater, if guilty, was expected to be choked by the morsel. It is supposed that this ceremony was invented in the early ages of Christianity from a presumptuous use of the consecrated elements, and that the Saxon corsned was actually the sacramental bread. The custom long since fell into disuse, though traces of it still exist in certain phrases of abjuration in use among certain classes, such as "I will take the sacrament upon it," "May this morsel be my last." See ORDEAL.

Corso, Giovanni Vincente, a Neapolitan painter, was born about 1490. He studied under Giovanni Antonio Amato, and afterwards entered the school of Pierino del Vaga, at Rome. Most of his works in the churches at Naples have been retouched. The best preserved are an admirable picture of Christ Bearing his Cross, with many figures, in San Domenico, and The Adoration of the Magi, in San Lorenzo. He died at Rome in 1545. See Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Bryan, Dict. of Painters and Engravers (ed. Graves), s. v.

Corso, Niccolo, a Genoese painter, flourished about 1503. His works are chiefly in the cloister and refectory of the monastery of the Olivetani at Quarto, near Genoa. The most esteemed is a picture from the life of St. Benedict.

Corson, Charles Wesley, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Beesley's Point, Cape May Co., N. J., Sept. 19, 1838. He was converted in 1852, and in 1872 joined the Genesee Conference, being ordained deacon the same year, and elder two years after. He served successfully Chili, Walworth, and Penfield (all in New York). In 1880 he was appointed to Prattsburg, where he died, Jan. 26, 1881. He was a man of sympathetic nature and true piety, arduous and faithful in his labors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 328.

Corson, Robert, a Canadian Methodist minister, was born at Clinton, Ont., Sept. 12, 1793. In the war of 1812 he served at the battles of Stony Creek, Queenston Heights, and Lundy's Lane. He was converted in 1817, sent out to preach in 1822, ordained in 1825, became superannuated in 1858, still continued abundant in labors, and died at Cainsville, Ont., Oct. 8, 1878. Mr. Corson had poor fare, poor pay, but tireless energy. He would preach forty sermons a month. He smiled at toil, hardship, and danger. His love of preaching was marvellous; it was a passion, an enthusiasm, an inspiration. See Minutes of London (Ont.) Conference, 1879, p. 25.

Cort, CORNELIUS (in Italy, Cornelio Fiamingo), an eminent Dutch engraver, was born at Hoom in 1533 or 1536, and was probably instructed by Jerome Cock. He afterwards established a famous school at Rome, where he died in 1578. The following are some of his numerous prints from different masters: Adam and Eve, with the Serpent; The Resurrection; The Descent of the Holy Ghost; Christ Walking on the Water; Christ Crowned with Thorns; St. John the Baptist; The Adoration of the Magi; The Entombing of Christ; The Creation of Adam and Eve; Moses and Aaron Before Pharaoh; The Nativity; The Holy Family; The Resurrection of Lazarus; The Death of the Virgin; Christ on the Mount of Olives. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Bryan, Dict. of Painters and Engravers, s. v.

Cortasse, PIKRE JOSEPH, a French theologian, was born at Apt, May 21, 1681. He entered the Jesuit order; taught grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, positive theology, and Hebrew in the colleges of his order; and for fourteen years devoted himself to preaching. He died at Lyons, March 24, 1740, leaving, Traité des Noms Divins Traduit du Grec de Saint-Denis l'Aréopagite (Lyons, 1739). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corte, Cesare, an Italian painter, the son and scholar of Valerio, was born at Genoa in 1550. His best historical works are in that city. In San Pietro is his picture of St. Peter at the Feet of the Virgin. In San Francesco, is an altar-piece, representing Mary Magdalene; and in Santa Maria del Carmina are two pictures by him, of St. Simeon and St. Francis. He died in 1618. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Bryan, Dict. of Painters and Engravers, s. v.

Corte, Juan de la, a Spanish painter, was born at Madrid in 1597, studied in the school of Velasquez, and was distinguished for his small pictures of sacred subjects. He died at Madrid in 1660. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cortese (or Cortesi; Fr. Courtois), Giacomo (or Jacopo, called Il Borgognone), a Jesuit and painter, was born at St. Hippolyte, in Franche-Comté, in 1621. At the age of fifteen he visited Milan, and afterwards Rome, where he painted a picture of Magdalene at the Feet of Christ, in the church of Santa Marta; and, in Il Gesu, The Adoration of the Magi and The Murder of the Innocents. He died at Rome in 1676. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Bryan, Dict. of Painters and Engravers, s. v.

Cortese, Guglielmo (likewise called Il Borgognone), a painter, brother of the foregoing, was born at St. Hippolyte, in 1628, and was instructed, while young, in the school of Pietro da Cortona, at Rome. His best works are in that city. They are, The Crucifixion, Joshua's Battle, a Madonna, with several Saints. He died at Rome in 1679. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Bryan, Dict. of Painters and Engravers, s. v.

Cortesi (or Cortesi), PAOLO, an Italian theologian, was born at San Geminiano, Tuscany, in 1465. He entered orders, and applied himself to the study of Latin literature. He was apostolic secretary under Alexander VI and Pius III, protonotary, and finally bishop of Urbino. He died in 1510, leaving, De Hominibus Doctis Dialogus (published by Alexander Politi, more than two centuries after the death of Cortesi; Florence, 1734):—In Quatuor Libros Sententiarum P. Lombardi Commentarii (Rome, 1503; Paris, 1513; Basle, 1540):—De Curialibus (1510). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cortois (de Pressigny), GABRIEL, a French prelate, was born at Dijon, Dec. 11, 1746. After having charge of the abbey of St. Jacques, in 1780, in the diocese of Béziers, he was appointed, in 1785, to the bishopric of St. Malo, and consecrated Jan. 15, 1786. During the Revolution he spent most of his time in Switzerland. On the return of the Bourbons he was appointed member of a commission of bishops and ecclesiastics to examine the wants of the Church, and was sent to Rome as ambassador. In 1816, he was made peer of France, and the following year archbishop of Besançon, but did not take possession until Oct. 31, 1819. He died May 2, 1822. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Corvaria (Corbario, or Corvara), PIETRO DI. See NICHOLAS V.

Corvi, DOMENICO, an Italian painter, was born at Viterbo in 1623, and studied under Mancini. He was one of the most eminent modern Roman masters, and his best works are his night-pieces, as his Nativity, in the Church of the Assumption. He died at Rome in 1703. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Corvinus (or Corsinus, properly Rabe), JOHANNES AROLDUS, a Dutch jurist and theologian, devoted himself to preaching in 1606, and embraced the doctrine of the Remonstrants, for which he was deprived of his office as preacher, and, in 1622, obliged to seek an asylum in Schlewig. In 1623 he went to France, sojourned at Paris, Rouen, and Orleans, and was made doctor of law. In 1625 he returned to Amsterdam, and became professor of canon law. He is often confounded with his son, Corvinus of Beldern, who embraced Catholicism. The subject of this sketch died in 1650, leaving Defensio Sententia Jac. Arminii, etc. (Leyden, 1613):—Censura Anatomies Arminianismi P. Molinai (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1622), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Corwin, Franklin D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Jefferson, Chemung Co., N. Y., Oct. 9, 1838. He received an early religious training; was passionately fond of books and study from childhood; entered Rock River Seminary, Ill., in 1857, with the intention of preparing for the law, but, experiencing conversion, repaired to the Garrett Biblical Institute, remained about two years, and then, in 1861, entered the Rock River Conference, in which he labored with much energy and acceptability until his decease, June 24, 1865. As a preacher, Mr. Corwin was studious and careful in preparation, earnest, attractive, and convincing in his delivery; as a pastor, mild, social, and winning. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 226.

Corwin, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pendleton District, S. C., in 1811. After seventeen years of effective service in Indiana, he emigrated to California in 1849, became a member of the first conference in the state, and travelled very extensively between Siskiyou and San Diego. He died Dec. 1, 1876. Mr. Corwin was remarkable in his exemplary life, energy, and devotedness in self-culture and service for the Church, and in his success. See Minutes of American Conferences, 1877, p. 100.

Corwin, Jason, a Baptist minister, was born at Franklin, Conn., in February, 1792, of Presbyterian parents. He removed to Cazenovia, N. Y., where he was baptized by elder John Peck, and soon after licensed to preach. He studied at the Theological Institute in Hamilton, was ordained at Woodstock, and in a few months became pastor of the church in Deposit, Delaware Co. Here he remained three years; was then pastor in Penfield, Monroe Co., five years, Webster two years, Binghams two years, and then removed to Great Bend, Pa. His other pastorates were in Earlville, Bridgewater, Augusta, Clinton, all in N. Y. In 1848 he received an appointment from the American Baptist Home Mission Society, and labored in Illinois four or five years. Subsequently he was an agent of the American Bible Union. He died at Washington, Tazewell Co., Ill., May 15, 1860. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1860, p. 8, 9. (J. C. S.)

Corwin, Richard, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mason County, Ky., Aug. 29, 1789. He was piously trained, joined the Church in 1809, entered the ministry in 1817, travelled in Kentucky, was presiding elder for ten years, agent for American Colonization Society in 1834, and died while elder of Louisville District, in 1843. He was consistent, grave, intelligent, and spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1843-44, p. 454.

Cory, ANDREW, an English Bible Christian preacher, was born at Moorwinstow, Cornwall. He was converted in 1816, became a class-leader and local preacher, entered the ministry in 1818, and travelled the best circuits for fifteen years; was superintendent of circuits and districts several years, treasurer of the Missionary Society, and once president of conference. He was drowned in September, 1833, at St. Neots, Cornwall.

Coryate, GEORGE, an English clergyman and Latin poet, was born in the parish of St. Thomas, Salisbury, and was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, where, in 1562, he was admitted a perpetual fellow. In June, 1570, he became rector of Odcombe, and in 1594 was appointed prebendary in the cathedral of York. He died at Odcombe, March 4, 1606, leaving Poemata Varia Latina (London, 1611, 4to), and Descriptio Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Corybantes, in Greek mythology, were priests of Rhea or Cybele, who danced, with shrieks and convulsive movements, to express their sorrow at the death of Atys, who loved Cybele. They are often confounded with the Curetes or Cabiri and the Idean Dactyles.

Cosack, JOHANN CARL, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 27, 1818, at Marienwerder, and died Oct. 30, 1868, while professor of theology at Königsberg. He wrote, Ueber die Taufe der unehelichen Kinder (Königsberg, 1858):—Paulus Speratus Leben und Lieder (Braunschweig, 1861). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 246. (B. P.)

Cosattini, GIUSEPPE, an Italian ecclesiastic, canon of Aquileja, was a native of Udine (Friuli), where he flourished from 1672 to 1734. He is particularly noted for his picture of St. Philip at the Altar, painted for the congregation of Udine. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cosby, Jouett Vernon, a Presbyterian minister, was born July 8, 1816, at Staunton, Va. He was prepared for college at his native place; graduated from Hampden-Sidney College in 1836; taught school three years, then entered the theological seminary at Prince Edward, Va., where he spent two years, but graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1843. He was licensed to preach by East Hanover Presbytery, May 3, 1843; was ordained as an evangelist by the same presbytery at Mount Carmel, Va., Sept. 23 of the same year, and assigned to Southampton as his field of labor, but afterwards supplied the church at Smithfield for two or three years. He commenced labor at Bardstown, Ky., in 1847, and also took charge of the Bardstown Academy. His relation as pastor was dissolved in 1860, and then he supplied the churches of Midway and Clear Creek, and was principal of Rose Hill Female Academy, at Woodford, but in 1864 he returned to Bardstown, and resumed the care of the church as stated supply, and the charge of the academy, where he continued till his death, Nov. 14, 1877. Mr. Cosby was a highly cultivated scholar, a devoted and successful teacher. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 51.

Cosby, Minor M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, embraced religion when about twenty-one, and two years later entered the Kentucky Conference. He gave full proof of his calling during the four years of his ministry, and died Sept. 5, 1835. Mr. Cosby was a young man of good understanding, great industry, and exemplary life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1836, p. 405.

Coscia, Lelipo, a Neapolitan prelate, brother of Niccolo, was born at Benevento, and lived at Rome in 1731. He was, like his brother, an attendant of Benedict XIII, and became private chamberlain and vicar-general. April 8, 1725, he was consecrated bishop of Targa by the pope, who, in April, 1729, appointed him his auditor. After the death of Benedict XIII, Coscia was included in the disgrace of his brother, and shared a similar fate, being deprived of his honors and condemned to suffer imprisonment. Nothing is known of the closing years of his life. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coscia, Niccolo, a Neapolitan prelate, was born at Benevento, Jan. 25, 1682. He was at first domestic and intimate confidant of cardinal Orsini, archbishop of Benevento, who, having become pope under the name of Benedict XIII, made him, in June, 1724, secretary of memorials, with an abbey of a thousand pounds' revenue; consecrated him titular archbishop of Trajanopolis on July 2; declared him assistant bishop of the throne, Aug. 15, and made him cardinal, under the title of Santa Maria in Dominica (called the Novicelli), Sept. 15. Aug. 2, 1725, Coscia was appointed to various other ecclesiastical privileges. Sept. 5, Benedict XIII declared him successor to the archbishopric of Benevento. On the 13th of the same month Coscia received the title of protector-commander of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, with provision for six thousand pounds of revenue. In December he was made protector of the order of Conventual Minors, and, Feb. 10, 1726, of the brotherhood of writers and copyists, and finally, on June 12, prefect of the congregation of the state of Arignon. The bestowal of so much honor brought upon him general hatred. He was from time to time robbed of his honors, and suffered great persecution, especially at the hand of Clement XII. After suffering ten years' imprisonment, he returned to Naples, where he died in 1755. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coscinomancy, in Grecian superstition, was fortune-telling by means of a sieve. When, for example, a thief was to be detected, the sieve was suspended by a thread in the air, and a number of suspected persons named, the gods being invoked in the meantime. At whosesoever name the sieve moved, he was held to be the thief. See DIVINATION.

Cosens, PETER, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Forfarshire, was licensed to preach in 1806; presented to the living at Torryburn in 1808; ordained in 1809; transferred to Lauder in 1811, and died Aug. 20, 1845, aged sixty-three years, leaving a son, Alexander, minister of Broughton. See Fasts Eccles. Scoticae, i, 521; ii, 605.

Cosimo, PIETRO DI, a Florentine historical and portrait painter, was born in 1441, and studied under Cosimo Roselli. He went to Rome and assisted in painting a chapel for the pope, which gave such proofs of his skill that he was much patronized by the nobility, and established a school. He died in 1521.

Cosin, Richard, LL.D., an English divine, and civil and canon lawyer, was dean of the arches, and chancellor of the diocese of Worcester from 1579 until 1598. His works include An Answer to a Libel, entitled, An Abstract of Certain Acts of Parliament (1584):—Conspiracie for Pretended Reformation, viz. Presbyterian Discipline by Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington (1592):—Apologie for Sumrie Proceedings by Jurisdiction Ecclesiasticall (1594):—Ecclesia Anglicana Politia in Tabulas Digesta (1604); and other works. See Fuller, Worthies of England; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cosin, Robert, an English martyr, was a godly man, and did much good by reading the Scriptures to those who could not read. For dissuading his neighbors from image-worship he was condemned and burned at Buckingham in 1533. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 214.

Cosmas (Cosmus, or Cosmo), Saint. The following is the full legend of this saint, as given by Mrs. Jamieson, Legends of the Saints, p. 433.

Cosmas and Damian were two brothers, Arabians by birth, but they dwelt in Ægeæ, a city of Cilicia. Their father having died while they were yet children, their pious mother, Theodora, brought them up with all diligence, and in the practice of every Christian virtue. Their charity was such that they not only lived in the greatest abstinence, distributing their goods to the infirm and poor, but they studied medicine and surgery, that they might be able to prescribe for the sick, and relieve the sufferings of the wounded and infirm; and the blessing of God being on all their endeavors, they became the most learned and the most perfect physicians that the world had ever seen. They ministered to all who applied to them, whether rich or poor. Even to suffering animals they did not deny their aid, and they constantly refused all payment or recompense, exercising their art only for charity, and for the love of God; and thus they spent their days. At length those wicked emperors, Diocletian and Maximian, came to the throne, in whose time so many saints perished. Among them were the physicians, Cosmas and Damian, who, professing themselves Christians, were seized by Lycias, the procurator of Arabia, and cast into prison. And first they were thrown into the sea, but an angel saved them; and then into the fire, but the fire refused to consume them; and then they were bound on two crosses and stoned, but of the stones flung at them none reached them, but fell on those who threw them, and many were killed. So the proconsul, believing that they were enchanter, commanded that they should be beheaded, which was done.

The Greek Church, however, celebrates three pairs of these brothers as saints: (1) July 1, in the time of Carinus; (2) Oct. 27, Arabia, with their brothers Anthimus, Leontius, and Euprepius, martyred under Diocletian; (3) Nov. 1, sons of Theodotus. It is probable that all these are but variations or imitations of one legend.

COSMAS OF ALEXANDRIA, a deacon. Maximus, abbot of Chrysopolis (A.D. 662), mentions, in a letter to a nobleman named Petrus, a treatise on the union and distinction of two natures in Jesus Christ, which he had addressed to Cosmas. Cosmas had been attracted by Severian opinions, but had returned to the Catholic Church. In a second letter to Cosmas, Maximus professes his sorrow at the calumnies spread abroad against Gregory, prefect of Africa (Migne, Patrol. Grec. xci: Maximus, § 307-309, 313, 334; Ceillier, xi, 768, 769).

COSMAS OF JERUSALEM (surnamed the Hagiopolite, also the Melodist), who held the second place among Greek ecclesiastical poets, was born at Jerusalem. Being left an orphan at an early age, he was adopted by the father of John of Damascus, and the two foster-brothers were bound together by a friendship which lasted through life. They excited each other to hymnology, and assisted, corrected, and polished each other's compositions. Cosmas, like his friend, became a monk of St. Sabas, and against his will was consecrated bishop of Majuma, near Gaza, in A.D. 743, by John, patriarch of Jerusalem, the same who ordained John of Damascus priest. After administering his diocese with great holiness, he died of old age, about 760, and is commemorated by the Eastern Church Oct. 14.

"Where perfect sweetness dwells, is Cosmas gone;
But his sweet lays to cheer the Church live on,"

says the verse prefixed to his life. His compositions are numerous; the best seem to be his canons on Gregory Nazianzen and the Purification. To him a considerable part of the Octoechus is owing. "He is the most learned of the Greek Church poets, and his fondness for types, boldness in their application, and love of aggregating them, make him the Oriental Adam of St. Victor. It is owing partly to a compressed fullness of meaning, very uncommon in the Greek poets of the Church, partly to the unusual harshness and contraction of his phrases, that he is the hardest of ecclesiastical bards to comprehend" (Neale). The following hymns have been translated into English by Neale:

Χριστὸς γεννᾶται, δοξάζετε (Christmas).
"Christ is born! Tell forth his fame!"

Τῷ πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων.
"Him, of the Father's very Essence."

Ῥίζος ἐκ τῆς ρίζης.
"Rod of the Root of Jesse."

Θεὸς ὢν εἰρήνης.
"Father of Peace, and God of Consolation!"

Ἐκλήγχων τῶν τριῶν.
"As Jonah, issuing from his three days' tomb."

Οἱ παῖδες εὐσθεῖα.
"The Holy Children boldly stand."

Θαύματος ὑπερφύου ἡ δρακοβόλος.
"The dewy freshness that the furnace flings."

Μυστήριον τέλει.
"O wondrous mystery, full of passing grace!"

Χορὸς Ἰσραὴλ (Transfiguration).
"The choirs of ransomed Israel."

A Latin translation is given in Bibl. Patrol. ed. Colon. vii, 536 sq. His hymns were first printed by Aldus (Venice, 1501), and they are to be found in La Bigne, Bibl. Patrol. xii, 727 sq.; Migne, Patrol. xcvi, and Daniel, Thesaurus Hymnologicus, iii, 55. According to Allatius (De Georgiis, p. 418) they have been expounded by Joannes Zonaras, Theodoros Prodromus, George of Corinth, and others. See Suidas, s. v. Ἰωάνν. Δαμασκ.; Joann. COSMAS OF PRAGUE, the first Bohemian historian, was born in 1045. In 1086 he was made canon of the Prague chapter; in 1099 he received holy orders, and he died Oct. 21, 1125. When already advanced in years he set himself to write a history of Bohemia. He completed the Chronica Boemorum between 1119 and 1125. The first book reaches from the earliest times to the year 1088; the second to 1092; the third to 1125. The Chronica was published by Freher in Script. rerum Bohemicarum (Hanover, 1602, 1607, 1620); Menke, Script. rerum Germanicarum (Leipsic, 1728); Pelzel et Dobrowsky, Script. rerum Bohemicarum (Prague, 1783); Köpke in Monum. Germ.; Migne, Patrol. Lat. clxvi; Emmler et Tomek, Fontes rerum Bohemicarum (ibid. 1874), ii, 1 sq. It was continued by some anonymous writers, under the title Continuatores Cosmæ. See Borowy in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

COSMAS (usually styled "the Elder") was a monk of St. SABA. After a youth devoted to the study of the liberal arts, philosophy, and theology, when already a presbyter, he was captured and enslaved by the Saracens in a journey from Italy to Damascus, but was redeemed by the father of Joannes Damascenus, who intrusted to his care the education of his son, with his companion

Cosmas (the Younger, "Cosmas of Jerusalem"). After he had completed the instruction of his pupils he retired to the monastery of St. Saba, where he remained till his death, cir. A.D. 750 (Joann. Hierosol. in Vita Joann. Damasc.; Moschus, Prat. Spirit. c. 40). The greater part of the hymns that pass under the name of Cosmas the Melodist are attributed to him, but in the confusion that exists between the elder and younger Cosmas, it is impossible to assign them to their respective authors with any accuracy.

Cosmas, bishop of SCYTHOPOLIS, and metropolitan, succeeded Olympius in 466. He was a native of Capadocia, but, with his two brothers, Chrysippus and Gabriel, was brought up in Syria under the famous abbot St. Euthymius, who on their first application for admission to his monastery rejected them on account of their youth, but afterwards, being warned in a dream, admitted them. Cosmas was ordained deacon by Juvenal of Jerusalem about the time of the Council of Ephesus, and afterwards raised by him to the presbyterate. He was ordained bishop of Scythopolis by Anastasius, Juvenal's successor; held the see for thirty years, and died in 496. The third brother, Gabriel, was ordained priest, and was twenty-four years abbot of the monastery of St. Stephen. He founded a small monastery in honor of the Ascension, in a valley of Olivet, and died at the age of eighty years (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthem. 40, 64, etc.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus). See CHRYSIPPUS.

Cosmas of THEBES was a deacon, deposed A.D. 592 by his bishop, Adrian, for malversation of the goods of the Church. Cosmas and another deposed deacon accused Adrian, by way of revenge, to the emperor Maurice. Maurice, according to the canons, sent the case to John, bishop of Larissa, Adrian's metropolitan, who condemned him. Adrian appealed to Maurice, and was acquitted. The case finally came before Gregory the Great (Gregory, Epp. iii, 7; in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii, 609, § 629; Ceillier, xi, 490).

Cosmati, a family of Greek artists, who flourished at Rome as early as the 12th century. They particularly excelled in mosaic paintings. Among them, ANTONATO DI COSIMO COSMATI was the most distinguished, and he was employed in the church of Santa Maria Maggiore in 1290. Several of his name also exercised their talents in the cathedral of Orvieto.

Cosmo, Saint. See COSMAN.

Cosmocrator (κοσμοκράτωρ, governor of the world), in the system of Valentinus, is an appellation given to the devil, who was represented as having his dwelling in this world, while the Demiurgus, whose creature he was, dwelt in the lowest of the regions above the world (Irenæus, i, 5, p. 26). The name Cosmocrator we may believe to have been derived from Ephes. vi, 12, reference also being had to John xii, 31, whose phrase, "prince of this world," occurs instead of Cosmocrator in the parallel passage of Hippolytus (p. 192). Harvey (ad Iren.) gives proof that in the rabbinical demonology this Greek word was written in Hebrew characters, and thence infers that the Gnostic application of this word was derived from a Jewish use of it. On the other hand, Massuet (p. xliii) refers to an employment of the word by the later Platonists, to denote the rulers of the seven planetary orbs. But its occurrence in the Epistle to the Ephesians renders any other explanation unnecessary.

In the system of Marcion (Irenæus, i, 27, p. 106), into which the name Cosmocrator probably passed from the Valentinian, it was applied to the God who made the world.

Cosmology, ANCIENT. A remarkable paper on this subject has been published by president Warren

(in the Boston University Year-book, 1882, p. 17 sq.), in which he maintains a new theory of the Homeric cosmology, and he further asserts that "the Egyptians, Accadians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Phoenicians, Hebrews, Greeks, Iranians, Indo-Aryans, Chinese, Japanese—in fine, all the most ancient historic peoples—possessed in their earliest traceable periods a cosmology essentially identical, and one of a far more advanced type than has been attributed to them." We cite the most essential paragraphs of his paper:

"In ancient thought the grand divisions of the world are four, to wit: The abode of the gods, the abode of living men, the abode of the dead, and, finally, the abode of demons. To locate these in correct mutual relations, one must begin by representing to himself the earth as a sphere or spheroid, and as situated within, and concentric with, the starry sphere, each having its axis perpendicular, and its north pole at the top. The pole-star is thus in the true zenith, and the heavenly heights centring about it are the abode of the supreme god or gods. According to the same conception, the upper or northern hemisphere of the earth is the proper home of living men; the under or southern hemisphere of the earth, the abode of disembodied spirits and rulers of the dead; and, finally, the undermost region of all, that centring around the southern pole of the heavens, the lowest hell. The two hemispheres of the earth were furthermore conceived of as separated from each other by an equatorial ocean or oceanic current.

Diagram of Ancient Cosmology.

"To illustrate this conception of the world, let the two circles of the diagram represent respectively the earth-sphere and the outermost of the revolving starry spheres. A is the north pole of the heavens, so placed as to be in the zenith. B is the south pole of the heavens, in the nadir. The line A B is the axis of the apparent revolution of the starry heavens in a perpendicular position. C is the north pole of the earth; D, its south pole; the line C D, the axis of the earth in perpendicular position, and coincident with the corresponding portion of the axis of the starry heavens. The space 1 1 1 1 is the abode of the supreme god or gods; 2, Europe; 3, Asia; 4, Libya, or the known portion of Africa; 5 5 5, the ocean, or 'ocean stream'; 6 6 6, the abode of disembodied spirits and rulers of the dead; 7 7 7, the lowest hell.

"The difficulties hitherto experienced in representing in a satisfactory manner the Yggdrasil of Norse mythology, the cosmical 'fig-tree' of the Vedas, the 'winged oak' of Pherecydes, etc., quite disappear when once, with understanding of the supposed true position of the universe in space, the centre line of the trunk of the tree is made coincident with the axis of the starry heavens.

"In any chart or picture of the ancient Iranian cosmology, constructed according to this key, the Iranian Olympus, Harô berezaiti, will join the solid earth to heaven, while underneath, the mount of demons, dread Azeadara, will penetrate the nether darkness of the lowest hell. In Egyptian and Hindû cosmology the same opposed circum-polar projections of the earth are clearly traceable. To Harô berezaiti (Alborz) corresponds Mount Sar of ancient Egyptian mythology, the Kharak Kurra of the Accadians, the Har Moed of Babylonia (Isa. xiv, 13, 14), the Sumer of the Hindûs and Buddhists, the Asgard of the Northern, the Pearl Mountain of the Chinese.

"In like manner, the comparative study of the myths of the ocean and of the under-worlds of ancient peoples leaves no room for doubt that these, too, were originally adjusted to a geocentric conception of the universe, and to an earth which was figured as a globe. With such a key the most perplexing cosmological problems, such as the origin of the strange concentric diaspas of the Ptolemaic, the origin and significance of the Sabeian myth of Ur, the son of Roshafa, and many others, receive at once a plain and satisfactory solution.

"Even the Kojiki, the most ancient of the sacred books of Japan, should have taught us to credit the early nations of the world with better knowledge of the earth than we have done; for in its beautiful cosmogony the earth revolves, and Izanagi's spear is only its upright axis."

These views Dr. Warren applies, by way of illustration and confirmation, to the famous problem of the pillars of Atlas, which classic mythology represents as supporting the universe.

"They are simply the upright axes of earth and heaven. Viewed in their relation to earth and heaven respectively, they are two; but viewed in reference to the universe as an undivided whole, they are one and the same. Being coincident, they are truly one, and yet they are ideally separable. Hence singular or plural designations are equally correct and equally fitting. Transpiercing the globe at the very 'navel or centre of the sea,' Atlas's pillar penetrates far deeper than any recess of the waters' bed, and he may well be said to 'know the depths of the whole sea.' Or this statement may have reference to that primordial sea in which his pillar was standing when the geocentric and cosmogonic process began. In this sense how appropriate and significant would it have been if applied to Izanagi!"

"Atlas's pillar, then, is the axis of the world. It is the same pillar apotheotized in the Egyptian document known as the great Harris Magic Papyrus, in these unmistakable words: 'O long column, which commences in the upper and in the lower heavens!' It is, with scarce a doubt, what the same ancient people in their Book of the Dead so happily styled 'the spine of the earth.' It is the Rig-Veda's vielfragende Achee des unauflöslichen sich drehenden, nie alternden, nie morchenwordenden, durch den Lauf der Zeiten nicht abgenutzten Welttrahs, auf welchem ALLE WASSEN STEHEN. It is the umbrella-staff of Burmese cosmology, the churning-stick of India's gods and demons. It is the trunk of every cosmical tree. It is the Tai Kih of the Chinese universe: the tortoise-piercing (earth-piercing) arrow of the Mongolian heaven-god; the spear of Izanagi. It is the cord which the ancient Vedic bard saw stretched from one side of the universe to the other. Is it not the Psalmist's 'line' of the heavens which 'is gone out through' the very 'earth' and on 'to the end of the world'? It is the Irmineul of the Germans, as expressly recognized by Grimm. It is the tower of Kronos. It is the Talmudic pillar which connects the Paradise celestial and the Paradise terrestrial."

"The studies already completed render it certain that every existing systematic exposition of classic mythology is to be supplanted. Equally interesting is the question of the adaptation of this reconstruction of ancient cosmology to throw light on early Hebrew conceptions of the world and of Sheol."

Such a radical reconstruction of ancient cosmology, however, requires further exposition and corroboration in detail before the learned world can be expected to adopt it generally. The Hebrew notions especially, which are developed to a considerable degree in the Bible, should be subjected to a rigid and critical comparison. This task we may hope that the author of the scheme will perform in due time. See PARADISE.

COSNAC, DANIEL DE, a French prelate, was born at the chateau of Cosnac, in Limousin, about 1680. Being destined from his birth for the ecclesiastical calling, he first pursued his studies at Brives and at Périgueux, and went, in 1644, to take the degree of master of arts at the College of Navarre. He received the degree of bachelor of divinity at the University of Paris in 1648, and his licensure two years later. Being admitted, through the kindness of the duke of Bouillon, to the house of the prince of Conti, young as he was, he realized the advantage thus acquired, proving himself a man of uprightness and integrity. He appeared several times in assemblies of the clergy, took part in the grave question of the right of enjoying the revenues of vacant bishoprics, which threatened to make a schism, and was one of the French prelates who aided most in achieving the liberty of the Gallican Church. He had charge of examining the briefs of Innocent XI, and his report is worthy of being read. In 1687 Cosnac was called to the archbishopric of Aix, but, owing to the troubles between France and Rome, he did not take the oath until June 11, 1695. In 1701, the king gave to him the abbey of St. Riquiers of Évreux, and appointed him commander of the order of the Holy Spirit. He died at Aix, Jan. 18, 1708, leaving some Mémoires in MS., which were published in 1852 by count Julius de Cosnac. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

COSPÉAN (or Cospeau), PHILIPPE DE, a Flemish theologian, was born in Hainault in 1568. He first studied under Justus Lipsius, and then went to Paris. His poverty and his desire for knowledge were so great that, in order to complete his studies, he accepted the position of valet to the abbot of Espernon, afterwards cardinal de la Valette. In 1604 Cospéan received the degree of doctor from the Sorbonne, was appointed bishop of Aire in 1607, and promoted to the bishopric of Nantes, March 17, 1622. He had at his accession a very lively dispute with his chapter, relative to the emoluments during the vacancy. Cospéan declared himself favorable to the Oratorians in their quarrel with the Carmelites. He was charged, in 1627, by cardinal Richelieu, with preparing Francis of Montmorency for death. In 1636 he was transferred to the bishopric of Lisieux. He died at the chateau of Loges, near Lisieux, in 1646, leaving, Oraison Funèbre, aux Obsèques de Henri le Grand (Paris, 1610):—Remembrance du Clergé de France au Roi:—Pro Patre Berulio Epistola Apologetica (Paris, 1622). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

COSSA, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, was a native of Ferrara. He executed some works at Bologna, which are, Madonnas, with Saints and Angels. One of them, in the institute, is dated 1474. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

COSSALE (or Cozzale), ORAZIO, an Italian painter, flourished about 1600. His chief works are, The Adoration of the Magi, in the church Della Grazie, at Brescia; and The Presentation in the Temple, in Le Miracoli. Cossale was accidentally killed by his son, about 1610. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

COSSART, GABRIEL, a French Jesuit, was born at Pontoise in 1615. In 1633 he joined his order, was for some time professor at Paris, and died Sept. 18, 1674. He is the author of Parthenii Patriarchæ Constantinopolitani Decretum Synodale (in Greek and Latin, Paris, 1643). He continued and completed the famous collection of councils commenced by abbé Labbé, which he published in 17 vols. folio, with the title, Conciliorum Collectio Mazima ad Regiam Editionem Exacta, Studio Philippi Lubbe et Gabrielis Cossartii e Societate Jesu (Parisii, 1671, 1672). See Kobler, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

COSSART, LAURENT JOSEPH, a French ecclesiastic, was born Aug. 10, 1758, at Cauchy-la-Tour, near Lillers. After having been master of theology at the grand seminary of St. Nicholas du Chardonnet, he was appointed superior of the seminary of St. Marcellus. From this he passed to the diocese of Boulogne, when he was made rector of Wimille. Cossart fell into official difficulties, and was obliged to retire to the Netherlands, where he found his bishop, who had already preceded him. The invasion of the Netherlands by the French again driving them forth, Cossart went to Düsseldorf. He died in 1830. While at Düsseldorf he published the Miroir du Clergé, a new edition of which appeared at Lyons and Paris in 1824. He also wrote, Cours de Prônes (1816), in collaboration with other ecclesiastics:—Science Pratique du Catéchiste (1838, 1839). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

COSSIERS, (or Cotsiers), JAN, a reputable Flemish historical painter, was born at Antwerp in 1608, and studied under Cornelis de Vos. He executed a number of works for the churches in Flanders, the principal of which are The Nativity, at Brussels, in the church of the Jesuits; The Martyrdom of St. Ursula, at the Beguinage; The Presentation, and a grand picture of The Crucifixion, in a church at Mechlin. He was appointed director of the academy at Antwerp in 1639, and died in 1652. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cossin, Louis, a French engraver, was born at Troyes about 1633, and died at Paris in 1682. The following are some of his principal plates: The Virgin Mary; St. John the Evangelist Suspended over a Caldron of Boiling Oil; The Stoning of St. Paul at Lystra. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cossins, GEORGE HORWOOD, an English Congregational minister, was born in the parish of Martock, Somerset, in 1799. He was converted in early life; prepared for the ministry by self-culture and the assistance of his pastor; began preaching at Somerton, and afterwards held the pastorate at Bower Hinton, Martock, for thirty-six years, where he died, Jan. 19, 1878. Mr. Cossins wrote The Life of Rev. Christopher Hull, who was the founder of the church at Bower Hinton; and compiled the hymn-book used by his congregation for many years. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 308.

Costa, Andrea da, a Portuguese theologian and musician, was born in the early part of the 17th century at Lisbon, and took the habit of the order of the Holy Trinity of that city, Aug. 3, 1650. He devoted himself exclusively to musical composition and the study of the harp, and was harpist to the chapel of Alfonso VI and of Pedro II. He died suddenly, July 6, 1685; but left a large number of works in the musical library of the kings of Portugal, especially Musæ and Da Paizao da Dominga de Palmus, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Costa, Cesare, an Italian ecclesiastic of the latter part of the 16th century, was born at Macerata. He taught canon law at Rome, and became successively referendary apostolic and archbishop of Capua. He was sent to Venice as papal nuncio, and died at Naples, Feb. 12, 1602, leaving several works, among which was one of considerable repute, entitled Variarum Abugitatum Juris lib. iii (Venice, 1588; also in Otto's Thesaur. Juris [Utrecht, 1733], vol. iv). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Costa, Jorge da, a Portuguese prelate, was born in 1406 at Alpedrinha, a village of the diocese of La Guarda; was educated at Lisbon, became a professor there, and a dean of the cathedral; eventually bishop of Evora, archbishop of Lisbon, and cardinal in 1476. He removed to Rome in 1487, and died there, Sept. 19, 1508.

Costa, Lorenzo (the Elder), an Italian painter, was born at Ferrara about 1450. He was instructed in the school of Francesco Francia, and then went to Bologna. His first work there was The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church of San Petronio. He also painted an altar-piece, which was considered very fine. He particularly excelled in his countenances of men, as may be seen from those of The Apostles at San Petronio, and from his St. Jerome. He died about 1530. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Costa, Manoel da. See ACOSTA, EMMANUEL.

Costadon, ALPHONSE, a French writer, was born at Alans (Venaissin). At the age of sixteen he became a Dominican monk of the congregation of the Holy Sacrament, and afterwards professor of philosophy and theology. He died at Lyons in 1726, leaving several works on witchcraft, etc., for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Costadoni, GIOVANNI DOMENICO (called Anselmi), an Italian theologian and antiquary, was born at Venice in 1714. He entered the monastery of St. Michael at Murano in 1720, and died at Venice, Jan. 23, 1785. His principal works were upon Christian antiquities and the history of religious orders. Costadoni labored with P. Mittarelli in editing the Annales Cusmakhlenæ. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Costaguti, VINCENTE, an Italian ecclesiastic and musician, was born at Genoa in 1613. He was prothonotary to Urban VIII, secretary of the apostolic court of justice, and in 1643 was made cardinal-deacon under the title of Santa Maria in Porticu. He died in 1660, leaving Discorso alle Musica (Genoa, 1640); — Applausi Poetici alle Glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni (Rome, 1639). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Costanzi, CARLO, a very eminent Italian engraver on precious stones, son of Giovanni Costanzi, was born at Naples in 1708. He executed a large number of admirable works, among them a copy of the Medusa of Solon. He brought the art to such a high degree of perfection that he gained a knighthood from the king of Portugal. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Costard, GEORGE, a learned clergyman of the Church of England, was born at Shrewsbury about 1710, and graduated A.M. at Wadham College, Oxford, in 1738. He became a tutor and fellow of his college, and afterwards vicar of Whitchurch, in Dorsetshire. His extensive learning recommended him to the notice of lord-chancellor Northington, who presented him to the vicarage of Twickenham, in Middlesex, in 1764, in which charge he continued until his death, Jan. 10, 1782. Among his publications were, Observations Tending to Illustrate the Book of Job (1714), also Dissertationes Critico-Sacræ (Oxford, 1752). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coste, HILARION DE, a French mission friar, was born in Paris, Sept. 6, 1595, of a noble family, originally from Dauphiné, and died in the same city, Aug. 22, 1661, leaving several pious works full of curious particulars, but destitute of critical accuracy, for which see Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Coster, François, a Belgian theologian, was born at Mechlin in 1531. In 1551 he was received into the Jesuit ranks by Ignatius Loyola himself. In 1555 he received the degree of doctor of theology at Cologne, and there taught belles-lettres, philosophy, and theology. He was afterwards charged with the mission of propagating Jesuitism in the Low Countries and the Rhenish provinces. He zealously combated the Protestants, and thus obtained the name of Malleus Hæreticorum. He died at Brussels, Dec. 6, 1619, leaving Responsio ad Andream Calvium Calvinistam (Cologne, 1586); — Enchiridion Controversiarum (in Latin and Flemish, ibid. 1600); — Epistola ad Franciscum Gomarum, contra Anti-Costermum (ibid.); — Epistola ad Gasp. Greinchlorium (ibid.); — Institutionum Christianarum libri iv (Antwerp and Cologne, 1604); — Demonstratio Veteris Orthodoxæ Fidei, etc. (Cologne, 1607); — Responsio ad Lucam Osiandrum, etc. (ibid. 1608), and several other works of controversy or religion, in both Latin and Flemish. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Coster, Jean (called Columba, from his gentleness), a Belgian commentator, was born at Louvain in 1515. He was prior of the canons-regular of St. Martin in that city, and died there, March 9, 1559, leaving editions and annotations of various Church fathers, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Coster, Johannes, a Flemish theologian, was born at Alost, became master of arts in 1561, and afterwards curate of Oudenarde, where he died, June 10, 1580, leaving a history of the Catholics in heretical cities, under the title, De Eritu Aegypti et Fuga Babylonis (Douay, 1580). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Costerdine, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Flixton, near Manchester, in October, 1726. He was converted under John Nelson; was a local preacher five years, and in 1764 was appointed to the Epworth Circuit. He was persecuted much, but his sermons had mighty effect. He also labored at Keighley, Sheffield, Manchester, Macclesfield, Wednesbury, etc. He died March 16, 1812. He was a man of patience and self-sacrifice. See West. Meth. Magazine, 1814, p. 161.

Costere is a mediæval term for the side-hangings which, suspended on rods, anciently enclosed the altar, or, stretched upon frames, stood at either end, to protect the lighted tapers from draughts.

Coston, ZARA HALE, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Litchfield, Herkimer Co., N. Y., Aug. 6, 1793. He experienced conversion at the age of seventeen; was licensed to preach in 1820, and admitted into the Ohio Conference. In 1829 he was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in it served the Church as health permitted, until 1858, when he became superannuated, and continued to sustain that relation to the close of his life, June 3, 1874. Mr. Coston was amiable, a universal favorite, generous to a fault, and a preacher of ordinary abilities. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 35; Simpeon, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cot (or Cotus), Saint, an early martyr, was a friend of St. Priscus, and when the latter was beheaded, by order of the emperor Aurelian, Cot seized the head and ran into the forest. Being pursued by the Roman soldiers, he was overtaken and beheaded, in 273. It is said that his body was preserved in the Church of St. Priscus, from which place John Baillet, bishop of Auxerre, exhumed it, Nov. 19, 1480, and exposed it for public veneration. According to the Bibliothèque Sacrée, little is known definitely of this man, yet his remains may be seen at Notre Dame, and his festival is celebrated with that of St. Priscus, May 26. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotbat is the discourse with which the imaams among the Saracens were wont to commence the public prayers on Friday. It consisted of expressions of praise to God and to Mohammed, and was first introduced by the Prophet. In ancient times the caliph, dressed in white, used to pronounce the cotbat in person, a ceremony which was considered a mark of sovereignty. It generally concluded with a prayer for the caliph.

Cote, C. H. O., M.D., a Canadian Baptist minister, was born in Montreal in 1808. He received a collegiate education, studied medicine, and entered on the practice of his profession at L'Acadie in 1831, but in 1833 removed to Napierville. He was a member of the legislative assembly of Lower Canada in 1836, but eventually being one of the leaders in the insurrection of 1837 and 1838, went into exile, and for several years resided in the United States. He had been brought up in the Romish Church, but was converted in June, 1841. He then began to preach, spending two years at Chazy, where a number of French Canadians had settled. As the result of his labors, about fifty converts were made from Romanism. He removed, in the fall of 1843, to St. Pie, and, amid much opposition, went forward in his work, in which he met with the most encouraging success. A Church was formed in that place, of which he was ordained the pastor Aug. 28, 1844. When he left there in 1848, upwards of two hundred persons had been converted. Dr. Cote spent some time in the United States, raising funds for the Grand Ligne Mission, and then returned to the field of his labors, taking charge of the mission station at St. Mary's. Here a Church was about to be formed, made up of converts from Romanism, of which he was to be the pastor, but while attending the annual meeting of the Lamoille Baptist Association at Hineburg, Sept. 18, 1850, he was seized with illness, and died Oct. 4 following. The only publications of special interest which were the product of his pen were a translation into French of Pengilly's Scripture Guide on Baptism, issued by the American Baptist Publication Society, and some other small works for the instruction and benefit of his fellow-countrymen. See English Baptist Magazine, 1851, p. 1. (J. C. S.)

Cotelle (de la Blundinière), Pierre Jacques, a French theologian, was born at Laval about 1709. He was at first rector of Soulaire, in Anjou, next vicar-general of Blois, and superior of the priests of Mt. Valerien. He added ten volumes to the Conférences Ecclésiastiques du Diocèse d'Angers of Bobin, in return for which the assembly of the clergy voted him an annual pension of one hundred pistoles. Moutrot has reproduced it in his Défense du Second Ordre. Cotelle died in 1795. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotereau (or Cottereau), Claude, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Tours in the 16th century. He entered holy orders, and became canon of Notre Dame at Paris, where he died about 1660. He was learned in philology and canon law, and left several minor treatises, for which see Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coterée, Jean, a French preacher, was born at Rheims, and lived in 1598. He received the degree of doctor of divinity from the Sorbonne, taught at Douay, and became canon of Tournay. He wrote seven volumes of French sermons, which were published from 1573 to 1598. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotes, Roger, a celebrated English divine, mathematician, philosopher, and astronomer, was born July 10, 1682, at Burbage, in Leicestershire, and educated at Leicester School, St. Paul's School, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees, and was chosen a fellow in 1705. In January, 1706, he was appointed professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy, took orders in 1718, and the same year published at Cambridge the second edition of sir Isaac Newton's Mathematica Principia. He left at his death some admirable tracts. He died June 5, 1716. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cothman, Johann, a German Protestant theologian, was born at Herford, Westphalia, in 1595, studied at Giessen and Rostock, was doctor and professor of theology at Wittenberg, and died at Rostock in 1650, leaving Dissertatio de Præsentia Corporis et Sanguinis Christi in Sacrosancta Eucharistia:—Destructio Fundamenti Papatus, contra Schillerum:—De Conjugio Comprigorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cothurno, Bartolommeo del, an Italian prelate and theologian, was born in the suburbs of Genoa, of a noble and wealthy family, which he abandoned in order to become a Franciscan. His merit raised him to the archbishopric of Genoa. Pope Urban VI appointed him, Sept. 16, 1378, cardinal-priest, with the title of Santo Lorenzo in Dumas. Some years after, Urban, then at war with the king of Naples, Charles Durazzo, feared a conspiracy among the cardinals who surrounded him, and at the denunciation of Prigiani, his nephew, Jan. 11, 1385, caused Cothurno to be arrested at Lucera, together with five other princes of the Church, and after cruelly torturing him, threw him into the sea, where he was drowned, in December, 1385. Cothurno wrote, Postilla Sermonum Sacrorum:—Com- mentaria Sopra Canticum Canticarum:—and some other religious works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cotignola, FRANCESCO DA (called Murchesi or Zanganello), an Italian painter, who resided chiefly at Parma, flourished about 1518, and studied under Rondinello. He painted a number of historical works for the churches, the best of which are The Raising of Lazarus, at Parma, and The Baptism of Christ, at Faenza. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cotignon, MICHKI, a French theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, was chief priest of Nevers, and wrote Catalogue Historial des Evêques de Nevers (Paris, 1616). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotin, CHARLES, a French preacher and writer, also counsellor and almoner of the king, was born in Paris in 1604. Being appointed in 1650 to the canonship of Bayeux, he took possession, but resigned it the following year. On May 3, 1655, he was made a member of the French Academy, and, although ridiculed by Boileau and Molière, was admitted to the best literary society of the day. He died in January, 1682. Some of his works are, Méditations sur les Leçons de Ténèbres, etc. (Paris, 1634):—La Vraie Philosophie des Principes du Monde (ibid. 1646):—Traité de l'Âme Immortelle (1655):—Poésies Chrésiennes (1657):—La Pastorale Sacrée (first in prose, then in verse; one of his most important works):—Œuvres Mêlées (1659). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Cotolendi, IGNACE, a French missionary and theologian, was born at Brignoles, March 24, 1630. He completed his studies at the college of the Jesuits at Aix, received the degree of doctor at Rome, returned to Aix, where he took the ecclesiastical habit, and was appointed rector of Sainte-Marguerite. He left this post in order to devote himself to missions, and on his return to Rome was appointed by pope Alexander VII preacher in the suburbs of Paris and, among other places, at Dreux. He became titular bishop of Metellopolis, and ad interim filled the episcopal see of Chartres. He then received letters giving him the authority of apostolic-vicar for the mission of Nankin, Northern China, Corea, and Tartary. He returned to Marseilles with three priests who were to be his companions; visited Malta, Alexandretta, Aleppo, and arrived at Mazulipatam; travelled through various parts of India, and introduced himself as a physician. This gained for him confidence, which aided him in his work as missionary, and he made numerous proselytes. But fatigue and change of climate were too much for his health, and he died at Palacol (East Indies), Aug. 10, 1662. His body was carried to Goa, where a monument was erected to his memory. He wrote, Vie de Saint-Gautier:—also additions to the Chroniques of Gautier, and several religious works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotron, VICTOR, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at Rheims in 1614. His diligence as a student reflected honor upon his order, and he wrote the history of several abbeys, especially those of St. Germain of Auxerre, and St. Benedict-on-the-Loire, which remain in MS. He died March 10, 1674, at the abbey of St. Riquier, of which he was prior. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotta was an Italian tunic of linen reaching to the knees. Ducange says it was a closed circular surplice.

Cotta, an abbot, attested a charter of Suaebræd, king of the East-Saxons, June 13, A.D. 704.

Cotta, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a German theologian, was born at Tübingen, May 12, 1701. He studied in his native city; went to Jena, where he was added to the faculty of philosophy in 1728; travelled through Germany, Holland, England, and France; on his return to Germany in 1734 was appointed titular professor of philosophy at Tübingen; in 1735 taught theology at Göttingen as fellow, and was titular professor of the Oriental languages; in 1739 returned to Tübingen, in order to teach theology, poetry, and philosophy; afterwards occupied other high positions as instructor; and died Dec. 31, 1779. His principal works are, Themata Miscellanea (Tübingen, 1718):—Allerneueste Historie der theologischen Gelehrsamkeit (ibid. 1722):—De Origine Mosæ (ibid. 1726):—De Probabilismo Morali (Jena, 1728):—Traité de la Probabilité (Rheims or Amsterdam, 1732):—De Fallibili Pontificis Romani Auctoritate (Leyden, ed.):—Flavii Josephi sämtliche Werke (Tübingen, 1735):—De Situ Inaugurationis apud Hebræos (ibid. 1737):—Ecclesiæ Romanæ de Attritione et Contritione Contentio (ibid. 1739):—De Constitutionibus Apostolicis (ibid. 1746):—De Cultu Adorationis (ibid. 1755):—De Jure Docendi in Conventibus Sacris (ibid. 1756):—De Constitutione Theologia (ibid. 1759):—De Variis Theologia Speciebus (ibid. ed.):—De Religione in Genere ac Speciatim Naturali (ibid. 1761):—De Religione Gentili (ibid. ed.):—De Religione Revelata (ibid. ed.):—De Religione Mahomedica (ibid. ed.):—De Vita Eterna (ibid. 1770). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.

Cotte, ROBERT DE, an eminent French architect, was born in Paris in 1657. He was appointed director of the Royal Academy of Architecture, and was vice-president of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture. He was greatly esteemed by Louis XIV, who made him a knight of the order of St. Michael. He died in 1735. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cotten, JAMES L., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Edgecombe County, N. C., June 1, 1817. He was remarkable in early life for his purity of character, tender sensibilities, and ardent feelings; developed rapidly in mental culture, and became a complete English scholar; experienced religion in his young manhood, and in 1845 entered the Alabama Conference; passed up through all the grades of circuit rider, station preacher, and presiding elder, until his death, in 1872 or 1873. Dr. Cotten possessed a powerful and well-cultured intellect, an imperial imagination, an unquenchable zeal, and an amiable disposition. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 827.

Cotter, ROBERT N., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hall County, Ga., April 11, 1826. He joined the Church in his seventeenth year, received a very limited education, was several years class-leader and exhorter, and finally, in 1854, entered the Georgia Conference. He continued his ministerial labors until his death, May 6, 1863. Mr. Cotter was a simple, earnest preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1863, p. 454.

Cottereau, CLAUDE. See COTTEREAU.

Cottereau (de Coudray), JEAN BAPTISTE ARMAND, a French theologian, was born at Tours, Jan. 25, 1697. He was curate of Donne-Marie-en-Montois, president of the ecclesiastical conferences, and a member of the academy of Villefranche. He died in 1770, leaving a few fugitive pieces, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotterel, ALKXIS FRANÇOIS, a French ecclesiastic, doctor of the Sorbonne, curate of Saint-Laurent of Paris, and royal censor, died at Paris, Feb. 5, 1775, leaving some discourses and dissertations, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cottides (or Quottidius), a deacon and martyr in Cappadocia, is commemorated Sept. 6.

Cotting, JOHN RUGGLES, M.D., LL.D., an American Congregational minister and physicist, was born in Acton, Mass., in 1784. He was educated at Harvard and the medical school of Dartmouth College; was ordained about 1810; became very noted for his manufacture of chemical compounds used in the war of 1812 by a company in Boston; was made professor of natural sciences in Amherst College at the close of the war, preaching meantime in the vicinity; subsequently became professor of chemistry in the Berkshire Medical Institute; in 1835 removed to Augusta, Ga.; entered upon a geological and agricultural survey, at first of Burke and Richland counties, then of the entire state; and finally retired to Milledgeville, where he spent his latter years, and died, Oct. 13, 1867. Dr. Cotting prepared text-books of ability and popularity on both chemistry and geology. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 580.

Cottingham, LEWIS NICHOLAS, a reputable English architect, was born in 1787, in Suffolk. He went to London, and was employed by a skilful architect and surveyor. He commenced his professional career in 1814. In 1822 he received his first public appointment as architect and surveyor to the Cook's Company; in 1825 was appointed architect of the cathedral at Rochester; in 1829 was the successful competitor for the restoration of the interior of the chapel of Magdalen College, Oxford; and in 1833 was intrusted with the restoration of St. Alban's abbey church. He was afterwards employed in the restoration of a number of churches and cathedrals in England and Ireland. He died about 1847.

Cotton, Bartholomew OF, a monk of Norwich, England, wrote: Annales Ecclesie Norwicensis, 1042-1235, et Historia de Episcopis Norw., ad an. 1299:—Accedunt Continuatio Historie ad an. 1446, et Successio Episcoporum et Priorum. See Wharton, Anglia Sacra; Allibone, Dictionary of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cotton, Henry, an English prelate of the first part of the 17th century, was born at Warblington, Hampshire, being a son of sir Richard Cotton, privy-councillor to Edward VI. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was preferred by Queen Elizabeth (his godmother) bishop of Salisbury, Nov. 12, 1598, at the same time that William Cotton, of another family, was made bishop of Exeter, the queen merrily saying that "she hoped that now she had well cottoned the vest." He died May 7, 1615. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 11.

Cotton, John (1), a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, March 13, 1640. He was pastor at Plymouth, Mass., from June 30, 1669, to Oct. 5, 1697; at Martha's Vineyard from 1664 to 1667; and at Charleston, S. C., from 1698 until his death, Sept. 18, 1699. He rendered great assistance to Thomas Mayhew, at Martha's Vineyard; frequently preached to the Indians at Plymouth, and revised and corrected Eliot's Indian Bible, printed at Cambridge in 1685. See Drake, Amer. Biog. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cotton, John (2), a Congregational minister, was born about 1693. He was pastor at Newton, Mass., and died in 1757. He published several Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cotton, John (3), a Congregational minister, was born about 1712, and was first pastor at Halifax, Mass. He died in 1789. He published two Sermons (1757). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cotton, John Wallace, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London, May 30, 1801. He was converted in early youth, joined the Wesleyans, became a local preacher, and an active worker in the City-road Circuit. At the request of Richard Watson, he offered himself to the Church for its ministry in 1827. He labored faithfully in his appointments, and was a painstaking and earnest preacher. In 1863 he retired to Lewisham, where he died, May 9, 1881. See Minutes of the Brit. Conferences, 1881, p. 43.

Cotton, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born at Derby, Feb. 24, 1810, and attended the preaching of the Rev. J. G. Pike, under whom he was converted and baptized. He studied for the ministry under the Rev. Thomas Stevenson, at Loughborough. He was successively pastor at Isleham, Barton, Holbeach, and Woodhouse Eaves, and in each place his earnest efforts to do good were greatly blessed. He died Nov. 19, 1868.

Cotton, Josiah, a Congregational minister, was a son of Rev. Roland Cotton, of Sandwich, Mass., and great-grandson of Rev. John Cotton, of Boston. He graduated from Harvard College in 1722; was ordained at Providence, R. I., Oct. 23, 1728; installed at Woburn, July 15, 1747; at Sardown, Nov. 28, 1759, and died May 27, 1780, aged seventy-eight years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 301.

Cotton (or Coton), Pierre, a French theologian, was born at Neronde, in Forez, in 1564. He studied in Paris and Bourges, went to Turin, and there joined the Jesuit order, against the wishes of his father. After staying some time at Milan, Rome, and other cities of Italy, he went to France, where he preached with success, was received at the court, and gained the confidence of Henry IV, whom he accompanied in his travels as confessor. Cotton refused the archbishopric of Arles and the cardinalate. At the time of the murder of Henry by Ravalliac, May 14, 1610, Cotton attempted to defend his order from the accusations made against them, by a work entitled Lettre Déclaratoire de la Doctrine des Pères Jésuites (Paris, 1610). When Albert of Luynes became strongly influential with Louis, Cotton retired from the court, and went to visit the house of the novices of his order at Lyons, where he remained for some time, and finally devoted himself to missionary work in the south of France and in Italy. At length he went to Paris, where he preached before the king. He died in that city, March 19, 1626. Besides the above, Cotton wrote: Institution Catholique, in opposition to Calvin's Institutions:—Genève Plagiate, against the Geneva Bible translation (Paris, 1618), which called forth a rejoinder by B. Turretin:—Défense de la Fidélité des Traductions de la Bible Fuites à Genève (Geneva, 1619):—Sermon aux les Principales et Plus Difficiles Matières de la Foi (Paris). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotton, Stephen, an English martyr, was one of six who were burned at Brentford, seven miles from London, July 14, 1558, for faithful adherence to Christ and his cause. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 479.

Cotton, Thomas, an English Presbyterian, born at Workby, near Rotherham, in 1658, was educated by four eminent tutors, and took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1677. Owing to the persecutions prevailing, Sunday service was long held in his father's house. He then travelled for three years with a gentleman on the Continent. On his return to London he was for a time a tutor, and chaplain to Lady Russell. He had a church in St. Giles parish for some years, but it suffered severely in the Sacheverel riots, in 1709, and he had to flee for safety. He was one of the non-subscribing members at the Salters' Hall synod, 1719. He died at Hampstead, in 1730, much loved and esteemed. He published one Sermon (1702). See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 376.

Cotton, Ward, a Congregational minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1793; was ordained pastor of the church in Boylston, June 7, 1797; dismissed June 22, 1825, and died in 1843. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 574.

Cotton, William, D.D., an English prelate of the first part of the 17th century, was born in London, educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, preferred by Elizabeth to be archdeacon of Lewes and canon residentiary of St. Paul's, and consecrated bishop of Exeter Nov. 12, 1598. He is credited by Fuller with having plucked up the seeds of nonconformity sowed in his diocese by Snape, of Jersey. He died of apoplexy, in 1621. He was father of Edward Cotton, D.D. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 358.

Cottret, Pierre Marie, a French prelate, was born at Argenteuil, near Paris, May 8, 1768. Having completed his classical studies at Sainte-Barbe, he entered the seminary of St. Louis of Paris, at the close of 1785. In April, 1791, he was called to the priesthood, privately ordained by the bishop of Orléans, and allowed to depart in disguise. He went to Ghent, where he remained as chaplain of the cathedral until June, 1794. Then, after taking refuge for some time in several cities of Germany, he resided at Fritzlau, and thence went to Arolsen as private tutor. After a prolonged sojourn at Frankfort-on-the-Main, he returned to France in October, 1800. In 1802 he was appointed to the chapel of Sannois, in the valley of Montmorency; in 1806 rector of Boissy-Sainte-Léger, and the year following returned to Paris. He now became connected with the Gazette de France and the Journal de l'Empire. He was appointed adjunct professor of the faculty of theology in 1809, honorary canon of Notre-Dame of Paris, and vice-promoter-general of the diocese, in 1811; was invested with a canonship in 1812; later was placed at the head of the small seminary of Paris. In 1823 he accompanied cardinal Clermont-Tonnerre to Rome. Leo XII appointed him titular bishop of Carystus, and canon of the first order of the chapter of St. Denis. He retired to the diocese of Versailles, and was thence appointed to the see of Beauvais, Dec. 27, 1837. He died at Beauvais, Nov. 13, 1841. Besides his work for the Gazette de France and the Biographie Universelle of the Michaud brothers, Cottret wrote, from 1822 to 1827, a number of articles upon literary and religious matters in the Tablettes du Clergé, and the Union Ecclesiastique published several letters of this prelate. He also wrote: Considérations sur l'état actuel de la Religion Catholique en France et sur les Moyens de la Rétablir (Paris, 1815);—Discours sur la Religion Considérée comme une Nécessité de la Société (1823);—also an edition of the Déclaration du Clergé de France de 1682 (Paris, 1811). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotarius, Julius Cæsar, a German theologian of the Jesuit order, who lived near the latter half of the 17th century, wrote, Epitome Controversiarum (Munich, 1648);—An Quicquid in sua Fide Salvari Possit (Meissen, 1645). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cotys (or Cotytyo), in Greek mythology, was a Thracian goddess, whose worship, like that of Cybele, was held with noise and tumult, and led finally to licentiousness. In later times she was also honored in Corinth, Athens, and Sicily.

Couard, Christian Ludwig, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Berlin, April 11, 1793, became doctor of theology and pastor of St. Georges, in the same city, and died there, Dec. 23, 1865. He published, Predigten über gewöhnliche Perikopen und Freie Texte (Berlin, 1824; 3d ed. 1851);—Der verkorene Sohn, (ibid. 1831);—Predigten über die Bekehrung des Apostels Paulus (ibid. 1833);—Simon Petrus, der Apostel des Herrn (ibid. 1836, 2 vols.);—Sammlung von Causalreden aus früherer und neuester Zeit (Potsdam, 1836, 1858, 2 vols.);—Evangelische Zeugnisse in Predigten (ibid. 1855–60, 3 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 27, 101, 120, 121, 146; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 247. (B. P.)

Couch, Ezekiel, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Pendleton District, S. C., Nov. 1, 1805. He was converted in 1824; licensed to preach in 1836; joined the Memphis Conference in 1840; was ordained deacon in 1841, and elder in 1843. In 1847 he was transferred to the Indian Mission Conference; from 1855 to 1857 was superintendent of the Colbert Institute in the Chickasaw Nation; in 1857 was transferred to the East Texas Conference; in 1864 was a supernumerary, but was made effective the following year; from 1866 to 1871 was superannuated; again made effective in 1872, but at the end of the year was obliged again to take a superannuated relation, in which he continued until his death in 1880. He was a consecrated, zealous, and faithful minister, kind and cordial. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 203.

Couché, Marc, a French theologian, was born at Besançon. He entered the Benedictine order of St. Vanne at Luxeuil, June 10, 1633, then taught theology, and became prior of Mont-Roland. He died about 1751, leaving, Précipue d'une Religieuse;—Commentaria Theologica in Summam Divi Thomæ;—Defensio Decretorum Pontificiorum circa Regulas Morum;—Philosophia cum Theologia Christiana Connexio;—Ad Prolegomena Sanctæ Scripturæ Brevis Manuductio;—Apologeticæ Principia;—Le Vrai Centon Théologique Opposé au Faux;—L'Art de Vivre Heureux dans une Communauté Religieuse, and some treatises upon questions of the time, remaining in MS. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coucher is a name for (1) a register or account book; (2) a church book couched, or lying, on the chancel desk. See COLLECTARIUM.

Coucy, Jean Charles, comte de, a French theologian and prelate, was born at the castle of Escorial (Rethelois), Sept. 23, 1745. He was successively vicar-general of Rheims, canon of that city (1778), almoner of the queen (1776), abbot of Iny (1777), and bishop of La Rochelle (Jan. 3, 1790). Under the Revolution he retired to Spain, but on the return of the Bourbons he was made archbishop of Rheims (1817), where he died, March 10, 1824. He wrote a Protestation Adressée à Pie VII (1802). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coucy, Robert de, a French architect, who died at Rheims about 1300, had chief charge of the rebuilding of the cathedral of that city, which had been destroyed by fire in 1210. In 1297 he completed the ornamentation of the Church of St. Nicaise. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coudon, Joseph, A.M., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a native of Annapolis, Md. He became lay reader in North Elk Parish in 1782, having previously been principal of the Free School in Kent County, which, in 1783, became Washington College. As a lay member of the convention of the diocese he was prominent in organizing the Protestant Episcopal Church, after the Revolution. In 1787 he was ordained deacon, at the age of forty-five, became rector of North Elk Parish, and died there in April, 1792. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 312.

Coudrette, Christoph, a learned French publicist, was born at Paris in 1701, became a priest in 1725, and joined the Jesuits. He was, however, an opponent of the bull Unigenitus, and being persecuted by the clerical party, was imprisoned in 1785 at Vincennes, and again in 1788, in the Bastille. Being noted for his opposition to the Jesuits, he was appointed in 1762 to examine their institutions and affairs. He died at Paris, Aug. 4, 1774, leaving, among other works, Dissertation sur les Bulles Contre Baius (Utrecht, 1737, 2 vols.);—Histoire Générale de la Compagnie de Jésus (Amsterdam, 1761–67, 6 vols.). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Nouv. Diction. Historique; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 649, 722; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Couet (Lat. Covetus), JACQUES, a French Reformed theologian, was born at Paris in 1546. Being an adherent of the Reformed Church, he had to leave his country, and on his way to Basle in 1577 held a controversy with Faustus Socinus, against whom he wrote his De Satisfactione Christi. In 1588 he was appointed pastor of the French Church at Basle, where he died, Jan. 18, 1608. Besides the work already mentioned, he wrote, Réponse à Ceux qui Croient Présence du Corps de Christ dans la Cène (1588):—Réponses Chrétiennes à Lescalle (1598):—Apologia de Justificatione (1594):—Traité de la Prédication (1599):—Conférence Faite à Nancy (1600):—Traité du Christianisme (1602). See Haug, France Protestante; Bulletin du Protestantisme Français, xii, 265 sq.; xvi, 353 sq.; Chrétien Evangelique, 1868, p. 135-140; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Coughen, JOHN, an English theologian, became a Quaker on hearing an eloquent young woman of that denomination, and afterwards defended their doctrines. He died of the plague in London in 1665. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coughlan, LAWRENCE, an early Methodist preacher, was a native of Ireland, one of the first-fruits of Methodism in that country. He was received on trial by Wesley in 1755, and labored successfully for ten years, when in consequence of having been ordained in 1764 by Erasmus, a Greek bishop, he withdrew from the itinerancy, Charles Wesley taking deep umbrage at such a proceeding. In 1765 he sailed as a missionary to Newfoundland, a year before Philip Embury arrived in New York, and labored there with zeal and success under the auspices of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, having received reordination from the bishop of London, but still as a Methodist. He formed classes, the first before the close of 1765, and the earliest Methodist society on the west of the Atlantic. On his return, in 1773, to London, Coughlan was minister of the Cumberland Street Chapel, but applied to Wesley for a circuit. While in conversation with the latter in his study, he was seized with paralysis, and died a few days after. Wesley refers to his death in a letter written to John Stretton, of Harbor-Grace, Newfoundland, dated Feb. 25, 1785 (Meth. Mag. 1824, p. 307). Coughlan published, in 1776, a book entitled, Brief Account of the Work of God in Newfoundland. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 329; Myles, Chron. Hist. of the Methodists, 1783, p. 169; Arminian (Wesl. Meth.) Mag. 1785, p. 490; Wilson, Newfoundland and its Missionaries, p. 123, 134, 141; Smith, Hist. of Meth. in Eastern British America (Halifax, 1877, 12mo), p. 41-58; Wesley, Journal, Aug. 1768, iii, 324; also Reports of Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1767 sq.

Couillon (Lat. Corillonus), JEAN, a Jesuit of Lille, and professor of philosophy and theology at Coimbra, Rome, and Ingolstadt, who died at Rome Aug. 17, 1581, is the author of Assertiones in Epistolam Primam Pauli ad Corinthios:—Conclusiones ex hac Epistola Deductæ:—Questiones in Psalmos. See Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Coulan, ANTOINE, a French theologian, was born at Alais, Languedoc, Oct. 10, 1667. He was minister of a French Church in London, where he died, Sept. 23, 1694, leaving, Examen de l'Histoire Critique du Nouveau Testament (in two parts, Amsterdam, 1696):—La Défense des Réfugiés (Deventer, 1691). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coall, ALEXANDER, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1749; presented to the living at Edenkeil in 1753, ordained in 1754, and died July 10, 1790. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 184.

Coalling, JAMES D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Richmond, Va., May 20, 1812. He was converted in his eighteenth year; soon became an earnest Christian worker as Sabbath-school teacher and class-leader; began preaching in 1835; and in the following year entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and faithfulness until his death, Nov. 28, 1866. Honest conscientiousness and earnest fidelity were the prominent features of his character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 8.

Coulon, CLAUDE ANTOINE, a French preacher and theologian, was born at Salins in 1745. He became a priest, went to Paris, and was chosen grand-vicar by the bishop of Sisteron. He retired during the Revolution, but returned with the Bourbons, and died at Paris, March 10, 1820, leaving Exhortation à la Persévérance dans la Foi (Paris, 1792):—Paraphrase du Psaume, "Exaudiat te Dominus" (Lond. 1799), and some minor Letters and Addresses. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coulson, DAVID, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Nottingham, April 9, 1713. He was converted in his twenty-sixth year. Some time before this he had become blind; but, nevertheless, about his thirty-third year he visited and preached in all the counties of England except Kent and Sussex. He never met with any fall or accident to lay him up one day in all his travels. He died Dec. 9, 1765. See Piety Promoted, ii, 414. (J. C. S.)

Coulson, GEORGE J. A., a preacher and novelist, was born in the South in 1819, but came North at the commencement of the late civil war. For a long time he occupied a position at the head of one of the departments in A. T. Stewart's store. Latterly he had been an expert accountant and commercial referee. For many years he was a contributor to religious papers, being an influential member of the Presbyterian Church South, and a diligent theological student. For several months previous to his death he preached in the New East Side Chapel, Paterson, N. J. He died there suddenly, Oct. 27, 1882. Mr. Coulson was the author of The Lacy Diamond:—The Odd Trump:—Harwood:—Flesh and Spirit:—The Ghost of Redbrook, and other novels. (W. P. S.)

Coulston, THOMAS, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Dunfermline, was licensed to preach in 1795; presented to the living at Pennycook in 1798; ordained in 1799; and died March 13, 1829, aged sixty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 806.

Coultas, JOSEPH, an English Methodist preacher, grandson of the following, was born at York, June 14, 1821. He was brought up a Wesleyan; toiled successfully in the Sunday-school for some years; became a local preacher at twenty; joined the New Connection in 1850; entered the ministry in 1858; and travelled for twenty-one years in thirteen circuits. In 1875 he was attacked with cerebral disease, of which he died at Sheffield, Nov. 30, 1878. He was a student, a plain preacher, gentle, thoughtful, trustful, and tranquil. See Minutes of the Conference.

Coultas, WILLIAM, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Seamer, Yorkshire, Aug. 22, 1783. He united with the Church in 1801, was received into the ministry in 1810, and sent to Nevis, W. I., where he labored for six years amid much persecution from the planters. He returned to England in 1817; spent the rest of his life in the ministry in his native land; retired to Southport in 1850; and died Aug. 19, 1866. Mr. Coultas had a resolute will, strong passions, controlled by grace; his manner was rugged, his heart honest, and his life-long fidelity to Christ might well throw into the background his eccentricities. He wrote a Memoir of his daughter, Eliza (12mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 10; Wesl. Meth. Magazine, 1868, p. 961.

Coulter, DAVID, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Nov. 8, 1808, near Georgetown, Sussex Co., Del. He early experienced conversion, and united with the Church when about seventeen years of age. After obtaining a good English education in the common schools of his neighborhood, he went to Easton, Pa., and was prepared for college in the Manual Labor School, taught by the Rev. George Junkin, D.D. He graduated from Lafayette College in 1838, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1841; was licensed to preach by Newton Presbytery, April 28, the same year; soon after went to Missouri, where, for about two years, he preached at Auxvasse. He was ordained by Missouri Presbytery, July 5, 1843, pastor of the Rocheport and Fayette churches, where he labored zealously and usefully until Aug. 18, 1848; next acted as stated supply at Round Prairie and Millersburg, and pastor of the latter Church from December 10, 1853, to April 8, 1856; and of Hopewell Church, in Lafayette Presbytery, from April 22, 1856, to April 20, 1867, at the same time serving Prairie Church. After preaching at Columbia, Mo., a little over a year, he served the churches of Liberty and Bethel from 1868 to 1874. He was now quite infirm, and at length entirely unable to read; but he tried to preach even to the last. He died at Liberty, Aug. 20, 1878. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 42.

Coulter, John (1), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1761; became assistant minister at Kilwinning; was presented to the living at Kirkmaiden in 1763; obtained in 1764; transferred to Stranraer in 1772; and died Feb. 16, 1814, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 752, 762.

Coulter, John (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born near Sunbury, Pa., June 26, 1784. He entered Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in 1813; studied theology with Dr. McMillan; was licensed by the Ohio Presbytery; and in 1823 became pastor at Muddy Creek, Butler Co., Pa., where he remained for twenty-seven years. He was installed pastor at Sunbury in his seventy-eighth year, and died in Butler County, Dec. 6, 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 81.

Coulthurst, Henry William, D.D., an English divine, was born in Barbadoes in 1753. He was educated in England, first at Hipperholme, and afterwards at St. John's College, Cambridge; graduating in 1775, and soon after obtained one of Dr. Smith's prizes for his proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy. In 1777 he obtained a prize for a dissertation in Latin prose. He was afterwards elected a fellow of Sydney College, held the office of moderator in the years 1784 and 1785, and in the latter part of his residence in the university was tutor of his college. In December, 1790, he became vicar of Halifax. He died suddenly, Dec. 11, 1817. Dr. Coulthurst was a benevolent man, a pious Christian, a zealous minister. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, 1817, appendix, p. 869.

Counter-remonstrance of Calvinists to the States-General. See REMONSTRANCE.

Coupar, William, a Scotch prelate, was born in 1566 at Edinburgh, and took the degree of master of arts at St. Andrews in 1582. He was licensed to preach in 1586, and entered into the ministry at Bothkennar, Stirling, in the same year. In 1592 he was removed to the town of Perth. He was promoted to the see of Galloway July 31, 1614, where he remained until his death, Feb. 15, 1619. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 280.

Couppé (or Couppé), Daniel, a Protestant theologian, who lived in the early part of the 17th century, wrote, Traité des Miracles, contre Bellarmin (Rotterdam, 1645). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, & c.

Couper is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. JAMES, D.D., was licensed to preach in 1780; presented to the living at Baldernock in 1782; ordained in 1783; elected professor of practical astronomy in Glasgow University; resumed his charge in 1803; and died in January, 1836, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 844.

2. JOHN (1), son of the minister at Kinfauna, was appointed to the second charge at Brechin in 1724, and ordained; transferred to the first charge in 1731; retired from public duty in 1746, having his charge supplied till 1764 by unordained assistants; and died Jan. 21, 1774, aged seventy-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 845.

3. JOHN (2), was licensed to preach in 1787; called to the living at Lochwinnoch in 1750, and ordained. He died Dec. 19, 1787, aged eighty years. He was an excellent scholar, of irreproachable character, and the only minister of his parish of the moderate party in Church politics. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 225.

4. MATTHEW, studied at the Glasgow University; held a bursary in theology there in 1676; became a schoolmaster at Mauchline, and afterwards at Ochiltree; was called to the living at Lilliesleaf in 1691; transferred to Ochiltree in 1695, thence to Kinfauna in 1700; and died Feb. 13, 1712, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 554; ii, 134, 646.

5. PATRICK, was born at Scone in 1660; took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1678; in 1679 was taken prisoner at Perth as a rebel; imprisoned and fined five or six times for nonconformity and attending field preaching; fled to Scotland; preached at Amsterdam in 1684; after several years of foreign travel, peril, and shipwreck, returned to Scotland; was appointed minister at St. Ninian's, Stirling, in 1688; was member of the assemblies of 1690 and 1692; accepted the living at Pittenweem in 1692, although much opposed; and died June 14, 1740. He was a small, thin, spare man, generous and kind; and was the first to propose a fund for ministers' widows, in 1716. He published, On Public Oaths (1704);—Jacobite Loyalty (1724);—a Sermon (1725). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 456, 710.

6. ROBERT (1), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1622; was called to the living at Temple in 1632; and died in 1655. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 307.

7. ROBERT (2), was born at Clary; presented to the living at Kirkmaiden, as assistant and successor, in 1800; was only three times in the pulpit, for he died at Clary, July 30, 1801, aged twenty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 762.

8. SIMON, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1687; was appointed to the living at Kirkcudbright in 1678; transferred to the Second Church, Dunfermline, in 1682, and to the First Church in 1686; was charged in 1689 with not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty, but was acquitted; was deposed in 1698 for contumacy and contempt of the authority of the Presbytery, and ordered to leave the Church in 1696. He died at Edinburgh, Sept. 20, 1710, aged about sixty-four years. He published, An Impartial Inquiry into the Order and Government in the Church (Edinb. 1704). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 689; ii, 568-571.

9. THOMAS, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1625; was licensed to preach in 1627; admitted to the living at Saline in 1634; transferred to Menmuir in 1639; thence to Montrose, in 1642; and died in 1661, aged about fifty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 602; iii, 841, 844.

Couplet, Philippe, a Belgian missionary, was born at Malines about 1628. He entered the Jesuit order, and in 1659 departed for the mission-field of China. He returned to Europe in 1680, and in 1692 started to return to China, but was overtaken by a violent tempest, and perished. He wrote, Confucius Sinarum Philosophus (Paris, 1687), containing a summary of the theology, history, and customs of the Chinese, with a translation of three works of Confucius; Ta-Hio (grand science), Chong-Yung (the just man), Lun-Fu (the book of sentences), a life of Confucius, and the Chinese annals back to 2952 B.C. Couplet also wrote, Catalogus PP. Societatis Jesu, etc. (Paris, 1686):—Historia Candida Iliu (translated into French, Paris, 1688; also in Spanish, at Madrid, and in Flemish, at Antwerp). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Courage is that quality of the mind that enables men to encounter difficulties and dangers. Natural courage is that which arises chiefly from constitution; moral or spiritual is that which is produced from principle, or a sense of duty. Courage and fortitude are often used as synonymous, but they may be distinguished thus: fortitude is firmness of mind that supports pain; courage is active fortitude, that meets dangers, and attempts to repel them. See FORTITUDE. Courage, says Addison, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgment or discretion; but that courage which arises from a sense of duty, and from a fear of offending Him that made us, always acts in a uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason.

Courbeville, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS DE, a French Jesuit, who lived in 1740, wrote a large number of works on practical piety, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Courcelles, Étienne de. See CURCELLÆUS.

Courcelles, Thomas de, a French theologian, was born in 1400, of a noble family of Picardy, and studied at the University of Paris. In 1431 he was canon of Amiens, of Laon, of Therouanne, and bachelier formé of theology, and already a very eminent preacher. He was successively sent to councils or congresses at Basle, Bourges, Prague, Rome, and Mantua. In 1440 he refused the cardinalate offered to him by the antipope, Felix V. He was one of the most able defenders of the liberties of the Gallican Church. In 1447, and years following, he was part of the embassy which determined the fate of the pontifical schism. Having become doctor of theology, he was, in 1450, appointed rector of St. Andrew's, Paris, afterwards canon, penitentiary, and dean of the cathedral. In 1461 he pronounced the funeral oration of Charles VII. Being proviseur of the Sorbonne, he was the same year delegated by the pope, with the bishop of Paris, to proceed to the reformation of the order of Fontevault. Thomas de Courcelles is especially noticeable in history by the part, although secondary, which he played in the condemnation of Joan of Arc. He died Oct. 23, 1469. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Courier, ECCLESIASTICAL. See CURSOR.

Couronne, MATHIEU DE, a French theologian, who lived in the middle of the 17th century, wrote, Traité de l'Infaillibilité du Pape (Liege, 1668):—De la Puissance Temporelle et Spirituelle des Evêques (ibid. 1671, 1673):—Des Missions Apostoliques (ibid. 1675). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Court of High Commission. See HIGH COMMISSION, COURT OF.

COURT, SPIRITUAL, in English ecclesiastical usage, is one for the administration of ecclesiastical justice. Until the time of William the Conqueror the court for the consideration of ecclesiastical and temporal matters was one and the same; but at that period a separation took place. There are six such courts:

1. The Archdeacon's Court, which is the lowest, and is held where the archdeacon, either by prescription or composition, has jurisdiction in spiritual or ecclesiastical causes within his archdeaconry. The judge of this court is called the official of the archdeaconry.

2. The Consistory Courts of the archbishops and bishops of every diocese are held in their cathedral churches, for trial of all ecclesiastical causes within the diocese. The bishop's chancellor or commissary is the judge.

XII. 5*

3. The Prerogative Court is held at Doctors' Commons, in London, in which all testaments and last wills are proved, and administrations upon the estates of intestates granted, where the party dies beyond seas or within his province, leaving bona notabilia.

4. The Arches Court (so called because anciently held in the archched church of St. Mary, in Cheapside, London) is that which has jurisdiction upon appeal in all ecclesiastical causes, except such as belong to the Prerogative Court. The judge is the official principal of the archbishop. See ARCHES, COURT OF.

5. The Court of Peculiars, of the archbishop of Canterbury, is subservient to, and in connection with, that of the Arches.

6. The Court of Delegates is so called because the judges are delegated and set in virtue of the king's commission, under the great seal, pro hac vice, upon appeals to the king on ecclesiastical matters.

These courts proceed according to the civil and canon laws, by citation, libel, or articles, answer upon oath, proofs by witnesses and presumptions, definitive sentence without a jury, and by excommunication for contempt of sentence. In times of intolerance many acts of the most cruel enormity were committed in these courts.

Court, Pierre, a French theologian, was born at Provins in 1665. He took the Benedictine habit in the congregation of St. Vanne, June 1, 1685, became prior of Airy, and died in 1730, leaving Vie de M. d'Aligre (Paris, 1712):—Abbrégé du Commentaire de Culnet (7 or 8 vols.):—Paraphrases sur le Cantique des Cantiques et sur la Prose des Morts "Dies Ira":—Recueil de Sequences, Proses Anciennes ou Cantiques:—Concordia Discordantium Theologorum, etc.:—Histoire de l'Abbaye de Saint-Vanne de Verdun, and other pieces. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Court, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, was born at Muthill, April 18, 1790; licensed to preach in 1815; became assistant minister at Yester, and afterwards at Cranston; ordained in 1831 minister to the Presbyterian Congregation at Maryport; presented to the living at Heriot in 1834; joined the Free Secession in 1843; became minister of the Free Church at Pathhead the same year, and resigned in 1866. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 284.

Courte-cuisse, JEAN DE (Lat. Johannes de Bre-ricozu, also de Curtacoza, or de Cortohosu), a French prelate and theologian, was born at Hallaines, in the Passais (Maine), about 1350. He was educated at the College of Navarre, in Paris, made doctor in 1388, chancellor of the university in 1418, bishop of Paris in 1420, and died at Geneva in 1425. Living at a time when the question of papal schism was rife, he wrote several controversial tracts and sermons, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Courtenay, Henry Reginald, D.D., an English prelate, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford; became chaplain to the king, prebendary of Exeter in 1772, rector of St. George's, Hanover Square, in 1774, of Lee (in Kent), in 1775, and prebendary of St. Andrew, in the cathedral of Rochester, in 1783. He was consecrated bishop of Bristol, May 11, 1794, and translated to the see of Exeter in 1797. He died June 9, 1803. He published a Fast Sermon (1795):—and a Charge (1796). See Le Neve, Fasti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; (Lond.) Annual Register, 1803, p. 510.

Courtenay, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1685; and presented to the living at Bolton in 1640. He deserted his charge at Whitsunday, 1661, and went to Ireland. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 322.

Courtenay (or Courtney), William, an English prelate, was born in the parish of St. Martin's, a suburb of the city of Exeter, about 1842, and was educated in his father's house until he was sent to the University of Oxford. In 1367, after having completed his collegiate course, he was elected chancellor of the university. In 1369 his friends succeeded in obtaining for him the bishopric of Hereford, and his consecration appears to have taken place March 17. He was enthroned Sept. 5, 1370, and translated to the see of Canterbury in 1375. He labored for the improvement of the church edifices, and gave liberal sums himself for that object. He died July 31, 1396. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iv, 316 sq.

Courtenay, William A., an English Congregational minister, was born at Falmouth, Dec. 24, 1826. He united with the Church at an early age; entered Hackney College in 1849, and began his ministry at Kelvedon, Essex, in 1852. He afterwards labored successively at North Walsham, Norfolk; at Mile End; at Wardour-street Chapel, Soho; and at the Royal Amphitheatre, Holborn. He died June 9, 1873. See (Lond) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 320.

Courtice, William, an English Methodist preacher, was born at North Devon in 1796. He led a wicked life in his youth; heard Mr. O'Bryan preach in 1815; gave his heart to God and his service to the Bible Christians; entered the ministry in 1820, as a supply for James Thorne, and for more than forty years was one of the most able and successful ministers in the connection, filling some of the highest offices. In 1862 he became a supernumerary, and died suddenly at Devonport, Jan. 2, 1866. See Minutes of the Conference, 1866.

Courtie, David, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1601; was presented by the king to the living at Stichel in 1613, and died April 29, 1655, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 474.

Courties, John, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to Sierra Leone in 1826. After successfully completing his term of service, he sailed for his native country, but died on the passage, in 1829. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1829.

Courtney, Ezra, a Baptist pioneer preacher, was born in Pennsylvania in 1771. He began to preach in the eastern part of the state in 1804, and, after itinerating some years, he became, in 1814, a resident in East Feliciana Parish, La. He died in 1855. He was an efficient and popular preacher, and was often elected moderator of the Mississippi Association, and other bodies of which he was a member. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 282. (J. C. S.)

Courtney, John, a Baptist minister, was born in King and Queen County, Va., about 1744. He began his ministry at Richmond, and served the Church over forty years. He died Dec. 18, 1824. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 291; Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 99.

Courtney, Peter, LL.D., an English prelate of the 15th century, was born at Powderham, Devonshire. He was preferred dean of Windsor in 1476, bishop of Exeter in 1478, translated to Winchester in 1487, and died Sept. 22, 1492. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 407; Le Neve, Fasti.

Courtney, Richard, an English prelate, a relative of William Courtenay, archbishop of Canterbury, was a man of good lineage and no less learning. He was preferred precentor at Chichester in 1400, dean of St. Asaph in 1402, prebend of York in 1403, dean of Wells in 1410, chancellor of Oxford in 1411, bishop of Norwich in 1413, and died at the siege of Harfleur, Normandy, in the second year of his consecration, and was buried in Westminster. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 405; Le Neve, Fasti.

Courtney, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1636; was admitted to the living at Merton in 1640; was minister at Kirk-Andrews, in England, in 1661; returned to Scotland in 1663, and was elected one of the ministers at Edinburgh the same year, but did not accept. He is recorded as having possession of the Kirk lands of Home in 1668. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 530.

Courtot, Jean, a French theologian, was born at Arnay-le-Duc. He entered the congregation of the Oratory in 1632, and was distinguished for ill-will towards the Jesuits. Bourgoing, general of the Oratorians, banished him to Joyeuse, and he was finally excluded from the Oratory in 1652. He died in 1665, leaving, Manuale Catholicorum (Paris, 1651), under the name of Alytophile; republished, with numerous additions (ibid. 1663); condemned in 1664 and burned:—and several controversial pieces, mostly under the pseudonym of Jean Cordier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Courts, Church, among the Presbyterians, are those ecclesiastical associations of ministers and elders, consisting of sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the general assembly, which in Scotland are considered as forming the perfection of Church government and discipline. Each subordinate court takes cognizance of ecclesiastical matters within its own bounds; and from each there is an appeal to that which is above it in order, till the matter is carried before the general assembly, which is the supreme court, and the decision of which is final.

COURTS OF LAW, HEBREW. See JUDICIAL PROCEDURE.

Cousin (Lat. Cognatus), Gilbert, a French theological author, was born at Nozeroy, Franche-Comté, Jan. 21, 1506. He studied jurisprudence at Dôle in 1526, but soon afterwards devoted himself to the ecclesiastical calling. In 1530 he became copyist to Erasmus, who regarded him as a companion in labor, and aided him in studying Greek, Latin, and belles-lettres. In 1535 Cousin was appointed canon of St. Anthony of Nozeroy, and at the same time devoted himself to teaching. In 1558 he went to Italy with Claude La Baume, archbishop of Besançon, and remained for some time at Padua. On his return to France, Cousin embraced Protestant sentiments. Pope Pius V ordered his arrest for heresy, July 8, 1567. He was taken to the ecclesiastical prison, and died in the same year. His numerous works have been collected and published. A complete catalogue may be seen in Nicéron. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cousin, Jean (1), a French painter, was born at Soucy, near Sens, about 1501, and was the founder of a French school. He died about 1590. His principal historical work, representing The Last Judgment, was formerly in the monastery of the Minims at Vincennes, the windows of which were also painted by him. The best of his works are on glass, in the Church of St. Gervais at Paris. They represent Christ with the Woman of Samaria, Christ Curing the Paralytic, and the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cousin (Lat. Cognatus), Jean (2), a Belgian religious historian, was born at Tournay, where he was afterwards canon, and where he died in 1621. He wrote, De Fundamentis Religionis, containing the following discourses: De Naturali Dei Cognitione; De Immortalitate Animæ; De Justitia Dei (Douay, 1697):—De Prosperitate et Eritio Solomonis (ibid. 1599):—Histoire de Tournay (ibid. 1619, 1620):—Histoire des Saints de Tournay (ibid. 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cousin, Louis, a French writer, was born at Paris, Aug. 12, 1627. He became bachelor of theology at Paris, advocate in 1646, and president of one of the lower courts in October, 1659. He was made member of the French Academy June 15, 1697, chosen royal censor, and charged with the compilation of the Journal des Savants from 1687 to 1702. He studied Hebrew at the age of seventy, in order to understand more fully the sacred Scriptures. Nicéron says that he was a man of high integrity, of an admirable spirit of justness, correct judgment, easy and agreeable in conversation. He died Feb. 26, 1707. He devoted his spare time to the translation of works of the ancient ecclesiastical historians, and published several volumes, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cousin, Michael, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Haworth, Yorkshire, March 20, 1782. He united with the Church in 1802, was appointed to a circuit in 1804, became a supernumerary in Halifax in 1846, and died Nov. 6, 1852. With a vigorous frame, he gave himself with devout ardor to his work, and success resulted from his labors. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1853.

Cousins, MARRIAGE OF. The course of Church practice on this subject appears to have been this: the traditional Roman prejudice against cousins' marriages, although quite uncountenanced by the Jewish law or practice, commended itself instinctively to the ascetic tendencies of the Western fathers, and through them took root among the Western clergy generally, embodying itself, indeed, temporarily, towards the end of the 4th century, in a general civil law for the Roman empire. But while this law was abrogated in the beginning of the 5th century, and in the East such unions remained perfectly lawful both in the Church and in the State throughout nearly the whole of the period which occupies us, never being condemned by any œcumenical council till that of Constantinople towards the end of the 7th century, in the West the clergy adhered to the harsher view; popes and local synods sought to enforce it; wherever clerical influence could be brought to bear on the barbaric legislators it became apparent: till at last, under the Carolingian princes, it established itself as a law alike of the State and of the Church. But the history of this restraint upon marriage is that of all others not derived from Scripture itself. Originating probably, all of them, in a sincere though mistaken asceticism, they were soon discovered to furnish an almost inexhaustible mine for the supply of the Church's coffers, through the grant of dispensations, prosecutions in the Church courts, compromises. The baleful alliance between Carolingian usurpation and Romish priestcraft, in exchange for the subservience of the clergy to the ambition and the vices of the earlier despots, delivered over the social morality of the people to them, it may be said, as prey, and the savageness of Carolingian civil legislation was placed at the service of the newfangled Church discipline of the West. See AFFINITY; MARRIAGE.

Cousins, James, an English Baptist minister, was born at Freystrope, near Haverford-West, in 1788. He was converted at the age of seventeen, studied at Bristol College, and in 1818 became pastor at Kingston, Gloucestershire, where he had great success. He retired in 1843, but continued to preach in various places in the neighborhood until his death, Feb. 17, 1862. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1863, p. 118. (J. C. S.)

Cousins, Jonathan, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his itinerancy in 1780, and died at Diss, near Norwich (where he also began his ministry), Oct. 31, 1805, aged forty-nine. He was a man of mild temper and much esteemed by his people. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1806.

Coussard, CLAUDE, a French theologian, of the 16th century, wrote Valdenism ac Quorundam Aliorum Errorum (Paris, 1548; also in French, by Cappell, Sedan, 1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Constant, PIERRE, a learned French Benedictine of the order of St. Maur, was born at Compiègne, April 30, 1654, and died at Paris, Oct. 18, 1721, while dean of the abbey of St. Germain-des-Près, leaving several editions of the works of Church fathers and others, for which see Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Coustou, Guillaume, the Elder, a reputable French sculptor, the brother of Nicolas, was born at Lyons in 1678, studied under Coysevox, and soon gained the prize of the Academy. His reputation rapidly increased. Some of his works are, Christ in the Midst of the Doctors, at Versailles, and some Portraits. He died at Paris, Feb. 22, 1746. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Coustou, Guillaume, the Younger, a French sculptor, son and scholar of the foregoing, was born at Paris in 1716. Having carried off the grand prize of the Academy, he went to Italy with the royal pension. In 1742 he was elected an academician, in 1746 was appointed professor of sculpture, and the king named him keeper of the sculptures in the Louvre. He died at Paris, July 18, 1777. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Coustou, Nicolas, an ingenious French sculptor, was born at Lyons, Jan. 9, 1658. He studied at Paris under his uncle, Coysevox, and carried off the grand prize of the Royal Academy at the age of twenty-three; then he went to Rome and studied the works of Michael Angelo. In 1693 he was received into the Academy at Paris. The following are some of his works: The Descent from the Cross, and the statue of St. Denis, in the Church of Notre Dame. He died at Paris, Feb. 1, 1733. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cousturier. See COUTURIER.

Coutinho, LUIS, a Portuguese prelate, was born near the close of the 14th century. He was made bishop of Viseu about 1440, and sent by Alfonso V as ambassador to Rome, where he assisted in the election of the antipope Felix V. Under the influence of this illegitimate authority he was made cardinal in 1443. He became bishop of Coimbra, and accompanied the daughter of king Edward when she went to Germany to marry the emperor Frederick III. Having been promoted to the archbishopric of Lisbon in 1452, but not sharing the favor of Alfonso, he retired from court, and withdrew into the solitude of Cintra to seek relief from leprosy, with which, it is said, he was attacked. He died at Cintra in April, 1453, and was interred in the cemetery of the lepers, where a splendid monument was erected to his memory. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Couto (Lat. Coutus), SEBASTIÃO DO, a Portuguese theologian, was born about 1567. He belonged to a noble family, and was originally from Olivença. He joined the Jesuits on Dec. 8, 1582. Shortly afterwards he was called successively to the chairs of philosophy at Coimbra and Evora, and was made doctor of theology on June 24, 1596. He was one of the most learned men of his time. He died near Evora, Nov. 20, 1639, leaving, Commentaria in Dialecticam Aristotelis:—Epi-grammata in Mortem Francisci de Mendocça (published in the Veridarium of Mendocça, Lyons, 1649). In the library of Evora may be found a collection of theological matter dictated by him in his lectures. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Couttis (or Coutts), ALEXANDER, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1670; was licensed to preach in 1675; presented to the living at Strickathrow in 1677, and ordained. He died April 11, 1695, aged forty-eight years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 850.

Coutts (or Couttis), ROBERT, a Scotch clergyman, was born at Largo; studied at St. Andrews and Edinburgh universities; was licensed to preach in 1796; became assistant in mathematics at St. Andrews; and was presented to the living at the second charge, Brechin, in 1798. He died June 18, 1803, aged thirty-one years. He had a singularly pious and vigorous mind. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 816, 817.

Couturier, Jacob, a French theologian, was born at Minot, near La Montagne (Burgundy). He was curate of Salives, near Dijon, in the time of the Revolution; was elected deputy to the states-general by the bailiwick of La Montagne, and made himself noticeable by his opposition to the reformers. He refused to take the ecclesiastical oath to the new constitution, and went into exile; but returned to France some time before the 18th Brumaire, and assumed the direction of his parish. He died at Salives, Burgundy, in 1805, leaving Histoire de l'Ancien Testament (Dijon, 1825). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Couturier, Jean, a French theologian, brother of Jacob, was born at Minot, near La Montagne, Burgundy, in 1730. He completed his studies at Langres, entered the Jesuit order, and taught rhetoric successively at Langres, Verdun, Pont-à-Mousson, and Nancy. At the time of the suppression of the Jesuits he was appointed curate at Léry. In 1791 he refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new constitution, and was incarcerated soon after, but, being liberated in 1795, he resumed his functions, and, in spite of legal remonstrance, continued them until his death, at Léry, March 22, 1799. He wrote, Catéchisme Dogmatique et Moral (Dijon, 1821, 1832);—La Bonne Journée (ibid. 1822, 1825; Coutances, 1827);—Abrégé de la Doctrine Chrétienne (Dijon, 1822, 1823);—L'Histoire de Tobie (ibid. 1823);—and a large number of Controversies, Méditations, Sermons, etc., remaining in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Couturier, Nicolas Jérôme, a French ecclesiastic, was born in the diocese of Rouen, June 2, 1712. He became preacher to the king, canon of St. Quentin, and died at Paris in 1778, leaving several Funeral Sermons.

Couturier (or Cousturier), Pierre (Lat. Petrus Sutor), a French theologian, was born at Cheméré-le-Roy, a village of Laval, in the latter part of the 15th century. Having received the degree of doctor at the Sorbonne, he taught philosophy in the College of St. Barbe. He afterwards became a cenobite, and entered the Carthusian order. In 1519 he was made governor of the Carthusians of Paris. In 1534 he went to another monastery, near Troyes, as prior. He employed his leisure in writing books against the Protestants. He died June 18, 1537, leaving, De Vita Carthusianorum (Paris, 1522; Louvain, 1572; Cologne, 1609);—De Triplici Amore Connubio (Paris, 1523);—De Translatione Bibliæ (ibid. 1525). In reply to Erasmus he wrote Antipologia (ibid. 1526);—Apologeticum (ibid. eod.);—Apologia (ibid. 1531);—De Potestate Ecclesiæ (ibid. 1534, 1546). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Couvay, Jean, a reputable French engraver, was born at Arles about 1622. The following are his principal works: The Virgin and Infant; St. John in the Desert; The Magdalene; The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Couvoyon, Saint, a Breton abbot, was born at Combeac in 788, being the son of a gentleman named Conon. He entered the priesthood, became archdeacon of Vannes, and soon after retired to a solitude in Redon, where he built a monastery under the Benedictine rule, with the aid of Ratwil, lord of the region. In 848 he obtained a decision of pope Leo IV on a question of simony, and thereupon prosecuted four of the neighboring prelates, who were deposed. In 865 he took refuge from the invasion of the Normans with the prince of Bretagne, who built for him a monastery at Plélan, afterwards called that of St. Maxentius. He died there in 868, and his remains were transferred in the 10th century to Redon. His festival is on Dec. 28. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Covarrubias (or Covarruvias) y Leyra, Diego (surnamed The Spanish Bartole), a Spanish lawyer and prelate, was born at Toledo, July 25, 1512. He studied under Nicolas Cleynants, Fernando Nuñez, and Azpilcueta, and taught canon law at Salamanca. In 1538 he became professor at Oviedo, later judge at Burgos, and counsellor at Grenada. In 1549 he was nominated archbishop of San Domingo; in 1560 bishop of Ciudad Rodrigo; in 1565 bishop of Segovia, and later of Cuenca. He was engaged in several ecclesiastical reforms and offices, and died at Madrid, Sept. 27, 1577, leaving a number of historical and archaeological works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Covel, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of Rev. James Covel, Sr., was converted when a young man, and in 1821 entered the New York Conference. In 1852, on account of ill-health, he became superannuated, and continued to hold that relation to the close of his life, early in 1860. Mr. Covel was a deeply pious man, an ordinary preacher, but had few superiors in ardor or faithfulness in the ministry, or success in revivals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 91.

Covel, William, an English theologian of the former part of the 17th century, wrote several minor works on ecclesiastical polity, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coveh, Alanson L., a Baptist minister, was born at Pittstown, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1804. He became pastor of a church in Addison, Vt., and subsequently at Whiteborough, N. Y., also of the First Baptist Church in Albany. He died Sept. 20, 1837. He took a prominent part in the organization of the American and Foreign Bible Society while pastor in Albany. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 313.

Covell, Joseph Smith, a minister of the Episcopal Church, was born in Killingly, Conn., June 4, 1797. He spent the first eighteen years of his life on his father's farm; fitted for college in part at Woodstock, and graduated from Brown University in 1822. He afterwards took charge of a private school in Newport, R. I., and began his theological studies under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Austin, but, later, connected himself with the Episcopal Church, and in August, 1824, was ordained deacon and became minister of a mission church in St. Albans, Vt. The climate proving to be too rigorous, he removed to Baltimore, where he was ordained a presbyter, in May, 1825, and took charge of a mission station at Princess Anne, on the eastern shore of Maryland. Subsequently he returned to New England, and in October, 1828, was called to the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Brookfield, Conn., where he remained nine years, and then took charge of Trinity Church, Bristol, for ten years. He afterwards was rector of churches in Essex, Bethlehem, etc., until 1863, when he was called to the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Huntington. He resigned in July, 1876, and removed to Bridgeport, where he died, March 16, 1880. See Brown University Necrology, 1879-1880; Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Covell, Lemuel, a Baptist minister, was born in the state of New York about the middle of the last century. He was licensed by the Church in Providence, Saratoga Co. Although at first poor and illiterate, so remarkable were his natural abilities that he became one of the most eminent preachers in his denomination. He was blessed with a voice of singular charm, and his address was manly and engaging. He regarded it as his mission to travel extensively among the churches of New York and New England. Not long before his death the Church in Cheshire, Mass., of which Rev. John Leland had been the pastor, called him to be his successor. He accepted their call on condition that he be allowed, a part of the time, to travel, and preach in destitute regions, under the patronage and direction of the Baptist Missionary Society of Boston. While thus engaged, in Upper Canada, he died after a short illness, in October, 1806. See Benedict, Hist. of the Baptists, ii, 289. (J. C. S.)

Covenanting, PERSONAL, is a modern term for a solemn transaction by which many pious and devoted Christians have dedicated themselves to the service of God. Such bonds or covenants, written and subscribed with their own hands, have been found among their papers after their death, and it cannot be denied that most of them are exceedingly edifying; but instances have also been known of persons abusing this custom for purposes of superstition and self-righteousness, and of some who have gone as far as to write and sign such a document with their own blood.

Coventry, George, an English Baptist minister, was settled at the Duke Street Church, London, in February, 1731. There was a large tomb in the graveyard belonging to the Coventry family, but it was destroyed when the chapel was pulled down, and the records of the family lost. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 181.

Coventry, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1725; called to the living at Kilspindie in 1727, and ordained; and died Feb. 19, 1761. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 644.

Covetousness. The works of the earliest Christian authorities are full of warnings against the different forms of this vice. The oblations of the covetous were not to be received. Gregory Thaumaturgus, archbishop of Neo-Cæsarea (about A.D. 262) declares that it is impossible to set forth in a single letter all the sacred writings which proclaim not robbery alone to be a fearful crime, but all covetousness, all grasping at others' goods for filthy lucre. Others of the fathers in like manner vigorously denounced the existence of the vice among the clergy.

Gregory of Nyssa observes that the fathers have affixed no punishment to this sin, which he assimilates to adultery; though it be very common in the Church, none inquires of those who are brought to be ordained if they be polluted with it. It is true, a decree from Gratian, ascribed to pope Julius I, A.D. 337-352, denounces as filthy lucre the buying in time of harvest or of vintage, not of necessity but of greed, victuals or wine, in order to sell at a higher price; and the 17th canon of the Council of Nicea (A.D. 325) is directed against the love of filthy lucre and usury, enacting deposition as the punishment for the cleric. But here, as in a parallel canon of the synod of Seleucia, A.D. 410, it is perhaps to be inferred that the vice was chiefly, if not solely, aimed at under the concrete form of usury (q. v.). That covetousness was as rife in the monastery as in the world may be inferred from Cassian.

The very doubtful "Sanctions and Decrees of the Nicene fathers," apparently of Greek origin, require priests not to be given to heaping up riches, lest they should prefer them to the ministry, and if they do accumulate wealth, to do so moderately. The 8d Council of Orleans, A.D. 588, forbids clerics, from the diaconate upwards, to carry on business as public traders for the greed of filthy lucre, or to do so in another's name. As the time wears on, covetousness seems often to be confounded with avarice, and to be legislated against under that name. See BUBBRY; COMMENCE; USURY. For rapacity in exacting fees, see SPOTULAE.

Covingtrie, THOMAS, a Scotch clergyman, was baptized June 15, 1685; took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1705; studied divinity at Glasgow; was licensed to preach in 1711; called to the living at Cross and Burness the same year, and ordained; and died Sept. 2, 1744, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 410.

Cowan, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1719; became missionary in the parish of Westray; was presented to the living in 1734; ordained in 1735; and died July 28, 1760. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 419.

Cowan, Charles, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of St. Andrews; was licensed to preach in 1817; appointed to the living at Fetlar and North Yell in 1822, and ordained. He died Oct. 9, 1829, aged thirty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 437.

Cowan, Francis, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1758; presented to the living at Gladsmair in 1759, and ordained; and died Oct. 28, 1789. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 386.

Cowan, John Fleming, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Parkesburg, Pa., May 6, 1801. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1825, and in 1828 from Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1829, and ordained April 4, 1830, with a view to missionary work in Missouri, where he labored for thirty-three years. His first field was Apple Creek, Cape Girardeau Co. After this he was pastor of the Potosi Church in Washington Co. (1836-1852). He then visited and labored in various parts of the state, and died at Carondelet, Sept. 29, 1862. Mr. Cowan was in the fullest sense an evangelist. He acted as agent for the Board of Domestic Missions for three years, and served for a while as chaplain of the hospital at Carondelet. His preaching was practical and instructive. (W. P. S.)

Cowbridge, an English martyr, was burned at Oxford in 1588, for his public communication of the Scriptures. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, v, 251.

Cowden, JAMES, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in May, 1836. He received an early religious training; experienced conversion in 1853, and in 1855 entered the Rock River Conference. In 1858 he removed to Minnesota for the improvement of his health, but continued effective, and six years later returned and united with the Central Illinois Conference, wherein he served zealously to the close of his life, March 22, 1871. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 195.

Cowdy, SAMUEL, an Irish Methodist preacher, was born in 1799 in County Down. He gave his heart to God, and his life to Methodism at an early age; entered the itinerant ministry in 1832, and for a quarter of a century preached the gospel with soul-converting power on many Irish circuits. In 1860 he became a supernumerary, but labored as he had strength until his death, June 3, 1880, at Portadown.

Cowell, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wrentham, Mass., in 1704. He graduated from Harvard College in 1732. Having studied theology and received license to preach, he went as a supply to Trenton, N. J., in 1735, and in April, 1736, became pastor. At the division of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, Mr. Cowell remained with the old side. On the union of the two synods he joined the New Brunswick Presbytery, and continued in relation with it until his death, Dec. 1, 1760. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 66.

Cowell, D. B., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at West Lebanon, Me., Dec. 20, 1806. He received his early education in the academy at Limerick, and at Wolsborough, N. H.; spent his early manhood in teaching and in mercantile pursuits, several years being passed in Great Falls, where his trade became extensive. At this period of his life he was a Universalist, and subsequently an avowed infidel. In 1833 he was converted, and soon after became a class-leader in the Church at Great Falls. In 1837 he was ordained, and for seven years travelled almost constantly as an itinerant. In 1848 he gave the start to a movement which resulted in the establishment of the West Lebanon Academy. His last fields of labor were with the Walnut Grove Church, N. H., more than a year, and with the churches in Gorham and Standish, Me. Feeble health prevented his preaching much for some time before his death, which occurred April 16, 1884. See The Morning Star, June 4, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Cowell, Edward, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ewood Bridge, near Blackburn, Feb. 7, 1830. He became an efficient local preacher among the Wesleyans, but afterwards joined the Congregationalists. In 1862 he supplied the pulpit of Providence Independent Chapel, Marsden, and the following year became its pastor, being ordained Sept. 29. He accepted an invitation to Bretherton in September, 1874, where he labored happily and successfully for five years. He died Feb. 9, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 365.

Cowie, William, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Banffshire, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1806; was appointed schoolmaster at Mortlach in 1811; licensed to preach in 1812; presented to the living at Cabrach in 1817, and ordained; transferred to Cairnie in 1826; and died June 1, 1866, aged eighty years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticæ, iii, 196, 551.

Cowing, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lyman, N. H., Nov. 19, 1796. He was converted in 1818; licensed to exhort in 1824, to preach in 1827, and in 1828 entered the New England Conference, wherein he remained effective, with but a three years' intermission as superannuated, until 1852, when he again became superannuated, and thus continued until his death, in May, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 111.

Cowl. Benedict ordered the "cuculla," or hood, to be shaggy for winter, and for summer of lighter texture; and a "scapulare" to be worn instead out of doors, as more suitable for field-work, being open at the sides. The "cuculla" protected the head and shoulders, and, as being worn by infants and peasants, was said to symbolize humility; or, by another account, it was to keep the eyes from glancing right or left. It was part of the dress of nuns, as well as of monks, and was worn by the monks of Tabenna at the mass. It seems in their case to have been longer than a hood or cape. Indeed, "cuculla" is often taken as equivalent to "casula," a covering of the whole person; in later writers it means, not the hood only, but the monastic robe, hood and all. These same Pachomiani, or monks of Tabenna, like the Carthusians, drew their hoods forward at meal-times, so as to hide their faces from one another. The "cappa" (probably akin to our "cape") in Italy seems to correspond with the Gallic "cuculla," and both were nearly identical, it is thought, with the "melotes," or sheepskin of the earliest ascetics.

Cowle, John, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Huntingdonshire, England, in January, 1815. He went with his parents to Vanderburgh County, Ind., in 1822; removed to Arkansas in 1838; and in 1841 entered the Arkansas Conference. From 1868, he was a superannuate to the close of his life, June 6, 1870. During his entire ministry Mr. Cowle acquitted himself with honor. He was a close student and a laborious minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1870, p. 496.

Cowles, Chauncey Demming, a Congregational minister, was born at Farmington, Conn., June 27, 1812. He graduated from Yale College in 1834; studied theology at Yale Divinity School for two years (1838-40), and was ordained, June 10, 1841, pastor of the Congregational Church in Plainville, where he continued for two years. He then retired from the ministry and removed to Buffalo, N. Y., where he engaged in manufacturing until 1853. He died at his native place, Jan. 12, 1881. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1188.

Cowles, George, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1798. He graduated from Yale College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824; was ordained Jan. 18, 1826, and became pastor at South Danvers (now Peabody), Mass., in 1827. He was lost at sea, near Cape Hatteras, in the wreck of the Home, Oct. 9, 1839. See Trien. Cal. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 57.

Cowles, Henry, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Norfolk, Conn., April 24, 1803. He pursued his preparatory studies under Rev. Ralph Emerson, of Norfolk; graduated from Yale College in 1826, and spent two years in Yale Divinity School; was ordained an evangelist, July 1, 1828, at Hartford; for two years was acting pastor at Ashtabula and Sandusky, O., and then served in that relation at Austinburg, to July 29, 1831, when he was installed pastor there, remaining until November, 1835. From that time to 1838 he was professor of Greek and Latin in Oberlin College, O.; the next ten years professor of ecclesiastical history, church polity, and Old Testament language and literature; from 1848 to 1862 editor of the Oberlin Evangelist; and subsequently was engaged in literary labor at the same place. From 1851 he was trustee of the college. He died in Janesville, Wis., Sept. 6, 1881. Dr. Cowles was the author of the following publications: The Holiness of Christians in the Present Life (1841); Gospel Manna for Christian Pilgrims (1847); Commentaries on the Scriptures, in 16 vols., covering the whole Bible, as follows: The Minor Prophets (1867); Ezekiel and Daniel (1869); Isaiah (eod.); Jeremiah (eod.); Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Solomon (1870); Revelation (1871); Psalms (1872); Pentateuch (1874); Hebrew History from the Death of Moses to the Close of Scripture Narrative (1875); Gospel and Epistles of John (1876); Job (1877); Hebrews (1878); The Shorter Epistles (1879); The Longer Epistles (1880); Luke's Gospel and Acts (1881); Matthew and Mark (eod.). The profits arising from the sale of these commentaries he gave to the missionary cause. Dr. Cowles also edited a volume of Mr. Finney's Sermons, in 1876, entitled Gospel Themes, and published a volume entitled Sin and Suffering in the Universe. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 26; Obituary Record of Yale College, 1882.

Cowles, Henry Brown, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Fauquier County, Va., Nov. 2, 1803. He experienced conversion in 1818; was licensed to exhort in 1830, and in 1831 connected himself with the Virginia Conference, in which he filled the most prominent stations, to the close of his life, Nov. 28, 1874. Mr. Cowles, became, in 1854, the financial agent of Randolph-Macon College, and raised for the institution an endowment of $100,000. He had a strongly marked character; was noted for his caution and prudence, his sincerity and courage; was a keen judge of character, and a skillful manager of men; was punctual, industrious, and painstaking. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 141; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cowles, Orson, a Congregational minister, was born at East Hartland, Conn., Jan. 14, 1801. He studied at Yale College, and in the theological department, not graduating, however. He was ordained pastor of the Church in North Woodstock in 1832; taught in North Haven two years, and was district secretary of the American Board from 1840 to 1860. He died at North Haven, Dec. 23, 1860. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 211.

Cowles, R. J., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Belchertown, Mass., July 10, 1796. He was converted in 1811, and united with the Congregational Church in his native town. At the age of nineteen he removed to Genesee County, N. Y., and took up his residence in what is now South Byron. In 1823 he removed to Brokenstraw, Pa., and a year later to Sugar Grove. Here he opened a Sabbath-school, and began to preach, receiving a license, in 1832, from the Presbytery of Pennsylvania. In 1839 he united with a Free-will Baptist Church at Wrightsville, and was ordained at Sugar Hill, Feb. 29, 1842. He continued to preach for many years, and died March 29, 1874. See The Morning Star, July 22, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Cowmeadow, John, an English Methodist preacher, was received by the British Conference in 1788. In much weakness of body he labored faithfully until his death, in 1786. Wesley, in his Journal, speaks of him as a martyr to long and loud preaching; but says, "He had the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, and was of exemplary behavior." See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Cownley, Joseph, an early English Methodist preacher, was born at Leominster, Herefordshire, June 26, 1723. Under Wesley's preaching, Cownley was converted at Bath, whither his business as travelling secretary to a magistrate sometimes called him. He was admitted to the itinerancy by Wesley, in Bristol, in 1746. He preached in Staffordshire, confronting the mobs, in Cornwall, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (1747), Ireland (at the peril of his life), and in various parts of England. In spite of a severe fever in 1755, he labored in Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. He died at Newcastle, Oct. 8, 1792. Unusually sensitive to discord, Cownley, from his sympathy with the popular movement, was involved in the great agitation of 1792, which resulted in the formation of the Methodist New Connection. He was a life-long friend of the Wesleys and Whitefield. Cownley was a thorough theologian, having read, it is said, nearly every theological work in the language. His mind was capable of abstruse investigation, and Wesley called him withal "one of the best preachers in England." He loved to carry the gospel to the retreats of wretchedness. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1793; Jackson, Early Meth. Preachers, ii, 1-47 (by John Sauter, 1794); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 39, 91-93; Smith, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 42-44; Atmore, Meth. Memorial, p. 90 sq.; Crowther, Portraits of Methodism (Lond. 1814, 2d ed.), p. 346-350.

Cowper, Charles Philip, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baden, Germany, April 8, 1851. He emigrated to New York city with his parents when four years of age; experienced conversion in 1864; assisted in establishing the first mission for colored people, under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in New York city; gave himself to that work with remarkable zeal and self-denial; studied three years at the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., preaching nearly every Sunday; and in 1873 entered the New York East Conference, wherein he labored with abundant success till his death, July 11, 1875. Mr. Cowper was a young man of considerable promise, sweet in spirit, unassuming in manner, and irreproachable in conduct. His mind was strong, and his will consecrated. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 61.

Cowper, John, a Scotch clergyman, brother of the bishop of Galloway, was a supply at the High Kirk, Edinburgh, in 1586, and became afterwards minister. He refused to pray for queen Mary in the terms of the king's command, for which he was imprisoned in the castle of Blackness; the city paid his expenses, obtained his release, and he was transferred to the Collegiate Church, Glasgow, in 1587, having charge of the eastern district and parish. He was a member of the assemblies of 1593 and 1596, and was appointed to visit that at Lothian in 1602. In 1595 his life was threatened by two men, but the chief offender begged pardon on his knees before the presbytery. He died Dec. 25, 1603. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 7; ii, 7.

Cowper, Spencer, D.D., an English clergyman, second son of lord-chancellor William Cowper, was born in London in 1718. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and became rector of Fordwich, prebendary of Canterbury in 1742, and dean of Durham in 1746. He died March 25, 1774. He published some single Sermons and Discourses, and a Dissertation on the Distinct Powers of Reason and Revelation (1773). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Gen. Biog. Dict., s. v.

Cowper, William, an eminent English poet, grand-nephew of lord-chancellor Cowper, grandson of a judge in the court of common pleas, and son of John Cowper, rector of Great Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, was born there, Nov. 26, 1731. He appears from his infancy to have been delicate in mind and body, and, after having spent two years of misery in a country school, was placed at Westminster School, where he remained till he was eighteen years old. He was then articled to a solicitor in London, called to the bar in 1754, and resided in the Middle Temple for eleven years, neglecting law, contributing a few papers to The Connoisseur, and gradually exhausting his little patrimony. In 1763 one of his powerful kinsmen appointed him to two clerkships in the House of Lords. Doubts of his competency, and the fear of appearing in public assemblies, developed the tendency to insanity which lurked within him. He made several attempts to destroy himself; and was consigned for eighteen months to a lunatic asylum at St. Albans. On his release in 1765, subsisting on the remnant of his property, with assistance from relatives, he took up his residence at Huntingdon, and became a boarder in the house of Mr. Unwin, a clergyman. That gentleman dying two years afterwards, the widow and Cowper removed to Olney, in Buckinghamshire. John Newton was curate of the place; and his religious views accorded with those which had been adopted by the poet, although the association rather increased than lessened the morbid tendencies of the latter. In 1776 appeared the Olney Hymns, of which some of the best were furnished by Cowper; but it was only about the time of their publication that the unhappy poet was freed from a second confinement, which had lasted for nearly four years. He had still earlier tried his hand at poetry, having translated an elegy of Tibullus at the age of fourteen, and at eighteen he wrote some beautiful verses On Finding the Heel of a Shoe; but diffidence repressed his talents until he had passed his fortieth year. Mrs. Unwin, anxious to engage his mind safely, now urged him to prosecute verse-making. The Progress of Error was written; Truth, Table-Talk, and Expostulation followed it; and these with other poems made up a volume which was published in 1782, receiving the approbation of Johnson and other critics, but meeting little attention from the public. The poet's fame, however, was decisively established by his next volume, which, appearing in 1785, contained The Task and other poems. The publication of this work, indeed, was an æra in the history of English poetry. It was the point of transition from the eighteenth century to the nineteenth. Natural language was substituted for artificial; themes of universal interest were handled, instead of such as told only on a few cultivated minds; even the seriousness and solemnity of the leading tone had a striking attraction, while it was relieved both by strains of pathos and touches of satiric humor. More novel and original than anything else were those minute and faithful delineations of external scenery, to which no parallel had been seen since Thomson's Seasons. Perhaps, also, the didactic form of Cowper's poems, giving them an equivocal character which hovers continually between poetry and argumentation, was an additional recommendation to readers who had long been unaccustomed to the finer and higher kinds of poetical invention. John Gilpin is a specimen of his humorous genius, the subject of which is said to have been suggested to him by Lady Austen, one of his literary friends. Cowper now spent six years on his translation of Homer, which appeared in 1791. The neglect which it has experienced is certainly undeserved, at least by his Odyssey. His mental alienation, which had repeatedly threatened him with a return, overcame him completely in 1794; and the last six years of his life produced hardly any literary fruits except the pathetic Custaway. The death of his friend Mrs. Unwin, in 1796, threw him into a gloom which was hardly ever again dispelled, and he died at Dereham, April 25, 1800. Cowper's chief characteristics are simplicity, individuality, transparency of ideas, bold originality, singular purity, and experimental Christian piety. All his poems bear marks of his mature authorship, his accurate rather than extensive scholarship, and his unwearied desire to benefit mankind. His Christian life, though oppressed by disease, was true, useful, and lovely; and even while suffering under the deranged idea that he was an exception to God's general plan of grace, it is delightful to perceive that it had no tendency to lead him aside from the path of rectitude, or to relax in the least his efforts to maintain the life of religion in his soul. His poems remain a treasure of deep Christian pathos and earnest, pensive thought, and many of them have been incorporated into nearly every collection of religious hymns. Cowper's works were first collected by his friend Hayley (1803-4, with a Life); but the best edition is that of Southey (1833-37, also with a Life, the most carefully written, and with additional Letters, in Bohn's Standard Library, 1853). For a copious view of the literature, see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Cow-worship. The Egyptian goddesses Athor and Isis, represented as having the head of a cow; Astarte, the Syrian goddess, as wearing the horns of a cow; and the Grecian Juno as having a cow's eyes. Venus is sometimes figured as a cow giving milk to her calf. To changed into a cow is an emblem of the earth. The cow of Minos, which on each day was white, red, and black, seems to represent the three different aspects which the earth presents in the bright blaze of noon, in the purple tinge of evening or morning, and in the dark shades of night. In the fables of Brahminism, the earth takes the form of a cow named Kamadhuka, which gives its worshippers all they desire. Among the Adighe, a race of Circassians, a cow is offered in sacrifice to Achin, the god of horned cattle. According to the cosmogony of the Scandinavian Edda, before the heavens and the earth were created, the cow Audumla was produced in the place where the southern fires of Muspelheim melted the ice of Niflheim. This cow denotes the cosmogonic earth. Among the Hindus the cow is held in the greatest veneration, particularly the species called the Brahmin or sacred cow, and by many families a cow is kept for the mere purpose of worshipping it. See Apis; Moscholatry.

Cox, Alfred, an English Baptist minister, was converted in early life; baptized at seventeen at the Counterslip chapel, Bristol, and began to preach in the villages around. He was an agent for the Baptist Home Missionary Society twenty-two years; was pastor at Dunchurch seven years, and was a consistent and devoted minister. He died at Cradley, June 9, 1870.

Cox, Daniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Barnard, Vt., in August, 1801. He professed conversion in early manhood, received license to exhort in 1828, and in 1829 entered the East Maine Conference. Failing health in 1838 obliged him to become a supernumerary, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, Dec. 28, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 90.

Cox, Francis Augustus, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished English Baptist minister, was born at Leighton Buzzard, Bedfordshire, in 1783. He was brought up religiously, baptized by his grandfather, entered Bristol College at eighteen, under Dr. Ryland, and graduated at Edinburgh University. In 1804 he was ordained pastor of the Church at Clifton, Northampton, by Sutcliffe, Fuller, and Robert Hall, and the Church prospered so much a new large chapel had to be built. He next succeeded Robert Hall at Cambridge. In 1811 he became pastor of the Church at Shore Place, Hackney, where also his success was such that in 1812 a new chapel was built in Mare Street. Being settled in London, he took an active part in establishing and conducting the Baptist Magazine, and was connected with numerous philanthropic institutions. He died at Clapton, London, Sept. 5, 1853. Dr. Cox was the author of some valuable works, including an account of his visit to America. See Cathart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 284.

Cox, Gershom Flagg, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, twin brother of Melville B. Cox, was born at Hallowell, Me., Nov. 9, 1799. He joined the Church at the age of eighteen; was soon licensed to preach, and gave great promise of usefulness; spent several years in Belfast in business, and in 1830 joined the Maine Conference, in which, and in the New England Conference, he labored with but few intermissions as a supernumerary, for more than thirty years. In 1864 he became superannuated, which relation he sustained until his decease in Salem, Nov. 16, 1879. Mr. Cox was a plain, earnest, instructive, Biblical preacher. In his prime he was one of the mighty preachers in New England Methodism, filling with great acceptability her chief pulpits. He was a superior pastor, spiritually minded, conscientious, and prayerful; a man of broad self-culture; was a ready and clear writer, for many years editing The Maine Wesleyan Journal; and in addition to numerous contributions to the Quarterly Review he was the author of the memoir of Melville B. Cox. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 65.

Cox, G. Davenport, a Baptist minister, was born at Cornwallis, N. S. He was ordained at Clementsvalle, Jan. 4, 1865, labored there for several years, then became pastor at Hillsburg, where his fervent labors broke down his constitution, and he died March 25, 1879. His zeal was unflagging, his love for his flock intense. See Baptist Year-book for the Maritime Provinces, 1879; Bill, Fifty Years with the Baptists, p. 554.

Cox, James, a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was a native of Bermuda. In 1823 he received his first appointment to his native islands, and in the following year was sent to the West Indies, where he was stationed at St. Kitt's, Antigua, Dominica, Tortola, and Jamaica. Having a strong constitution, he undertook labors to which few men would have been equal. He died at Morant Bay, Jamaica, May 30, 1859. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859.

Cox, John (1), an English Baptist minister, was born in 1746. He commenced ministerial labors in the connection of the countess of Huntington, but afterwards joined a Baptist Church, and for forty-two years was pastor at Horsington, Somerset, where he continued to preach until his death, Jan. 9, 1827. See New Baptist Miscellany, 1827, p. 124. (J. C. S.)

Cox, John (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Lambourn, Berkshire, May 5, 1802. He was converted early in life, entered the ministry soon after he was twenty-one years of age, and during his long career was pastor successively of churches in Reading, Woolwich, and Ipswich, in all of which places he was held in deservedly high esteem as a godly, faithful, and laborious minister of the gospel. He spent his last years in occasional preaching, chiefly in a small chapel near his residence at Foots Cray, in Kent. He died March 17, 1878. He wrote books, pamphlets, and articles for the press in great numbers. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1880, p. 298.

preachers, was born at Bilston, Staffordshire, Oct. 31, 1815. He was pious from his youth; entered the ministry in 1836; died in London, April 1, 1878, and was buried at Wrexham, where he had settled as a supernumerary during the previous year. He was a man of sterling intellect and high moral worth; was well read in philosophy, history, and elegant literature; his sermons were clear, elaborate, sententious, forcible. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 86.

Cox, John Hayter, an English Congregational minister, was born at Portsea, March 26, 1768, and received his ministerial education at Gosport Academy. In 1789 he began to preach at Fareham, Hampshire, and labored there eighteen years. In 1809 he became pastor at St. Albans, and after five years went to Hadleigh, in Suffolk, where he was installed Oct. 26, 1814. In 1829 he removed to Uley, Gloucestershire, but relinquished this charge, and at the same time the ministry, in 1839, and retired to Kingston, Surrey. He died Jan. 5, 1848. He published, A Harmony of Scripture, some anonymous pamphlets, and a Sermon. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 219.

Cox, Luther J., the bard of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Maryland, Dec. 27, 1791. He was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1819, but afterwards left it; and was among the first to organize and set in operation the Methodist Protestant Church, in which he acted as a zealous, unstationed minister until 1869, and then was received as a supernumerary member in the Maryland Annual Conference. He died July 26, 1870. With an ardent and devotional temperament he possessed a genius and talent for poetry. He is the author of several popular hymns, especially "An alien from God and a stranger to grace." See Cobhouer, Founders of the Meth. Prot. Church, p. 213.

Cox, Margaret, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1814. She labored "with much earnestness and love, yet with becoming modesty. In many instances she was enabled to make full proof of her ministry." She died near Lawrence, Kan., Nov. 12, 1878. See Friends' Review, xxxii, 197. (J. C. S.)

Cox, Michael, an Irish prelate, was bishop of Ossory in 1743, and became archbishop of Cashel in 1754. He published a Sermon (Dublin, 1748). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Cox, Nehemiah, D.D., an English Particular Baptist, was born at Bedford, being a member of John Bunyan's Church there. He was well educated, and "a very excellent, learned, and judicious divine." He was ordained in October, 1671; in 1673 preached for some time at Hitchin; then at Cranfield; and in 1675 went to London, and was ordained joint pastor of the Church at Petty France, where he continued till the Revolution in 1688. He is said to have been a good Greek and Hebrew scholar, and to have been imprisoned in early life for preaching. He published two Sermons, one on the Covenants, against Mr. Whiston; the other an ordination sermon. He died in 1688. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 185.

Cox, Philip, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Frome, Somersetshire, England. He joined the Wesleyans when about eighteen; and, having emigrated to America, labored in the itinerancy about sixteen years, travelling extensively through the United States. He died Sept. 8, 1793. Mr. Cox was a man of small stature, great spirit, quick apprehension, and sound judgment. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1794, p. 54.

Cox, Richard, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York city in 1808. He was designed for mercantile life, but, comparatively late, entered the ministry, graduating from Columbia College in 1833. Having finished the course at the General Theological Seminary, he was ordained deacon in 1836; was missionary pioneer at Vicksburg, Miss.; rector for several years of St. John's Church, Troy, N. Y.; then of St. Paul's Parish, Woodbury, Conn.; a year or two after became rector of Zion Church, New York city, retaining this position for thirteen years; afterwards was rector of St. John's, Santa Cruz, W. I.; and a short time before his death returned to New York city, where he died, Dec. 16, 1860. See Amer. Quar. Church Review, 1861, p. 186.

Cox, Samuel Hanson, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Rahway, N. J., Aug. 25, 1798. His father, who died in 1801, was at that time engaged in a mercantile enterprise in New York city. He was descended from a family which in the 17th century had settled on the eastern shore of Maryland, and was connected for several generations with the Society of Friends. He was educated at Weston, Pa., also received private instruction in Philadelphia, and was a law student in Newark, N. J. In the war of 1812 he served in a volunteer company of riflemen. He studied theology in Philadelphia under Dr. Wilson, was ordained in 1817, and soon after accepted the pastorate of Mendham, Morris Co., N. J. In 1821 he removed to New York city as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Spring Street, and went from thence to Lighthouse Street, on St. John's Park, in 1825. His congregation here was largely composed of the leading merchants of the city. During the prevalence of the cholera he remained at his post until stricken down by the disease.

Dr. Cox took a leading part in the foundation of the University of the City of New York, and in the literary conventions which were called to aid in its organization. He was appointed to open the instructions of the university with the late Dr. McIlvaine, afterwards bishop of Ohio, and delivered one of the two memorable courses of lectures in the winter of 1831-32, his department being that of moral philosophy.

In impaired health, Dr. Cox visited Europe in 1833, where a speech which he delivered at that time, at the anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, gained him great distinction and opened the way to high honors and attentions.

He was elected professor of pastoral theology in the Theological Seminary at Auburn in 1834, and accepted the position; but in 1837 he became pastor of the first Presbyterian congregation in Brooklyn, L. I., where he built a new church in Henry Street. For a long time, both in Brooklyn and New York, he maintained a position of great eminence with unvarying popularity.

In 1845, Dr. Cox attended in London the Evangelical Alliance, of which he was a leading member, and on his return was exposed to peril of shipwreck on the coast of Ireland, when the steamer Great Britain was stranded in the bay of Dundrum. In 1852, his health declining, he visited Nassau; but with so little good effect that, against the remonstrances of his people and the most liberal proposals on their part, he resigned his charge and retired to a pleasant property which they enabled him to purchase at Owego, Tioga Co., N. Y. He considered his career as a pastor at an end, but frequently delivered lectures and sermons in New York for several years subsequently.

Dr. Cox for many years was professor of ecclesiastical history in the Union Theological Seminary of New York, and also presided for a time over the Female College at Le Roy. For the last twelve years of his life he lived in great retirement in Westchester County. He died there, Oct. 2, 1880.

The anti-slavery sentiment predominant in England made a great impression on Dr. Cox during his visit there, and although he publicly defended his country while abroad, he soon after his return preached a celebrated sermon against slavery, which, although moderate in tone, drew upon him, as a conspicuous person, a great share of the violence with which the anti-slavery agitators were then visited. He was never identified, however, with their extreme measures, and afterwards took a leading conservative position on all questions connected with the South, which for a long time agitated the Presbyterian Church. In other questions which for a time divided that denomination, his theological standing was with the new school, of which he was a prominent champion; in the order and discipline of his Church, however, he maintained the highest and most thorough old-school position, so far as conformity to the standard is concerned. Although much criticised for personal eccentricities, and especially for a pompous Latinity of style, Dr. Cox has been generally recognised as a man of high character and commanding talents, of great boldness in expressing his strong convictions, and of singular power and magnetism as an orator. As a consistent Christian, his great purity and marked simplicity of character secured to him, through a long and useful life, the uniform respect of his fellow-men.

Dr. Cox wrote largely for the press. Among his publications were, Quakerism not Christianity (N. Y. 1833, 8vo);—Interviews, Memorable and Useful (N. Y. 1853, 12mo), etc. See N. Y. Tribune, Oct. 4, 1880; N. Y. Observer, Oct. 7, 1880; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cox, Samuel J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Monmouth County, N. J., Nov. 2, 1789. He joined the Church in 1809, was licensed to preach in 1812, and not long after admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference. He filled successively the following appointments: Sussex Circuit; Snow Hill; Kensington, Phila.; Wilmington, Del.; Union Charge, Phila.; and Salem, N. J. In 1821 he located and removed to Zanesville, O., where he remained until his death, Aug. 23, 1870. Mr. Cox was editor of the Muskingum Messenger from 1823 to 1835, and filled various civil offices with eminent ability. (W. P. S.)

Cox, Thomas L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington County, Ky., Jan. 15, 1809; experienced religion at the age of ten; joined the Tennessee Conference when twenty-five, and was immediately transferred to the Alabama Conference, wherein he served the Church with zeal and fidelity until his death, Jan. 18, 1836. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1836, p. 487.

Cox, William (1), an English Wesleyan minister entered the ministry in 1789, preached for seventeen years, and died at Swansea, Oct. 15, 1809. His life and ministry displayed the attractive charms of genuine Christianity. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1810.

Cox, William (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in Warminster in 1813. Removing to Bristol in 1840, he joined the Church in Newfoundland Street Chapel, in that city, the same year. He zealously employed himself in efforts to do good, and having entered the ministry, was sent to Fovant by the Wilts Association, in connection with the Home Missionary Society in London, in 1849, and labored there till 1852, when he was ordained. Failing health compelled him to relinquish his charge in April, 1853, and on May 14 of that year he died. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 221.

Coxcie (or Coxis), MICHAEL, a reputable Flemish painter, was born at Mechlin in 1497, and was a scholar of Van Orley; afterwards went to Rome, where he applied himself to the study of Raphael. On his return to Flanders he painted many works for the churches, the best of which are at Brussels. The Last Supper, in St. Gudule; and The Death of the Virgin, in Notre Dame. He died at Antwerp in 1592. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Coxcox is the name given in Mexican mythology to the patriarch who, together with his wife, Xochiquetzal, escaped the deluge by constructing a boat of cypress wood. This legend is evidently a tradition from the history of Noah. See DELUGE.

Coxe, Henry Octavius, a minister of the Church of England, was born in 1811, and educated at Westminster and at Worcester College, Oxford, graduating in 1833. He entered at once upon work in the MS. department at the library of the British Museum, and continued there till 1838, when he became one of the sub-librarians of the Bodleian library. He succeeded the late Dr. Bandinel as head librarian in 1860. On the part of the government Mr. Coxe was sent out to inspect the libraries in the monasteries of the Levant. He was an authority on the date and character of MSS., and he detected one of the forgeries palmed by M. Simonides upon the learned. He died July 10, 1881, at Oxford. Mr. Coxe was the editor and author of many works; the most important of all his labors being the new Catalogue of the Bodleian Library. He was curate in a London district while working at the museum; and he was in charge of Wytham, near Oxford, as curate or rector, for twenty-five years, until his death. He was Oxford select preacher in 1842, and Whitehall preacher in 1868; also an honorary fellow of Worcester and Corpus Christi colleges, and chaplain of the latter. (B. P.)

Coxe, Richard Charles, an eminent English divine, was born in 1800. He graduated at Worcester College, Oxford, in 1821, was ordained deacon in 1823, and priest in 1824; in 1841 became vicar of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; in 1843 honorary canon of Durham, and one of the select preachers before the University of Oxford; in 1853 archdeacon of Lindisfarne, with the vicarage of Engletham annexed; and in 1857 canon of Durham. He died at Engletham, Aug. 25, 1865. Archdeacon Coxe was the author of several valuable theological works, a number of sermons, and a few volumes of poems of a high order of merit. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1865, p. 674.

Coxe, William (1), an English author and divine, was born in Dover Street, Piccadilly, London, March 7, 1747. He was educated at Eton, and at King's College, Cambridge. In 1768 he was chosen a fellow of the latter; and during his residence at the university distinguished himself by his classical attainments, twice gaining the bachelor's prize for the best Latin dissertation. He was ordained, and appointed curate of Denham in 1771; rector of Bemerton in 1788; canon-residentary of Salisbury in 1803; and archdeacon of Wilts in 1805, which office he held till his death, June 8, 1828. Mr. Coxe, as tutor to the sons of several noblemen, spent, at various times, many years on the Continent, where he neglected no opportunity of collecting information about the countries which he visited. The result appeared in many volumes of travels and history, all of which are characterized by close observation, care, and research. Archdeacon Coxe published, also, several large topographical works, besides some of a religious character. A set of his historical works and travels is published in twenty-four volumes, imperial quarto. See The (Lond.) Annual Register, 1828, p. 237; Hart, Manual of Eng. Literature; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Coxe, William (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He was a student in Jefferson College, and graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Oct. 8 of the same year; was missionary to New Orleans, La., in 1829; stated supply at Apple Creek, O., from 1832 to 1836; at Lancaster in 1837; pastor there from 1838 to 1849; and thereafter at Piqua until his death, in 1856. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 58.

Coxhead, BENJAMIN, an English Baptist minister, was born June 9, 1772, and baptized at Carter Lane, London, May 27, 1794. He pursued his theological studies at the academy in Bristol; and was ordained at Wild Street Church, London, Oct. 30, 1800, remaining there until 1807, when he removed to Truro, where, for the most of the time, he continued until 1820. For two or three years he was out of the pastorate, in consequence of ill-health. In April, 1824, he accepted a call to Winchester, and was pastor in that city seven years, from 1824 to 1831. He continued to reside in Winchester for five years, preaching when he could, and then removed to Newbury, where, without charge, he preached frequently, until laid aside by the infirmities of age. He died Nov. 12, 1851. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1852, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Coxida, ÉLIE DE, a French religious writer, was born near Fumes about 1140. In 1189 he became abbot of the monastery of Dunes (Cistercian), where he acquired extensive celebrity for his knowledge and virtue. He died in 1203, leaving only two Sermons, which have been published by Visch in the Bibliotheca Scriptorum Ordinis Cisterciensis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coxia. See COXITE.

Coxow, THOMAS T., an English Methodist preacher, was born at Hull in 1812. In early life he was converted, and joined the New Connection Methodists. In 1834 he began to itinerate in their ministry, and for nearly ten years preached with acceptance in nine circuits, when, at Halifax, ill-health suspended his labors in 1843, and he retired to Hull, where he died, Aug. 17 of the same year. See Minutes of the British Conference.

Coyaco, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Coyacense), was held in 1050, at Coyaco, or Coyce, in the diocese of Orvieto, Spain, by Ferdinand I of Castile. Nine bishops attended, and thirteen decrees were published, relating partly to the Church and partly to the state.

2. Orders, under anathema, that all abbots and abbesses shall govern their houses according to the rule of St. Eldore or St. Benedict, and shall submit in all things to their bishop.

3. Orders that churches and the clergy shall be under the control of their bishop, and not under that of any lay person; that suitable vessels and ornaments be provided; that no chalice of wood or earthenware shall be allowed; that the altar shall be made entirely of stone, and shall be consecrated by the bishop. It also directs that in every church the proper priestly vestments shall be provided, viz. the surplice, amice, alb, cinctorium, belt, stole, maniple, and chasuble: also the vestments of the deacon, viz. amice, alb, and stole. Also it orders, that under the chalice shall be placed a paten, and over it a corporal of linen. The host to be made of fine flour, without any admixture: the wine and water to be pure, so that, in the wine and host and water, the sacred Trinity may be signified. That the vestments of priests ministering in the church shall reach to their feet. That they shall have no women in their houses except a mother, or nurse, or sister, or woman of approved character, who shall always be dressed entirely in black: and that they shall teach infants the Creed and Lord's Prayer.

4. Enjoins that archdeacons shall present for ordination only such clerks as shall know the whole psalter, with the hymns and canticles, epistles, gospels, and prayers.

5. Orders all Christian persons to go to church on Saturday evenings, and on Sunday to be present at the matins, mass, and at all the hours: to do no work, nor travel on that day, unless for the purposes of devotion, visiting the sick, burying the dead, executing a secret order of the king, or of defence against the Saracens. Those who break this canon are, according to their rank, either to be deprived of communion for a year, or to receive one hundred lashes.

11. Commands fasting on Friday.

12. Forbids the forcible seizure of those who have taken refuge in a church, or within thirty-one paces of it.

There appears to be some difference in the copies of these canons. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1063. — Landon, Man. of Councils, s. v.; Richard et Giraud, Bibliothèque Sacrée, s. v.

Coyle, JOHN, a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at Montrose, July 26, 1842. He was converted in his eighteenth year; joined the Wesleyans at first, but soon after became a Congregationalist; received his ministerial education largely under private instructors; and was ordained at Forfar, April 26, 1866, where he labored with great ability, zeal, and devotedness until his death, July 1, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 241.

Coypell, Antoine, a French painter, son and scholar of Noel, was born in Paris in 1661. He went to Rome when quite young, and studied the works of Raphael, Michael Angelo, and the Caracci. At the age of fifteen he returned to Paris with a very superficial knowledge of his profession. He was only nineteen when he painted his Assumption, for the Church of Notre Dame, and at twenty he was elected a royal academician. He was appointed painter to the king in 1715. His principal works are at Paris. They are Christ Curing the Blind, at the Carthusian convent; Christ among the Doctors; and The Assumption, in the Church of Notre Dame. He died in 1722. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Coypell, Noel (surnamed Le Poussin), an eminent French painter, was born in Paris in 1628. He studied first under Poncet, and at the age of fourteen entered the school of Quillerier, where he made such rapid progress that his merit procured his election to the Academy in 1659, his reception-picture being Cain Slaying Abel. His celebrated Martyrdom of St. James was painted for the Church of Notre Dame about this time. He was appointed by the king director of the French Academy at Rome, where he went in 1672. His best productions after this were The Virgin Careasing the Infant and The Holy Family. He died in 1707. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Coypell, Noel Nicolas, a French painter, was born in 1692, and was a son of Noel by a second marriage. He received his first instruction from his father, after which he studied in the Academy of Paris, and in 1728 was elected a member of that institution. His best works are the ceiling of the chapel of the Virgin in the Church of St. Saviour, and the altar-piece in the same chapel, representing The Assumption. He died in 1735. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Coysevox, ANTOINE, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Lyons in 1640. Before he was seventeen he distinguished himself by a statue of the Virgin, and immediately went to Paris, where he studied under Lersambert and other masters. He produced some fine works, among which were the tomb of cardinal Mazzarin, and the monument of Charles le Brun, in the Church of St. Nicolas. He died at Paris, Oct. 10, 1720. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cozad, JACOB, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born July 2, 1819. He experienced religion in early life, received license to exhort in 1841, and in 1842 entered the Indiana Conference. In it he labored faithfully to the close of his life, April 13, 1863. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 212.

Cozza, CARLO, an Italian painter, son and scholar of Giovanni Battista, was born at Ferrara about 1700. He painted several pictures for the churches of his native city, among which are The Annunciation, in the Chiesa Nuova; St. Antonio, in Santa Lucia; and St. Francesco da Paolo, in San Matteo. He died at Ferrara in 1769.

Cozza, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, was born at Istilo, in Calabria, in 1605, and studied at Rome under Domenichino. One of his best works was at Rome, and represented the Vergine del Riscatto, in the Church of Santa Francesca Romana. He died at Rome in 1682. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cozza, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian painter, was born at Milan in 1676, and settled at Ferrara while very young, where he executed many works for the churches. The principal are, The Conception, in the cathedral; The Holy Family, in the Church of Ognisanti; The Assumption, in San Guglielmo; and The Annunciation, in Santa Lucia. He died at Ferrara in 1742. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cozza, Lorenzo, an Italian theologian, was born near Bolsena, March 31, 1654. He entered the order of the Observantists, and after having been successively professor of theology and vice-commissary of his order, was elected its minister-general, May 15, 1723. In December, 1726, Benedict XIII created him cardinal, and he was afterwards promoted to several other ecclesiastical offices. He died at Rome, Jan. 18, 1729, leaving various historical and archaeological works in Latin, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Cozzando, Leonardo, an Italian biographer, was born at Rovato, near Brescia, in 1620. At the age of twelve he entered the order of Servites, and while young taught philosophy at Verona and Vienna. He afterwards became professor of theology, and regent of the College of St. Alexander of Brescia. At the age of twenty-five he was elected member of the Academy of the Erranti. He died Feb. 7, 1702, leaving, Corsi di Pema (Brescia, 1645):—Ritratto dei Prelati della sua Religione (ibid. 1678):—Vite del P. Paolo Cigone e del P. Ottavio Pantagolo:—De Mugisterio Antiquarum Philosopharum (Cologne, 1682; Geneva, 1684):—Librarius Bresciana (Brescia, 1694); this work contains the lives of five hundred and thirty authors:—Vago e Curioso Ritratto Profano e Sagro dell' Historia Bresciana (ibid. cod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cozzens, Samuel Woodward, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Mayfield, N. Y., Oct. 25, 1801. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1828, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1831; was ordained at Marblehead, Mass.; became colleague of Rev. Samuel Dana in 1832; in 1837 pastor at Milton; and in 1847 acting pastor of the Second Church, Milton, remaining there until 1851. The Kingsborough (N. Y.) Presbyterian Church was the next in which he labored in the same capacity; and in 1858 he was installed in the Presbyterian Church at Mount Vernon, from which he was dismissed in 1859. During the next nine years he was acting pastor at Weybridge, Vt.; then, in the same relation, he served the Church at South Plymouth, Mass., from 1868 to 1872. He died in Medfield, Aug. 7, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 422.

Crabb, John M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Garrard County, Ky., in 1804. He was educated in the Miami University, Oxford, O., and studied theology in the Western Seminary at Allegheny, Pa. In 1838 he was licensed to preach, and engaged at Eaton and Alexandria; subsequently he was pastor of Lima, West Bethesda, and Union churches, in Ohio. He died March 17, 1859. He was a devoted laborer and one of the pioneers of the Church. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 69.

Crabbe, George, an English poet and divine, was born at Aldborough, Suffolk, Dec. 24, 1754. When fourteen years of age, being tolerably grounded in mathematics and classics, he was apprenticed to a surgeon near Bury St. Edmunds, but had no liking for the profession, and ultimately proceeded to London to make a trial of literature. For a time he was very unfortunate. At last, when threatened with arrest for debt, he made his case known to Edmund Burke, who received him in a very kindly manner, brought him into his family, introduced him to Fox, Reynolds, Johnson, and other distinguished men, and gave him his criticism and advice concerning the poem of The Library, which was published in 1781 (2d ed. 1783), and was favorably noticed. By the assistance of Burke he was enabled to prepare himself for admission to holy orders. In 1782 he was ordained curate of his native place, and shortly after appointed chaplain to the duke of Rutland, at Belvoir Castle. In 1785 he was presented to two small livings in Dorsetshire, in 1789 exchanged them for others in the vale of Belvoir, and in 1813 was preferred to the rectory of Trowbridge, which he held until his death, Feb. 8, 1832. Mr. Crabbe, in addition to the work above mentioned, published, The Village (1783):—The Newspaper (1785):—The Parish Register (1807):—The Borough (1810):—Tales in Verse (1812):—Tales of the Hall (1819). See The North American Review, 1834, p. 135; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crabbe, Dirk and Wouter, two brothers, were very eminent Dutch painters on glass, born at Gouda, in Holland, and flourished about 1560. They executed many works of great merit, especially the magnificent windows of the great church at Gouda, on which are represented, The Nativity, Christ Driving the Money-changers from the Temple, The Death of Holofernes, and The Profanation of the Temple by Heliodorus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Crabtree, Abraham, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Heptonstall, near Halifax, in 1785. He entered the ministry in 1811, and died on the Pateley-Bridge Circuit, June 15, 1851. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851.

Crabtree, William, an English Baptist minister, was born near Heptonstall, Yorkshire, March 20, 1806. He was baptized June 14, 1827, studied under the Rev. R. Ingham; after a year's service in Duffield, Derbyshire, was assistant minister, for a time, with Rev. J. Taylor, at Hinckley, Leicestershire, and then removed to Lineholm, in Yorkshire, where he died, May 9, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1855, p. 47. (J. C. S.)

Craddock, John, D.D., an Irish prelate, born at Wolverham, and educated at Cambridge, became rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and subsequently chaplain to the duke of Bedford. He accompanied that nobleman to Ireland in 1757, was soon after elected to the see of Kilmore, and on Dec. 4 of the same year was consecrated. In 1772 he was translated to the see of Dublin. In 1773 he was one of the eighteen peers who protested against the passing of a bill for securing the repayment of money lent by Papists to Protestants on mortgages of land. He died Dec. 11, 1778. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Bps. of Dublin, p. 844.

Craddock, Thomas, a missionary of the Church of England, was born at Wolverham, Bedfordshire, in 1718, and was educated at Cambridge. An attachment having sprung up between a sister of the duchess of Bedford and Thomas, he was persuaded by her friends to migrate to Maryland, where it is believed that he arrived in 1742. In October of that year the General Assembly passed an act for the erection of a chapel about twelve miles from Baltimore, to be called St. Thomas's. In 1745 it was made an independent parish. Mr. Craddock became its minister the same year, also keeping a school for several years. Between 1750 and 1753 he preached a sermon which made considerable impression, urging the necessity of electing a bishop in the colony. In 1753 he published a version of the Psalms in heroic verse. About 1763 Mr. Craddock became physically paralyzed, but retained his mental vigor, and continued to fulfil his Sabbath appointments until his death, May 7, 1770. He was a man of varied learning, an intense student, and a preacher of considerable power. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 111.

Craddock, Zachary, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1633, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. Some years after he was made canon residentiary of Chichester, and elected fellow of Eton College in 1672. In 1680 he was chosen provost of Eton. He died Oct. 16, 1695. Dr. Cradock is known to the world by the high character given him by his contemporaries, and by two fine sermons; viz., one on Providence, the other On the Great End and Design of Christianity. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crafts, ELIPHALET PORTER, a Unitarian minister, was born at North Bridgewater (now Brockton), Mass., Nov. 23, 1800. He was fitted for college by his father, who was a clergyman (a graduate of Harvard College in 1785), and graduated from Brown University in 1821. After being engaged for some time in teaching and occasional preaching, he was ordained in November, 1828, and settled in East Bridgewater, where he remained nearly eight years. In 1839 he became pastor in Sandwich, and continued until 1854. After this he resided in East Lexington, teaching, and preaching in vacant pulpits, as he had opportunity. Next, he was minister at Eastport, Me., from 1866 to 1876, and in the latter year removed to Waltham, Mass., where he died, Jan. 16, 1880. See Brown University Necrology, 1879-80. (J. C. S.)

Cragg, GEORGE, an English Congregational minister, was born in January, 1793. He joined the Church in early manhood, was ordained at Boroughbridge about 1827, labored there about seventeen years with great success, accepted a call to Leyburn, Yorkshire, where he preached fourteen years, and then removed to Harrogate, where he died, Dec. 1, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 319.

Craghead. See CRAIGHEAD.

Craig, Edward, an English divine, graduated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, and was curate at Glentworth and Saxxy; successively at Watton and Clapham; St. James's, Edinburgh; Staines, Burton-Latimer, and, lastly, perpetual curate of St. James's, Pentonville: in all which places he was eminently useful. He died in 1850. Among his writings are, Patriarchal Piety (1826):—Sermons (1828). See (Lond.) Christian Guardian, April, 1850, p. 199; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Craig, Elijah, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia about 1740, and converted at the age of twenty-four. In 1765 he began to hold religious services in his own tobacco-house, and continued to preach as opportunity presented. He was once imprisoned for so doing, but nevertheless continued his labors. In 1786 he removed to Kentucky, where he died in 1808. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 71-73. (J. C. S.)

Craig, John (1), a Baptist minister, was born in Dublin, Ireland. He came to Maryland, joined the Methodists, served on the British side in the war of independence, went to Nova Scotia in 1784, travelled through the province as a preacher; was ordained pastor of a Baptist Church at Ragged Island; removed to Connecticut in 1782, and remained there two years. He then returned to Nova Scotia, where he died, Dec. 13, 1787, in his eighty-eighth year. See Bill, Hist. of Baptists in the Maritime Provinces, p. 232.

Craig, John (2), a pioneer Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, Sept. 21, 1710, but was educated in America. He was licensed by the Donegal Presbytery in 1738, sent to Deer Creek, Md., and in 1739 to Opequon Irish Tract, and other places in western Virginia. In 1740 he was ordained pastor at Shenandoah and South River, resigned in 1754, and died April 21, 1774. He was a man mighty in the Scriptures, in perils often, in labors abundant. (W. P. S.)

Craig, John Liggett, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Allegheny, Pa., Dec. 7, 1828. He graduated at Duquesne College, Pittsburgh, in 1846; studied theology in the Associate Reformed Seminary, Allegheny; was licensed by Monongahela Associate Reformed Presbytery in 1850, and in 1854 accepted a call to the Reformed Presbyterian Church at Princeton, Ind. In 1864 he was appointed chaplain of the 17th regiment Indiana Veterans. He died in July, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 260.

Craig, J. N., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, born in 1814, was licensed to preach by New Brunswick Presbytery, in 1836; pastor at Rogersville and New Providence, Tenn.; afterwards twenty-two years in Columbus, Miss., and six years in St. Louis, Mo.; professor of moral science in the University of Mississippi until 1880. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1863. He died May 15, 1882. He was a man of superior intelligence and strong character. See Christian Observer, May 24, 1882.

Craig, Lewis, a Baptist minister, was born in Orange County, Va., about 1737, and converted in 1765.

Being arrested June 4, 1768, while engaged in public worship, and thrown into jail at Fredericksburg, he preached to crowds of people through the prison bars. In 1770 he became pastor of the Upper Spottsylvania Church. In 1771 he was again imprisoned three months. After preaching in several places in Kentucky, he was pastor of South Elkhorn Church about nine years. In 1792 he moved to Bracken County, Ky., in which he organized several churches. He died suddenly about 1828. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 285. (J. C. S.)

Craig, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born in Edinburgh in 1780. He was converted in early life; received his ministerial training at Homerton College; and was ordained in 1802 at Bocking, where he labored until his death, June 21, 1865. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 243.

Craig, Wheelock, a Congregational minister, was born at Augusta, Me., in July, 1824. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1843, in 1847 at the Bangor Theological Seminary, and for several years was engaged in teaching. In 1849 he was ordained in New Castle, and the next year accepted a call to the Trinitarian Church in New Bedford, Mass. In May, 1868, he went abroad for his health, but died at Neuchâtel, Switzerland, in November following. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 577, 578. (J. C. S.)

Craighead, Alexander, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He was licensed by Donegal Presbytery in 1734, and sent to Middle Octara and "over the river." He was ordained Nov. 18, 1735, but disputes arising from a difference of views, he was suspended. He joined Newcastle Presbytery in 1754; met with Hanover Presbytery in 1757, and was sent to Rocky River, in North Carolina, and to other vacancies. He died in March, 1766. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Craighead, John, a Presbyterian minister, a graduate of Princeton College, received ordination from Donegal Presbytery about 1767, and was pastor at Rocky Spring, Pa., until 1798. He died April 20, 1799. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Craighead, Robert, Sr., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1653; was ordained over the Presbyterian congregation at Castle Finn, County Donegal, Ireland, before 1661; went to Glasgow in June, 1689; had a call to fill vacancies in the city of Glasgow; returned to Ireland in 1690, and was admitted to Derry; went back to Glasgow in 1698; settled at his former charge about 1700, and died there in September, 1711, aged about seventy-eight years. He published An Answer to a Discourse on the Inventions of Men in Worship (1694):—Advice to Communicants (1695):—Advice for Assurance of Salvation (1702):—Answer to the Bishop of Derry's Second Admonition (1697):—Warning and Advice to the Christians (1701):—Walking with God (1712). See Faeti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 16, 18.

Craighead, Robert, Jr., an Irish Presbyterian minister, was born at Castle Finn, County Donegal, in 1684. He took his degree of A.M. at the University of Glasgow in 1702, studied divinity at Edinburgh and Leyden, and in 1709 was ordained colleague to Mr. Iredell, in Capel Street, or Mary's Abbey, Dublin, where he died, July 30, 1738. Both he and his father were brilliant and effective workers on behalf of the Irish Presbyterians. See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Craighead, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Scotland. He is said to have studied medicine as well as divinity, and, after being settled in Ireland for ten or twelve years, went, in 1715, to New England, and was employed in the ministry at Freetown, near Fall River, Mass., until 1723. In 1724 he was received by New Castle Presbytery, and became pastor at White Clay, Pa. In 1733 he was installed at Pequea, but was dismissed in 1786, and became a supply at Hanover Paxton, and Conedogwinnit. He was installed at Hopewell in 1788, and in April, 1789, he dropped dead in the pulpit. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Craighead, Thomas B., a Presbyterian minister, was ordained by the Presbytery of Orange in 1780. For a few months he preached at Sugar Creek, his native place, and then removed to Tennessee, where he was brought to trial before the presbytery for holding certain Pelagian views; and the controversy which arose lasted for many years. Mr. Craighead was one of the founders of Davidson Academy (afterwards Nashville University), and became its first president, which position he held for over two years. His publications are, A Sermon on Regeneration;—Letters to Rev. J. P. Campbell;—The Philosophy of the Human Mind (1833);—The Powers and Susceptibilities of the Human Mind (1834, 12mo);—A Defence of the Elkhorn Association (1822). Mr. Craighead excelled as an extemporaneous orator, but not as a writer. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Cramond, James, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1644; was licensed to preach in 1646; went to England as preacher to a regiment, for which he was debarred the privileges of a minister; but on his repentance the assembly readmitted him in 1650, and he was called to the living at Fearn in 1658. He died in 1690, aged about sixty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 831.

Cramond, Robert, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1764; was ordained minister of the Presbyterian Congregation at Etal in 1775, and admitted to the living at Yarrow in 1776. He died Feb. 14, 1791, aged fifty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 564.

Cramp, John Mockett, D.D., an eminent Baptist educator and author, was born at St. Peter's, Isle of Thanet, England, July 25, 1791, and educated at Stepney College. He was successively pastor at Southwark, London, in 1818; St. Peter's, Isle of Thanet, from 1827 to 1842 (part of the time assisting his father, Rev. Thomas Cramp), and Hastings in 1842. In 1844 he assumed the presidency of an unsuccessful Baptist College in Montreal, Canada, which he held until 1849. He was editor, in that city, of The Register from 1841 to 1849, of The Colonial Protestant (with Rev. W. Taylor, D.D.) in 1848 and 1849, and of The Pilot from 1849 to 1851. In 1857 he became president of Acadia College, Wolfville, N. S., and the remainder of his busy life he devoted to furthering the cause of Baptist education and religion in the maritime provinces. Until he resigned his position in 1869, his influence was pre-eminent in all questions of denominational and educational politics. He found his college weak and poor; he left it on a firm foundation, with an able staff of instructors, and a good attendance of students. The home and foreign mission enterprise and the temperance movement shared his earnest support. He died at his home in Wolfville, Dec. 7, 1881. Dr. Cramp was an eminent linguist and historian, a celebrated theologian, and as a patriotic scholar and in Church history had few equals in the dominion. His works are, A Text-book of Popery; or, A History of the Council of Trent (Lond. 1831; enlarg. ed. Lond. and N. Y. 1851, 8vo), a one-sided commentary on the history and decrees of the council, from the standpoint of a narrow and violent Protestantism; a valuable work, however, containing vast information:—The Reformation in Europe (Lond. 1844, 18mo):—Lectures for the Times (ibid. ed.):—Introductory Theological Address (Halifax, N. S., 1851):—Portraiture from Life, by a Bereaved Husband (ibid. 1862):—The Great Ejection of 1862 (ibid. ed.):—Catechism of Christian Baptism (ibid. and Phila. 1865, 18mo), an able presentation, answered by Rev. D. D. Currie:—History of the Baptists from the Apostolic Times to the Close of the 18th Century (Lond. 1868, 8vo, which has been translated into German), a work whose value is lessened by its dogmatic spirit:—Paul and Christ (ibid. and Halifax, 1873), a delightful and finely written book:—The Lamb of God (Edinb. 1874). His Memoirs of Madame Feller and of Dr. Cote are records of certain mission and educational work in the province of Quebec. See The Wesleyan, Feb. 3, 1882; Morgan, Biblioth. Canadensis, s. v.

Cramp, Stephen T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Sandhurst, Kent, England, May 21, 1842. He was converted in 1859, emigrated to the United States, entered the Wyoming Conference in 1864, and in it labored zealously until his decease, Jan. 19, 1870. He was fervent in spirit, and untiring in energy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 131.

Cramp, Thomas, an English Baptist minister, was born at St. Peter's, Isle of Thanet, in 1769. He was converted at the age of eighteen, and joined the Church at Shallows, near his birthplace; very soon commenced the work of the ministry, and took charge of the Church in his native place, St. Peter's, and died Nov. 17, 1851. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1852, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Cramp-rings are rings of precious metal, supposed to prevent cramp. They are attributed to Hospinian to the claim of Westminster Abbey to the possession of the ring given by St. John, in the guise of a pilgrim, to Edward the Confessor. On Good Fridays the kings of England used to bless finger-rings for this superstitious purpose.

Crampton, RALPH S., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Madison, Conn., Oct. 23, 1799. He studied theology in the seminary at Bangor, Me., was licensed by a Congregational association in 1827, and about 1837 joined the Detroit Presbytery. He was secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, agent for the New York Temperance Society for three years, and for the same length of time secretary of the Illinois State Temperance Society. He died in Rochester, N. Y., March 25, 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 212.

Cranach (or Kranach), LUCAS VAN, an old German painter and eminent engraver, was born at Cranach, in the province of Bamberg, in 1472. At an early period in life he entered into the service of the electoral house of Saxony, with one of the princes of which he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1493, and with another shared five years' imprisonment, after the fatal battle of Mühlberg. He died at Weimar, Oct. 16, 1558. The following are some of his principal works: Adam and Eve in Paradise; St. John Preaching in the Wilderness; The Passion of Our Saviour, in fourteen prints; The Twelve Apostles; St. Christopher Carrying the Infant Jesus. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Crandal (or Crandall), Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born at Friertown, R. I., in 1771. In 1774 his parents removed to Chester, N. S. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, ordained, in 1799, pastor at Sackville, N. B., and did the work of an evangelist all through the region in which he lived. In 1825 he itinerated in Prince Edward's Island. He died Feb. 20, 1858. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 286; Bill, Funeral Sermon. (J. C. S.)

Crandal, William Alfred, a Baptist minister, was born in Westmoreland County, N. B. He was ordained at Amherst in 1858; labored in Restigouche County as home missionary; became pastor at Norton, and at Elgin; preached at Lutes Mount, Moncton, and other localities under direction of the Home Mission Board, and died Dec. 17, 1876. See Baptist Year-book of N. S., N. B., and P. E. I., 1876, p. 35.

Crandall, Andrew Jackson, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Germantown, Chenango Co., N. Y., in 1813. He experienced conversion at thirteen; studied about three years at Cazenovia Seminary, and in 1834 connected himself with the Oneida Conference. In 1848 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference, in which he labored with zeal, fidelity, and marked success until his death in August, 1849. Mr. Crandall published two or three Addresses. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1850, p. 510; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 803.

Crandall, Peter, a Baptist minister, probably a brother of Joseph Crandal, was born in Rhode Island in 1770. When he was five years of age his father removed to Chester, N. S. He commenced preaching in 1800; travelled extensively and successfully; was pastor at Digby for twenty-nine years, and died April 2, 1838. See Bill, Hist. of Baptists in the Maritime Provinces, p. 229.

Crandall, Phineas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Montville, Conn., Sept. 12, 1793. He was converted when about twenty years of age; licensed to exhort in 1817; to preach in 1818; in 1820 joined the New England Conference; in 1864 became a supernumerary; in 1856 a superannuate, and died Nov. 5, 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 51.

Crandall, Smith, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the Georgia Conference, and died in 1840, in Cherokee County, Ga. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1842, p. 302.

Crandall, Timothy, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in 1790. He was converted at the age of seventeen; united with the Society of Friends, and for twenty-one years was an acceptable minister in that denomination. In 1843 he joined a Free-will Baptist Church; made himself highly useful as a preacher, especially in Otselic, N. Y., and died in Smyrna, May 15, 1853. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1855, p. 85. (J. C. S.)

Crandon, PHILIP, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rochester, Mass., Jan. 4, 1810. He experienced religion in 1823; was licensed to preach in 1834, and in 1835 entered the New England Conference. He died at his post in 1875 or 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 74.

Crane, Caleb, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Tennessee about 1801, of pious parents. He was converted when about seventeen, and in 1822 was admitted into the Kentucky Conference. About 1832 he removed to Cape Girardeau County, Mo., and in 1849 entered the Missouri Conference. He died Nov. 22, 1851. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 131.

He graduated at Nassau Hall (College of New Jersey) in 1799; was licensed by the Morris County Presbytery in 1803, and preached at Chester. In 1808 he accepted a call to Fishkill, N. Y., and in 1820 took charge of a Congregational Church in Waterbury, Conn. In 1825 he returned to Fishkill, taught school for two years, and then accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Chester, N. J. He died at Cornwall, N. Y., in April, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 179.

Crane, D. M., a Baptist minister, was born at Brookline, Vt., Feb. 25, 1812. He joined the Baptist Church at the age of sixteen, and three years afterwards was licensed to preach. He studied at Shelburne Falls and Middleborough, Mass., took a partial course at Brown University, was ordained in June, 1837, at Brookline, Vt., remaining one year; afterwards was pastor at Grafton for four years, and at North Springfield three years. His subsequent pastorates were at Northampton, three years; Union Baptist Church, Boston, twelve; North Dorchester, Mass., six; Woonsocket, R. I., two, and for brief periods in three or four other places; his last being at Northampton. He died at West Acton, Sept. 4, 1879. See The Watchman, Oct. 30, 1879. (J. C. S.)

Crane, Eber, a Baptist minister, was born in Killingworth, Conn., May 3, 1808. When he was eight years old his parents removed to Marietta, O. At the age of seventeen he united with the Church, and for a time studied at South Reading, now Wakefield, and in Newton Theological Institution. He was ordained at Amesbury, Mass., Sept. 30, 1832; became a missionary in the West; subsequently was pastor at Akron, McConnelville, Garrettsville, and for short periods at other points in Ohio. In August, 1853, he took up his residence in Mount Pleasant, Ia., and for many years devoted himself to the service of feeble churches in the neighborhood in which he lived. He died early in April, 1884. See Chicago Standard, April 17, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Crane, Elias Winans, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Elizabeth, N. J., March 18, 1796. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1814, and spent the next two years in teaching. He then studied theology at Princeton for one year; became stated supply in Morristown for one year; was ordained by the Presbytery of New Jersey, Jan. 5, 1820; was pastor at Springfield, N. J., till 1826, and thereafter at Jamaica, L. I., until his death, Nov. 10, 1840. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 24.

Crane, Elijah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bethel, Vt., about 1800. He was converted in 1816; received license to exhort in 1818; to preach in 1821, and in 1822 entered the New York Conference. In 1833 he was transferred to the Ohio Conference, became a member of the Michigan Conference on its formation, and labored faithfully until 1859, when his health failed. He died April 23, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 193.

Crane, Nathaniel M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at West Bloomfield, N. J., Dec. 12, 1805. He was converted when about fifteen years of age; and, after spending two years in the Bloomfield Academy, entered Williams College, Mass., and was two years in the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and one year in that at Auburn, N. Y. In 1836 he was ordained by the Cayuga Presbytery, and sent to India as a missionary, where he remained for seven years; returning to America he preached as a supply through Western Pennsylvania until his death, Sept. 21, 1859. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 83.

Crane, Origen, a Baptist minister, was born at Mansfield, Conn., July 26, 1804. Without taking a collegiate course he graduated at the Newton Theological Institution in 1836; soon after was ordained at Newton Upper Falls, Mass., remaining for three years (1836-1839), and then removed to Weston, where he was pastor fourteen years. He was for some years an agent of the American and Foreign Bible Society, and for a time was a supply at New England Village, Grafton, and West Sutton. He died at New England Village, April 20, 1860. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopædia. (J. C. S.)

Crane, Robert E., a Wesleyan Methodist minister in Nova Scotia, was born at Grand Pré (Horton) in 1818. He entered the ministry in 1846; became a supernumerary in 1867; and died in Halifax, June 28, 1872. See Minutes of Conference of Eastern British America, 1872, p. 9.

Crane, Robert H., a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was a native of Nova Scotia. He labored in his native province from 1818 until 1832, and afterwards in the West Indies, principally St. Vincent, on which he died, at Kingstown, Feb. 3, 1839. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1839, p. 431.

Crane, Silas Axelle, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born at Berkeley, Mass., Oct. 21, 1799. He graduated from Brown University in 1823, taught one year, and was then tutor of mathematics in the university (1824-1828). He studied theology under Rev. Dr.

N. B. Crocker, of Providence, R. I.; was ordained deacon in 1832; was rector of St. Stephen's Church in Middlebury, Vt. (1833-1837), and then removed to St. Louis, Mo., to take the presidency of Kemper College. After two years he became rector of St. Luke's Church, in East Greenwich, where he died, July 16, 1872. (J. C. S.)

Crane, Simeon Harrison, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, N. J., March 8, 1800. He graduated (from what college is uncertain) in 1823; studied theology for two years at Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained Aug. 11, 1827; stated supply at Bethel, Ky., from 1827 to 1831; agent for the Board of Domestic Missions in 1831; stated supply at Lebanon, O., from 1833 to 1839; agent for New Albany Seminary, Ind., in 1840; and died in Lexington, Ky., Aug. 30, 1841. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 44.

Crane, William Croes, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Bridgeton, N. J., in 1814. He received a military education at West Point, N. Y.; was ordained deacon in 1837; for several years, until 1856, was rector in Centreville, Md.; subsequently, for a short time, in Baltimore; and at St. Andrew's Church, Jackson, Miss., from 1858 until his death, March 21, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Craner, François Regis, a Swiss writer of the Jesuit order, was born at Lucerne in 1728. After the suppression of his order, he taught ancient literature at the gymnasium of his native city, where he died in 1806, leaving a German translation of the Æneid of Virgil (1783):—and Dramas, gathered from Swiss history. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Craner, Thomas, an English Particular Baptist, was pastor in Bedfordshire till the people fell into doctrinal error; in 1756 he settled at Jewin Street, London. In 1760 the Church removed to Red Cross Street, where he preached till his death, March 18, 1778, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. He published, A Declaration of the Faith and Practice of the Church of Christ:—A Scripture Manual, besides four separate Sermons. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 320.

Cranford, James, an English divine of the 17th century, was born at Coventry, Warwickshire, where his father was a divine and schoolmaster of great note. He was educated at Oxford, benefited in Northamptonshire, and afterwards removed to St. Christopher's, London. He died in 1657, leaving The Teares of Ireland (Lond. 1642, 12mo):—Sermon on Heresies (1646). He was a laborious preacher, an exact linguist, a subtle disputant, and an orthodox but charitable theologian. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 288.

Crankshaw, John Weir, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Adlington, near Bolton. He was converted at nine; began to preach at sixteen; spent three years at the Didsbury Institution; took his first circuit in 1847; spent fifteen years in the active work; and died at Bristol, Jan. 22, 1869, in the forty-fourth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 18.

Cranley, Thomas, D.D., an Irish prelate, although a native of England, was a fellow of Merton College, varden of New College, and for a time chancellor of the University of Oxford. He was consecrated to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin in 1897. In 1898 he had letters of protection on proceeding to foreign parts in the service of the king, and in the following year had power to treat with the Irish. He was several times appointed lord chancellor. In 1417 he went to England, and died at Farringdon May 25 of that year. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 151; Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 207.

Cranmer, E. H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1812. He was converted in 1838, and in 1840 joined the Genesee Conference; served the Church with much success as pastor and presiding elder for many years until his health failed; and died Oct. 8, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 827.

7. WILLIAM, was promoted from being regent at the University of St. Andrews; appointed to the living at Kettle in 1589; was a member of the general assemblies of 1590, 1597, and 1602; subscribed the protest against introducing episcopacy in 1606; deprived in 1620; again presented to Kettle in 1623 by the king, but resigned before May, 1626, and died in January, 1633, aged seventy-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 495.

Cranston, Robert, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in the county Cavan, Aug. 1, 1785. He became a Christian in his eighteenth year, and an itinerant in 1811. After preaching for sixteen years, he retired on account of bodily affliction, and died July 12, 1836. In the Irish Conference of 1816, he, with seven other ministers, was reprehended for administering the Lord's Supper to the people of his charge. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1836; Smith, Hist. of West. Meth. iii, 23-25.

Cranston, Walter, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Newport, R. I., Dec. 12, 1789. Having studied under John Fraser, in Newport, and graduated at Harvard College in 1810, he took a voyage to the island of Trinidad, and, returning in 1811, went to Charleston, S. C., and afterwards to Cambridge for study. In the autumn he was appointed Greek tutor in the university, and held the position until 1815, studying theology meanwhile. Part of the time he officiated as lay-reader in the Episcopal Church at Cambridge. Jan. 20, 1815, he was ordained deacon. After resigning his tutorship he went to Savannah, Ga., and became pastor of Christ Church in the fall of 1815. The next year he was ordained presbyter, and returned to Savannah to resume his pastoral duties. On two occasions, when yellow fever invaded the city, he remained at his post. His health failing, he went to Middletown, Conn., and died there, July 25, 1822. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 580.

Cranz, Friedrich Alexander Leopold, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 12, 1807, at Berlin. He studied there and in Halle, was ordained in 1833, and appointed military preacher at Torgau. In 1840 he was called as first military preacher to Posen, was in 1846 member of consistory, and in 1854 general superintendent of the province of Posen, and died Aug. 28, 1878. He was one of the most faithful leaders of the Evangelical Church in his country. (B. P.)

Crapsey, Jacob, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in 1767. He was baptized in Ontario, N. Y., in 1822; soon after was ordained, and for ten years engaged in the work of preaching the gospel. He removed to Royalton in 1826, where he died in October, 1832. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1834, p. 65. (J. C. S.)

Crapster, William Thomas, a Unitarian minister, was born Feb. 29, 1824, near Lisbon, Md. In 1851 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, but graduated from the divinity school of Harvard University in 1856. He was licensed by the Boston Association in 1854, and ordained an evangelist June 16, 1857, and preached occasionally in various places, both in the North and South. He died Feb. 5, 1879. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 55.

Crashaw, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Cheetham Hill, Manchester, in 1811. He was converted at seventeen, appointed to his first circuit in 1834, to his last (Kettering) in 1869, and died suddenly, May 22, 1870. He wrote, Important Truths in Simple Verse:—Lectures to Children (Lond. 1853, 18mo):—Conversations about Wesley:—Facts about Boys for Boys. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1870, p. 34.

Crashaw, Richard, an English clergyman and poet, was born in London, and educated at the Charterhouse, and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1637. He took orders and became distinguished as an eloquent preacher, but was ejected in 1644 for refusing to take the covenant. He then removed to France and embraced Romanism. Having been reduced to great pecuniary distress, he received, through the influence of Henrietta Maria, the positions of secretary to one of the cardinals and canon of the church of Loretto. He died about 1650. Among his best known pieces are, Hymn to the Name of Jesus:—Music's Duel:—Lines on a Prayer-book; and some of his translations. His poetry consisted principally of religious invocations and translations of rare merit from the Latin and Italian. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crashaw, William, an English clergymen, father of Richard Crashaw, was preacher at the Temple, London, at the beginning of the 17th century, and a violent opponent of Romanism. He published, Roman Forgeries, and Falsifications of Authors (1606):—News from Italy of a Second Moses, etc. (1608):—Fiscus Populis (1617):—The Jesuites Gospel, written by themselves, Laid Open and Reproved (1641); and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crashfield, Richard, an English martyr, was burned at Norwich in 1557, because he refused the doctrines and ceremonies of the Romish Church. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 398.

Crassellius, Bartholomæus, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Wermisdorf, near Glauchau, Feb. 21, 1677. He was a pupil of A. H. Franke, and died while pastor at Dusseldorf, Nov. 10, 1724. He composed about nine hymns, of which has been translated into English, "Heiligster Jesu, Heilungsquelle," by Mills, in Hortæ Germanicæ, p. 287: "Most holy Jesus! Fount Unfailing," and "Dir, dir Jehovah will ich sing-en," by Winkworth (Chorale Book for England, No. 117): "Jehovah, let me now adore Thee." See Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenlebens, iv, 418 sq. (B. P.)

Crasset, Jean, a French ascetic theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Dieppe, Jan. 3, 1618. He taught in the colleges of his order, distinguished himself as a preacher, and died at Paris, Jan. 4, 1692. His principal works are, Méthode d'Oruison (Paris, 1673):—Méditations pour tous les Jours de l'Année (ibid. 1678: translated into German, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, and Latin):—Le Chrétien en Solitude (ibid. 1683; latest ed. 1860):—La Douce et Sainte Mort (ibid. 1681):—Dissertation sur les Oracles des Sibylles (ibid. 1678, 1684):—Vie de Madame Hélyot (ibid. 1683):—Histoire de l'Eglise du Japon (ibid. 1689, 1715); this work is largely gathered from that of Solier upon the same subject, published in 1627:—La Foi Victorieuse de l'Infidélité et du Libertinage (ibid. 1698):—Des Congrégations de Notre-Dame Erigées dans les Maisons des Jésuites (ibid. 1694):—Abrégé de la Vie de Claude Hélyot, at the beginning of the Œuvres Spirituelles de M. Hélyot (ibid. 1710). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Crasso, Damiano, a Dominican of Rivoli, in Piedmont, who died at Pavia in 1515, is the author of Commentarius super Iobum:—De S. Joannis Affinitate et Consanguinitate cum Christo Domino. See Niger, De Scriptor. Flor.; Echard, De Scriptoribus Ordinis Dominicanorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Crasso, Francesco, an Italian prelate and jurist, was of an ancient family of Milan. He studied law, and practiced in his native city in 1528. He afterwards fulfilled various public functions. Pius IV appointed him protonotary and governor of Bologna, and in 1565 he was made cardinal. He died at Rome, Sept. 1, 1566, leaving, Novæ Constitutiones (1541):—Orationes (1541, 1559):—Commentaria in Jus Civile:—Carmina. The poems of Crasso are found in the Rime della Signora Tullia d'Aragona (Venice, 1560). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cratæus of Thebes, a Cynic philosopher, son of Ascandus, flourished in the 4th century B.C. He went to Athens, where he became a disciple of Diogenes, and subsequently one of the most distinguished of the Cynics. He was at Thebes in 307 B.C. Crates was heir to a large fortune, which he bestowed upon his native city, or, according to one account, he placed in the hands of a banker, with instructions to give it to his sons in case they should become fools, but if they became philosophers, to bestow it upon the poor. He was in the habit of visiting every house in Athens and rebuking its inmates, from which circumstance he acquired the name of the "door-opener." In spite of the poverty to which he had reduced himself, and notwithstanding his ugly and deformed figure, he gained the affections of Hipparchia, the daughter of a family of distinction. She refused many wealthy suitors, and because of the opposition of her parents threatened to commit suicide. She finally gained the consent of her parents and was married to Crates. He wrote a book of fourteen letters on philosophical subjects, and some tragedies of an earnest and philosophical character, all of which have been lost. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. and Myth. s. v.; Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Crato is a probably imaginary "bishop of the Syrians," asserted by Prædestinatus (i, 33) to have been a successful antagonist of the heresy of Theodotus.

Craton is set down in old martyrologies as a martyr at Rome, celebrated Feb. 15.

Crauford (or Craufurde). See CRAWFORD.

Craven, Braxton, D.D., LL.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Raindolph County, N. C., Aug. 26, 1822. He studied in the Quaker school at New Garden, and afterwards at Union Institute (now Trinity College), of which he became principal in 1842. He was licensed to preach in 1840, and entered the North Carolina Conference in 1857. With the exception of two years in the pastorate, all his active life was spent at the head of Trinity College. He died at his post, Dec. 7, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 110.

Craven, Isaac N., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in North Carolina, Aug. 15, 1806. He removed to Georgia in early life, was converted, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was licensed to preach in 1832. He became a member of the Florida Conference in 1847. He united with the East Texas Conference in 1867, and subsequently became a member of the North Texas Conference. He died Aug. 6, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 347.

Craven, Wesley R., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Randolph County, N. C., April 15, 1856. His parents removed the following year to Missouri, where he was converted at fifteen years of age. He was licensed to preach in 1877, and the same year entered the St. Louis Conference on trial. He died near Richwoods, Aug. 4, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 367.

Craw, Paul, a Bohemian martyr, was taken at St. Andrews by bishop Henry, and delivered over to the secular power to be burned, for holding opinions contrary to the Church of Rome. He was burned in 1431. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iii, 600.

Craw, Peter, a Scotch clergyman, tutor in the family of Robert Veitch, was licensed to preach in 1802, and presented to the living at St. Boswell's (Presbytery of Selkirk) in 1810. He died March 21, 1834, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 553.

He died at Penpont, Aug. 7, 1856, aged fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 594.

14. THOMAS JACKSON, D.D., youngest son of the professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews, took his degree at that university in 1831; was licensed to preach in 1834; was presented to the living at Cultra the same year, and ordained; transferred to Glamis in 1838; promoted to St. Andrew's Church, Edinburgh, in 1844; appointed convener of the General Assembly's committee on psalmody in 1845, and for missions in 1850, which he held until 1854, was convener of the Home Missionary Committee in 1858; admitted professor of divinity at Edinburgh University in 1859, and elected moderator of the General Assembly in 1867. He died at Genoa, Italy, in 1875. Dr. Crawford published, Reasons for Adherence to the Church of Scotland (1843);—Presbyterianism Defended against Prelacy and Tractarianism (1853);—The Fatherhood of God Considered (1866);—The Doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the Atonement (1871);—and some single Sermons. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 486; iii, 771, 772.

15. WILLIAM (1), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1641; was presented to the manse and living at Ladykirk in 1651; conforming to episcopacy, he was collated to the living in 1662, but deposed in August, 1690, for drunkenness, he having been so charged fifteen years before. He died in 1695, aged eighty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 442.

16. WILLIAM (2), was born at Kelso in 1676; took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1700; was licensed to preach in 1712, called to the living at Wilton, and ordained in 1713. He died May 28, 1737. He published a sermon, Christ the Power of God, etc. (1731):—A Short Manual against Infidelity (1734). His Works were also printed (Edinb. 1748, 2 vols.). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 517.

17. WILLIAM (3), D.D., was licensed to preach in 1787; appointed to the living at Straiton in 1791, and ordained. Having been appointed professor of moral philosophy at the University of St. Andrews, he resigned his charge in 1816, and died Sept. 23, 1822, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 144.

Crawford, Alexander, a Baptist minister, was a native of Argyllshire, Scotland. He united with the Independent (Congregational) Church of the Isle of Arran at nineteen, went to Edinburgh to study under Haldane and Ewing, and was immersed. In 1811 he emigrated to Yarmouth, N. S., where he remained three years. In 1814 he removed to Prince Edward's Island, and labored with success in planting Baptist churches throughout the island. He died in March, 1828, aged forty-two. He published Believer Immersion as Opposed to Unbeliever Sprinkling (1827). See Bill, Hist. of the Baptists in the Maritime Provinces, p. 662.

Crawford, Alexander William. See LINDSAY, Lord.

Crawford, Andrew Jackson, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tennessee. He fought in the battle of New Orleans, in the war of 1812; embraced religion in his young manhood, and became a member of the Tennessee Conference in 1821. He was sent out by the United States government as a surveyor of lands in the Cherokee nation, and at the same time as missionary to the Indians. In 1835 he removed to Alabama, served some years as register of the land-office at Demopolis, and then united with the Alabama Conference. He spent his last years in retirement at his home in Marengo County, where he died in July, 1866. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 41.

Crawford, David Black, M.D., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina in 1794. He was licensed to preach in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, but changed his views and united with the Baptist Church, and was inducted into the ministry in 1839. He served as pastor the Mound Bluff Church, and the Albion and Antioch churches in Mississippi, near Vicksburg, and also practiced medicine quite successfully. He died Aug. 27, 1849. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 834.

Crawford, Edward, a Presbyterian minister, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover in 1777; on Oct. 27 of the same year became pastor at Sinking Spring and Spreading Spring, Va., and some time after 1786 at Glade Spring and Rocky Spring, Tenn., where he remained until 1803. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Crawford, George M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Abingdon County, Va., June 4, 1796. He was licensed and ordained by the Abingdon Presbytery in 1822, and preached for six years in Virginia and Kentucky. In 1839 he joined the Lexington Presbytery, Mo., and labored for some time as a missionary in that state with great zeal and ability. He died June 4, 1858. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 120.

Crawford, George W., A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Orange County, Ind. He removed to Green County in 1833, was converted in his youth, graduated at Asbury University in 1851, and in 1854 entered the North-western Indiana Conference, in which he filled important charges until his death, Aug. 9, 1859. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 297; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Crawford, Gilbert, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland. He studied at Princeton Theological Seminary one year (1821); was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1822; subsequently ordained, and served as supply at Le Roy, N. Y., and as pastor at Buffalo from 1827 to 1829; supply at Le Roy again in 1830, at Albion in 1833, and pastor soon after until 1835; supply of the First Church at Lockport for two years; went to Milwaukee, Wis., back again to New York, and preached at Albion, Boone Centre, and Le Roy up to 1846. He died in 1848. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 35.

Crawford, Henry Ellet, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Orange County, N. C., Dec. 1, 1832. He graduated at Hanover College, Ind., in 1859, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1862; was ordained, in 1863, pastor of Pleasant and Jefferson churches, in the bounds of the Madison Presbytery, Ind. He died Feb. 5, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 128.

Crawford, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., Nov. 28, 1794. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1826, and Princeton Theological Seminary in 1829; was ordained missionary in 1828; was first pastor at Delphi, Ind., and then supply at Hopewell and Nayburn, also preaching at Graysville, until 1851. He subsequently became a member of the Presbytery of Vincennes, and died at Morning Sun, Ia., July 18, 1872. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 44; Presbyterian, Aug. 10, 1872.

Crawford, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, N. Y. He was converted in childhood; licensed to exhort at the age of eighteen; in 1838 to preach, while a student at the Oneida Conference Seminary, and admitted to the Indiana Conference. With the exception of a three years' rest as supernumerary, from 1866 to 1869, he labored zealously until his death in 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 90.

Crawford, James B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Durham, Me., Dec. 22, 1828. He was converted at eleven; obtained his education at Kent's Hill; began preaching in 1852, and in 1856 entered the East Maine Conference. He commenced his labors at Bucksport Seminary in 1859, and was connected with that institution until his death, March 31, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 145.

Crawford, James Y., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in South Carolina in 1802. He was converted in 1818; admitted into the Holston Conference in 1820; located from ill-health in 1836; was readmitted in 1848, and labored faithfully until his death in 1850. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 272.

Crawford, John (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Fayette County, Pa., Sept. 28, 1799. He was converted when about sixteen; licensed to preach in 1820; in 1821 entered the Pittsburgh Conference, and in it continued to labor until his death, Feb. 29, 1832. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 214.

Crawford, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at White Plains, N. Y. He commenced his ministry in 1835, served various important charges in New York and its vicinity, and died while on a visit to his son in London, O., Sept. 28, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 81.

Crawford, John B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Crawford, N. Y., in 1814. He graduated from Rutgers College in 1836, and from New Brunswick Seminary in 1839; was licensed by the Classis of Orange the same year; was pastor at Middletown Village, Monmouth Co., N. J., from November, 1839, to October, 1840, when he died. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 224.

Crawford, John H., a minister of the German Reformed Church South, was born in Carroll County, Md., July 23, 1801. He was received into the Church under the Rev. Jacob Geiger; studied theology at Carlisle, Pa., under the Rev. Dr. Lewis Mayer; was ordained in 1828, and sent as a missionary to North Carolina, where he labored faithfully and with great success up to the time of his removal to Augusta County, Va., where he died, Oct. 9, 1864. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Ref. Church, iv, 219-223. (D. Y. H.)

Crawford, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the travelling connection in 1797. He occupied many of the most important appointments in the New England and New York Conferences, and had great success; but in 1820 was expelled from the New York Conference, for some cause now unknown, after which he entirely disappeared. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1797-1820; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 99; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, iv, 49, 63, 312.

Crawford, Nathaniel Macon, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born near Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., Ga., March 22, 1811. He graduated from the University of Georgia in 1829, was admitted to the bar of that state, but did not enter upon the practice of the law, having been chosen professor of mathematics in Oglethorpe University, which position he held until 1841. About that time he became a Baptist, received license to preach in 1843, and was ordained in 1844. For the next three years he was pastor, first in Washington, Ga., and then in Charleston, S. C. In 1847 he became professor of Biblical literature in Mercer University, Ga.; in 1854 was elected president of the university; in 1857 was called to the chair of mental and moral philosophy in the University of Mississippi, and soon after in the Western Theological Seminary at Georgetown, Ky. In the autumn of 1858 he returned as president to Mercer University, but during the civil war accepted the presidency of the Baptist Institution at Georgetown, Ky., remaining there until 1871, when he resigned on account of impaired health. He died at Atlanta, Ga., Oct. 27, 1871. Dr. Crawford took a high rank, both as a scholar and as a preacher, in the South. He published a few works, in which were exhibited the results of his scholarship and the charms of a graceful style. (J. C. S.)

Crawford, Oshea W., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Brunswick, Me., in November, 1809. When he was eight years of age his parents removed to Chautauqua County, N. Y. He became a Christian at fifteen, was licensed to preach in 1829, and ordained in 1834. He preached in Canada West, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, and died at Chesterfield, Lucas Co., O., March 10, 1846. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1850, p. 78. (J. C. S.)

Crawford, Peter, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia in 1809. He began to preach about 1831; studied in what is now Richmond College, Va.; in 1835 established a school, which became the Judson Female Institute, at Marion, Ala.; for some time taught in Central Female College, Miss., and from 1866 to 1871 was president of a female college at Keachi, De Soto Parish, La. He died April 25, 1873. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 291. (J. C. S.)

Crawford, William, D.D., an Irish clergyman, was ordained minister of Strabane in 1766. In 1784, upon the request of the synod of Ulster, he undertook the instruction of candidates for the ministry in logic, mathematics, and philosophy, and afterwards enlarged the course of instruction to that of a college course. In 1794 he became pastor at Hollywood, where he died in 1801. Dr. Crawford was a man of considerable learning and great application, but his religious views were decidedly anti-evangelical. He was the author of Remarks on Lord Chesterfield's Letters:—History of Ireland (2 vols.):—and published two Sermons, besides translations from Turretine's Dissertations on Natural Theology. See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Crawford, William H. (1), a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greene County, Ga., March 31, 1825. He was converted at the age of fourteen; licensed to preach in 1844; in 1845 was admitted into the Georgia Conference, and labored diligently until his death, July 15, 1847. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1847, p. 137.

Crawford, William H. (2), a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Giles County, Va., Dec. 12, 1842. He was converted when a boy; licensed to preach in 1869; in 1873 joined the Holston Conference, and labored therein faithfully until his health failed, a year before his death, which occurred in Watauga County, N. C., March 2, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 144.

Crawley, Arthur R. R., a Baptist missionary, was born at Sydney, Cape Breton, in 1831. He graduated from Acadia College, N. S., in 1849, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1852. Under the auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union, he sailed to Henzada, Burmah, in December, 1853, and in the following October commenced his labors there, achieving great success. He made a visit to the United States in 1868, and another in 1872. He died Oct. 9, 1876. See Amer. Baptist Magazine, lvii, 180. (J. C. S.)

Crawley, Sarah, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Hitchin, Hertfordshire, in 1717. She was converted in early life, itinerated as a preacher through different parts of Great Britain and Ireland, and died in London in February, 1799. See Piety Promoted, iii, 288. (J. C. S.)

Crayer (or Cræyer), GASPAR DE, a very eminent Flemish painter, was born at Brussels in 1582, and studied for a short time under Raphael van Coxie of that city. One of his best pictures, for the refectory of the abbey of Afflighem, represents A Centurion Dismounting to Worship the Saviour. His principal painting is at Brussels, in the Church of Notre Dame, Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalene; others in different churches are, The Assumption, The Descent of the Holy Ghost, and The Resurrection. He died at Ghent, Jan. 27, 1669. See Hofer, Nour. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Creagh, Peter (1), D.D., an Irish prelate, was appointed to the see of Cork in 1676; imprisoned in 1680; about 1686 translated to the archdiocese of Tuam; and promoted to the archbishopric of Dublin, March 9, 1693. In 1695 the acts were revived, prohibiting the foreign or domestic education of Catholics, and in 1697 all the Popish prelates, vicars-general, deans, monks and others, who exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Ireland, were ordered to depart before May 1, 1698. Whatever was the promise of the earlier period of Creagh's administration, it was soon overcast by the succession of Anne. He was obliged to flee to the continent, and died at Argentinia (Strasbourg), in 1705 or 1707. See Dr. Alton, Memoirs of the Bps. of Dublin, p. 457; Brady, Episcopal Succession, i, 358; ii, 91.

Creagh, Peter (2), an Irish prelate, was made titular bishop of Avaro in 1745, bishop of Waterford in 1750, and died in 1774. See Brady, Episcopal Succession, ii, 74.

Creaghead. See CRAIGHHEAD.

Creak, Alexander, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, April 16, 1785, and was converted in 1801. He studied first in Hackney College, and then in Homerton College in 1809; entered the pastorate at Burnham Westgate, Norfolk, in August, 1810; resigned in November, 1813; was pastor at Yarmouth from April, 1814, until the failure of his health in 1842, and died Sept. 1, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 220.

Creak, Henry Brown, A.M., an English Congregational minister, was born at Yarmouth, March 25, 1821. He was converted early in life; studied in a German university, and at Spring Hill College, Birmingham; was ordained at Atherstone in 1845; was professor in Airedale College from 1848 to 1863, and died Feb. 10, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 230.

Cream-box is a vulgar name for a chrismatory.

Creamer, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., March 19, 1791. He was left an orphan at the age of ten; converted at eighteen; and in 1816 entered the Philadelphia Conference, wherein he continued with acceptance and usefulness until his death, April 25, 1827. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1827, p. 542; Methodist Magazine, x, 376.

Crease, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Stirling, and educated by the United Presbyterian Church. He became pastor at Wilmslow, Cheshire, in 1844, and labored there very successfully until December, 1849. In the spring of 1850 he removed to Hazelgrove, but died in May of the same year, in the fortieth year of his age. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1850, p. 93.

Creath, William, a Baptist minister, was born in Nova Scotia, Dec. 25, 1768, of Presbyterian parents. He was converted when about seventeen years old, removed to North Carolina at twenty, joined a Baptist Church, and soon after commenced to preach, his labors being greatly blessed. For the last fifteen years of his life he gave himself very largely to itinerant work. He died suddenly at Edenton, N. C., Aug. 11, 1822. See Later-day Luminary, iv, 63. (J. C. S.)

Creaticōlæ (creature-worshippers) were a Christian sect which arose in the 6th century, headed by Severus of Antioch, who maintained that the body of Christ was corruptible, but in consequence of the God-head dwelling in it was never corrupted. See ARTHARTODOCTÆ.

Creda (Credan, or Credānus) is the name of two early English ecclesiastics:

1. An abbot of Mercia, A.D. cir. 775.
2. Abbot of Evesham, between Almund, A.D. 783 or 787, and Tintferth, A.D. 803.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. a. v.

Credence. We add the following particulars from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. a. v.:

"It either takes the form of a little table covered with a linen cloth—at Brabourne it is on the south side, and formed of black marble, with a cross in a circle carved on it—or is made like an umbray in the wall. In some churches a second table held the mass vestments of the bishop. The wall credence is often connected with a drain, is rare in the 19th (one occurs at Lanesanne), but is usual in the following century. Sometimes it occurs on the north and south sides of an altar; often it is divided by a thin slab of stone. When the pope celebrates on Easter-day there are three credences—two on the epistle side, one containing the deacon's plate, the second supporting two candles and necessaries required by the sacristan. The third, or pope's credence, is on the gospel side, where, at the end of the Creed, the sacristan washes the sacred vessels, drinks of the wine and the water, and finally, at the offertory, tastes the particles from which the hosts are prepared, at the command of the cardinal-deacon, as a precaution against poison. The first use of credences in the Roman ritual occurs in the time of Leo X, in 1510, and apparently was introduced when the custom of personal offering fell into desuetude."

Credi, Lorenzo Andrea di (called Sciarpelli), a reputable Florentine painter, was born about 1452, and studied under Andrea Verocchio at the same time with Leonardo da Vinci. He painted many Madonnas and Holy Families. He died about 1536. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Credūla. See ARISTO.

Cree, Hamilton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Carmichael, Pa., in 1811. He was received into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1838, retired after thirteen years' labor, and died at his home in Brooke County, W. Va., Sept. 21, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 248.

Cree, John, an Associate minister, was a native of Scotland, and came to the city of New York in 1791. He was ordained in 1792, and afterwards settled in Ligonier valley, near Pittsburgh, where he died after a few years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 32.

Cree Version of the Scriptures. There are two dialects of the Cree language, the difference between them consisting of the uniform substitution of certain consonants for others. One is called the Moose Fort, or East Main Cree, the other the Red River Cree. A complete Bible in the Eastern dialect for the Cree Indians in the Hudson's Bay Territories was printed in 1861, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in syllabic characters, the translation having been made by the Rev. W. Mason of the Church Missionary Society. In the Western dialect, the gospels of Mark and John, together with other parts of the New Test. and the Psalms, were printed, in the Roman character, since 1855, the translation having been made by archdeacon Hunter, for the benefit of the Cree Indians of the Saskatchewan valley, in Rupert's Land, who had also reduced the Cree to a written system. Up to March 31, 1882, altogether 83,590 copies were distributed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 448. (B. P.)

Creech, Thomas, an English poet and clergyman, was born near Sherborne, Dorsetshire, in 1659, and entered at Wadham College, Oxford, in 1675. In 1683 he was elected probationer fellow of All-Souls' College. Having taken orders in 1699, he was presented to the living of Welwyn, in Hertfordshire. He put an end to his life in June, 1700. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Creech, William, a Scotch clergyman, studied at Edinburgh University; became tutor to George Craunston; was licensed to preach in 1733; called to the living at Newbattle in 1738; ordained in 1739, and died Aug. 21, 1745, aged forty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 296, 297.

Creed. The following is the Greek text of the Apostles' Creed:

Πιστεύω εἰς ΘΕΟΝ ΠΑΤΕΡΑ, παντοκράτορα, ποιητὴν οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς.

Καὶ (εἰς) ἸΗΣΟΥΝ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΝ, υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ, τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν, τὸν συλληφθέντα ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου, γιννηθέντα ἐκ Μαρίας τῆς παρθένου, παθόντα ἐπὶ Ποντίου Πιλάτου, σταυρωθέντα, θανόντα, καὶ ταφέντα, κατελθόντα εἰς τὰ κατώτατα, τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ ἀναστάντα ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν, ἀνελθόντα εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς, καθεζόμενον ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ πατρὸς παντοδυνάμου, ἐκείθεν ἐρχόμενον κρῖναι ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς.

Πιστεύω εἰς τὸ ΠΝΕΥΜΑ ΤΟ ἍΓΙΟΝ, ἀγίας κα-τολικὴν ἐκκλησίαν, ἁγίους κοινωνίας, ἀφῆσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, σαρκὸς ἀνάστασιν, ζωὴν αἰώνιον. Ἀμήν.

Dr. Schaff, in his Creeds of Christendom (N. Y. 1877, 8 vols.), which is the latest, and in many respects the most complete, treatise on ecclesiastical symbolica, arranges the Apostles' Creed as in pages 162, 163.

Dr. Heurtley, in his valuable collection of creeds of the Western Church, which has been supplemented by two "University Programmes" by Dr. C. J. Caspari, professor of theology at the Norwegian University, published at Christiania in 1866 and 1869, traces the growth of the creed (as far as it can be traced) through Tertullian and Cyprian; then we must take a leap from Novatian (A.D. 250) to Rufinus, bishop of Aquileia (A.D.

390), the intermediate space of one hundred and forty years affording only one stepping-stone, furnished by the notes of the belief of Marcellus of Ancyra, which he delivered on his departure from Rome. The date of this is A.D. 341. We might have expected Marcellus to exhibit his belief in the words of the creed of Nicæa; the fact that he used another symbol is interesting for more reasons than one. It comes to us in Greek, and with the assurance that he had received it from the Scriptures, and been taught it by his forefathers in the Lord; by which he must have meant that he regarded it as in entire agreement with the Scriptures. The creed of Ancyra, then, must in substance have accorded nearly with the creed of Rome as we learn it from Rufinus, differing from it only in the following points, viz.: it omits the name Father in the first article; it reads "born of the Holy Ghost and of the Virgin Mary;" and at the end there is added the clause "eternal life." The annexed table (taken from Smith's Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.) shows the principal forms of the Apostles' Creed in Latin, the variations being printed in italics.

Creighton, James, an early Methodist preacher, was born at Moyne Hall, near Cavan, Ireland, in 1739. He studied at a grammar-school in Cavan, graduated in 1764 at Trinity College, Dublin, and, on October 28, the same year, was ordained a deacon in the cathedral church of Kilmore. Creighton confesses that at that time he had no experimental knowledge of the way of salvation, and that the bishop had warned him against preaching the doctrines of the Methodists. About 1776 he was converted through the reading of some of the writings of Wesley and Fletcher. He then commenced itinerating through Ireland, often preaching amid persecution and danger. In 1783 he was appointed by Wesley resident clergyman of the City-road Chapel, London, where he officiated until the infirmities of age compelled him to retire. In 1784 he assisted Wesley and Coke in the ordination of Whatcoat and Vasey; he also participated in the consecration of Coke as bishop for the United States of America. From 1790 to 1792 he was editor of the Arminian Magazine. He died at Hackney, London, Dec. 26, 1819. Creighton published, Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with Creeping to the Cross (so called). Alcuin mentions that on Good Friday a cross was prepared before the altar, and kissed in succession by the clergy and people. Sometimes it was laid on a cushion in a side-chapel. By Elfric's Canons (957), the faithful were required to pay their adoration, and greet God's rood with a kiss. "We humble ourselves to Christ herein," Cranmer says, "offering unto him, and kissing the cross, in memory of our redemption by Christ on the cross." The practice was forbidden in 1549, but was observed at Dunbar in 1568 by the congregation, bare-legged and barefooted. During the ceremonial the hymns "Pange, lingua," and "Vexilla regis prodeunt," were sung, followed by the "Impropria," or reproaches, an expansion of Mal. iii, 3, 4.

Cremation, the burning of human corpses, was probably the general practice of the ancient world, with certain important exceptions. In Egypt dead bodies were embalmed; in Judæa they were buried in sepulchres; and in China they were buried in the earth. In Greece only suicides, unteethed children, and persons struck by lightning were denied the right to be burned; while at Rome, from the close of the republic to the end of the 4th century A.D., burning on the pyre or rogus was the general rule. Even the Jews used cremation in the vale of Tophet when a plague came; and the modern Jews of Berlin and the Spanish and Portuguese Jews at Mile-End cemetery have been among the first to welcome the lately revived process. Cremation is still practiced over a great part of Asia and America, but not always in the same form. Thus, the ashes may be stored in urns, or buried in the earth, or thrown to the wind, or smeared with gum on the heads of the mourners. In one case the three processes of embalming, burning, and burying are performed; and in another, if a member of the tribe die at a great distance from home, some of his money and clothes are nevertheless burned by the family. It is claimed by some that the practice of cremation in modern Europe was at first stopped, and has since been prevented in a great measure, by the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body; partly, also, by the notion that the Christian's body was redeemed and purified. The very general practice of burying bodies in the precincts of a church in order that the dead might have the benefit of the prayers of persons resorting thither, and the religious ceremony which precedes both European burials and Asiatic cremations, have given the subject a religious aspect. The question is also a sanitary one, and has attracted very considerable attention lately.

For the last ten years many distinguished physicians and chemists in Italy have warmly advocated the general adoption of cremation, and, in 1874, a congress called to consider the matter at Milan resolved to petition the Chamber of Deputies for a clause in the new sanitary code, permitting cremation under the supervision of the syndics of the commune. In Switzerland there are two associations in support of the cause. In 1797 cremation began to be discussed by the French Assembly, under the Directory, and the events of the Franco-Prussian war have again brought the subject under notice. The military experiments at Sedan, Châlons, and Metz, of burying large numbers of bodies with quicklime, or pitch and straw, were not successful, but very dangerous. The municipality of Vienna has formally made cremation permissive. There is a propagandist society, called the Urne, and the main difficulty for the poor seems to be the cost of carrying the bodies five miles. To overcome this a pneumatic tube has been proposed. Dresden, Leipzig, and Berlin are the centres of the German movement. In England Sir Henry Thompson first brought the question prominently before the public, and in 1874 started the cremation society of London. Its object is to introduce, through the agency of cemetery companies, and parochial and municipal authorities and burial-boards, some rapid process of disposing of the dead, "which cannot offend the living and shall render the remains absolutely innocuous." His problem was this: "Given a dead body, to resolve it into carbonic acid, water, and ammonia, rapidly, safely, and not unpleasantly." Relying on the facts connected with recent burial legislation, he pointed out that in the neighborhood of cemeteries there is a constantly increasing risk of contaminated air and water. The problem he solved by the Siemens process of cremation. The British authorities also have had to interfere in the management of the Hindû cremations, so as to reduce the cost and perfect the sanitary arrangements of the process.

Among the practical methods of cremation which have recently been attempted are those of Dr. Polli, at the Milan gas-works, and Prof. Brunetti of Padua. The former obtained complete calcination of dogs in two hours, by the use of coal-gas mixed with atmospheric air, applied to a cylindrical retort of refracting clay, so as to consume the gaseous products of combustion. The ashes remaining were five per cent. by weight of the material before cremation. The latter used an oblong furnace of refracting brick, with side doors to regulate the draught, and above a cast-iron dome, with movable shutters. The body was placed on a metallic plate suspended on iron wire. The noxious gases, which were generated in the first part of the process, passed through a flue into a second furnace, and were entirely consumed. The process required four hours. In the ordinary Siemens regenerative furnace only the hot blast is used, the body supplying hydrogen and carbon; or a stream of heated hydrocarbon mixed with heated air is sent from a gasometer supplied with coal, or other fuel, the brick or iron cased chamber being thus heated to a high degree before cremation begins (Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.). The subject has also been agitated in America, two societies having been organized here for cremation of corpses, and occasional instances have occurred; but the ovens and other apparatus have been as yet but moderately patronized.

The operation, as carried on at one of the best-constructed furnaces, is thus described by an eye witness:

"Cremation is erroneously supposed to be a burning of the body. It is not. No flame whatever touches the flesh or bones from the beginning to the end of the process. It is properly and strictly incineration, or reduction of the human frame to ashes; an absorption of all the gaseous elements carried on inside a fire-clay retort, three feet in diameter and seven in length. As the door of the retort is opened the rushing air cools it from white to red heat, and the whole interior is filled with a beautiful rosy light. The body, decently clad as for burial, is laid in a crib, which is covered with a clean white sheet soaked in alum. The crib is then put into the retort. The sheet retains its original position and conceals the form until nothing but the bones are left—and these gently crumble into dust. The relatives then receive a few pounds of clean, pure ashes in an urn, which can be placed in any cemetery, public or private, in a vault or church niche, or disposed of as personal choice may dictate."

This process is certainly a great improvement upon the rude and tedious operation of the ancient Romans and the modern Hindûs, consisting of a roasting of the corpse upon an immense pile of wood, filling the air with smoke and the noxious fumes of burning flesh. It is also claimed by its advocates to be much more economical than ordinary burial. Could the prejudice naturally entertained against it, especially by Christians, as a heathenish and barbaric custom, be overcome, there is no telling how popular the practice might yet become. See Eassie, Cremation of the Dead (Lond. 1875), a valuable work; Vegmann Ercolani, Cremation the most Rational Method of Disposing of the Dead (Zurich, 1874, 4th ed.); Reclan, De la Crémation des Cadavres; Sir Thomas Browne, Hydriotaphia, or Urn-burial (1658); Walker, On Graveyards (Lond. 1839); Pietra Santa, La Crémation des Morts en France et à l'Étranger; Brunetti, La Crémazione dei Cadaveri (Padua, 1873). Creascens is the name of several early Christians:

1. The disciple of St. Paul, afterwards bishop in Galatia, variously commemorated on June 27 or April 15.

2. One of the seven sons of St. Symphorosa, martyr at Tivoli under Hadrian, commemorated July 21 or June 27.

3. Or Crescentius, martyr at Tomi, commemorated Oct. 1.

4. Creascens, Paulus, and Dioscorides were three boy martyrs of Rome, commemorated May 28.

5. Bishop of Ciria, in Numidia, now Constantine. Creascens is a particularly common name on monuments of Ciria (8th Suffrag. in Syn. Carth. sub. Cyp. vii, A.D. 256).

Crescentia is the name of two Christian saints:

1. A martyr in Sicily under Diocletian, commemorated June 15.

2. A virgin, whose tumulus was near Paris, in a place where a stone bears the inscription: "Hic Requiescit Crescentia Sacra Deo Puella;" but nothing more is known of her. She is commemorated Aug. 19. See Gregory of Tours, De Gloria Confess. cap. 105, in Migne's Patrol. Lat. lxxi, 904.

Crescentianus is the name of several early saints: (1) Martyr in Sardinia, commemorated May 31; (2) martyr in Africa, commemorated June 13; (3) martyr in Campania, commemorated July 2; (4) martyr at Augustana, commemorated Aug. 12; (5) martyr at Rome, under Maximian, commemorated Nov. 24 or March 16.

Crescentio (or Crescentius), martyr at Rome, commemorated Sept. 17.

Crescentius was a controversialist on the subject of the Easter celebration of the 4th century (Epiph. Harv. 70, 9, in the Patrol. Græc. xlii, 555, § 821; Ceillier, iii, 105). See also CRESCENS (3); CRESCENTIO.

Cresconius (or Crisconius) is the name of several early Christian ecclesiastics:

1. Bishop of Villa Regia, in Numidia, at the end of the 4th century. He deserted his see and seized on that of Tubia, or Tubuna. The third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, passed a decree ordering his return to his own see (can. 38), which he entirely disregarded. The secular arm was called in with as little effect. At the Council of Carthage, A.D. 401, the primate of Numidia was ordered to summon Cresconius before the next general council, and to depose him if he failed to appear (Cod. Canon. Eccl. Afric. can. 77). But no mention is made of him at the Council of Milevum, A.D. 402; and if he is the same who appears as bishop of Tubuna at the Conference of Carthage, in 411 (Prim. Cognit. c. xxi), he must have carried the day (Labbe, Concil. ii, 1072, 1096, 1172, 1877; Tillemont, xiii, 805).

2. A monk of Atriumetum, mentioned by Augustine (Epp. 214, 215).

3. An African bishop, who, about 690, at the request of the "pontifex" Liberinus or Liberius, published a systematized collection of the apostolic canons and those of the early councils, and the decretals of the popes from Siricius to Gelasius, as an improvement upon an earlier work of the kind by Fulgentius Ferrandus. Both are printed by Migne, Patrol. lxxxviii. The author has often been confounded with the Latin poet Flavius Cresconius Corippus.

Crésol, LOUIS, a French scholar of the Jesuit order, was born in 1568, in the diocese of Tréguier. He taught classics, philosophy, and theology successively; was for fifteen years secretary of the general of his order at Rome; and died Nov. 11, 1684. His principal works are Theatrum Veterum Rhetorum (Paris, 1620); — De Perfectu Oratoris Actione et Pronunciatione (ibid. ed.); — Mystagogus Hominum (ibid. 1629, 1638); — Anthologia Sacra (ibid. 1632, 1638). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Crespel, EMMANUEL, O. S. F., an eminent Roman Catholic missionary, was a native of Belgium. In 1723 he left Avesnes, in Hainault, and arrived at Quebec in October, 1724. Being ordained March 17, 1726, he went as chaplain with Lignery's expedition against the Foxes. He was next stationed at Niagara, Fort Frontenac, and Crown Point, suffering greatly in his winter service at the last-named place. Being recalled to France, he sailed from Quebec, Nov. 3, 1736, but was shipwrecked on the way, and barely escaped death. He returned to Quebec, and was pastor at Soulanges till 1738, when he finally returned to Europe. His Letters, describing his perils in America, were published in French, at Frankfurt, in 1742; soon appeared in German, and an English translation was issued in London in 1797. Dr. Shea published another version in his Perils of the Ocean and Wilderness. See Cath. Almanac, 1873, p. 50; De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 474.

Crespel, PIERRE, a French theologian of the order of Celestines, was born at Sens in 1543. He was elevated to the first positions of his order, and was an active partisan in Church and State; but finally withdrew from politics. He succeeded in obtaining a priory in Vivarais, where he died in 1594. His principal works are, Discours sur la Vie et Passion de Sainte-Catherine, in verse (Sens, 1577); — La Pomme de Grénade Mystique (Paris, 1586, 1595; Rouen, 1605); — Deux Livres de la Huine de Satan, etc. (Paris, 1590); — Commentaires de Bernardin de Mendocoe des Guerres de Flandre et des Pays-Bas (ibid. 1591). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Crespi (or Crespy), an Italian engraver, practiced the art about 1705. There are a few plates by him, among which is The Descent from the Cross, after Cignani.

Crespi, Benedetto (called il Bustino), a painter of Como, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. Some of his works are in the churches of Como.

Crespi, Daniele, a Milanese historical and portrait painter, was born in 1590, and studied under Gio. Battista Crespi, and afterwards under Procaccini. Among the best works of this artist are, The Descent from the Cross, and his celebrated set of subjects from the life of St. Bruno, at the Certosa. He died in 1630. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Crespi, Giovanni Battista (called il Cerano), an Italian painter, was born at Cerano, near Novara, in 1557. He visited Rome and Venice, and subsequently settled at Milan, where he was patronized by the duke-cardinal Federigo. One of his best productions was The Baptism of St. Agostino, in San Marco, at Milan. He died in 1633. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Crespi, Giovanni (or Giuseppe) Maria (called il Spagnuolo, from the finery of his dress), a Bolognese painter, was born in 1665, and studied under Canuti and Cignani. He executed a number of works for the churches of Bologna, among which are The Last Supper; The Annunciation; The Temptation of St. Anthony; St. John Preaching; and The Crucifixion. He died in 1747. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Crespi, Giovanni Pietro (called also de Castoldi), a reputable Italian painter, flourished about 1585, at Milan, and left some specimens of his genius in the Church of Santa Maria de Busto.

Crespo, FRANCISCO, a Spanish Benedictine, who died Sept. 25, 1665, in his eighty-second year, was abbot of Montserrat, general visitor of his congregation, and professor of theology at Salamanca, and wrote, Tribunal Thomisticum de Immaculata Deiparæ Conceptu (Barcelona, 1657). See Hoefler, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cressell, EDWARD, an English Congregational minister, was born at Hackney, April 4, 1830. In April, 1853, he was received as an agent of the London City Mission; subsequently labored in the Leadenhall Street and Holborn Hill districts for over eleven years; was some time evangelist of Claremont Chapel, which led to his entrance into the ministry. He was pastor at Houghton, in Hants, for five years; next at Hatton, Norfolk, from 1875 until his death, Nov. 21, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 366.

Cresselle (Fr. for rattle) is a wooden instrument used instead of bells in some places, to summon the people to service during Passion week. It is supposed to represent Christ praying upon the cross, and inviting all to embrace his doctrine. Similar instruments are in use among the Turks, in consequence of their strong prejudice against the sound of bells. See CLAPPER.

Cresset is an oil-lamp in which the wick floats about upon a small circle of cork. Anciently, English churches were often lighted by this sort of lamp, and the side-chapels of cathedrals were likewise so illuminated.

Cressett, EDWARD, an English prelate, became dean of Hereford in 1736, was consecrated bishop of Llandaff Feb. 12, 1749, and died Feb. 13, 1755. He published some single Sermons. See Le Neve, Fati; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cressey, E. H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, for many years, in Auburn, N. Y., but removed in 1859 to Castleton. In 1860 he took charge of St. Paul's, Stapleton; in 1862 removed to Newburg, as rector of two churches in that vicinity; in 1864 was assistant minister of the Church of the Annunciation, New York city; and the following year became pastor of Trinity Church, Trenton, N. J., where he died, Sept. 20, 1866. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1867, p. 101.

Cressey, E. W., a Baptist minister, was born at Sharon, Vt., July, 1808. He was converted in his nineteenth year, and after obtaining what education he could, was ordained as an evangelist at Garland, Me., in November, 1837. He preached at Sangerville in 1838 and 1839; in 1841 became pastor in Vassalborough; in 1850 was located at Wabash, Ind.; in 1852 organized a Church at Rolling Stone, near Winona, Minn.; in 1853 at Minneapolis; in 1854 at Prescott, Wis.; and afterwards, at churches in Hastings, Pine Island, and Roscoe, in Minn. In 1865 he became pastor at Richfield. The last ten years of his life were spent in Minneapolis, where he died, Sept. 15, 1883. See Millet, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine; Chicago Standard, Oct. 18, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Cressey, George Washington, a Congregational minister, was born at Rowley, Mass., in December, 1813. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1835, and from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1838; was ordained in 1840 at Kennebunk, Me., where he remained nearly twelve years; and was stated supply at Buxton Centre, until his death, Feb. 12, 1867. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 473. (J. C. S.)

Cressey, Hugh. See CRESSY.

Cressey, Isaac, a Baptist minister, was born at Fairfax, Vt., Dec. 22, 1807. He was converted early, and in 1841 engaged in preaching at Keene, N. H.; in 1845 was ordained in Berkshire, Vt.; subsequently labored at Sanbornston, N. H., Johnson and Waterbury, Vt.; and died in the last-named place, Aug. 8, 1855. See Watchman and Reflector, Aug. 16, 1855. (J. C. S.)

Cressey, Timothy Robinson, a Baptist minister, was born at Pomfret, Conn., Sept. 18, 1800. He graduated from Amherst College in 1828; studied theology two years (1828-30) at the Newton Theological Institution; was ordained June 5, 1830; served as pastor in Columbus, O., from 1834 to 1842; was agent of the American and Foreign Bible Society from 1843 to 1846; pastor at Indianapolis, Ind., from 1846 to 1852; at St. Paul, Minn., from 1852 to 1854; missionary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society; pastor at Hastings, Minn.; chaplain of a regiment of United States volunteers from 1861 to 1863; pastor at Kendallville, Ind., from 1864 to 1866; at Indianola, Ia., from 1868 to 1870; and died at Des Moines, Aug. 30, 1870. (J. C. S.)

Cresson, SARAH, a minister of the Society of Friends, orthodox, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1771; began to preach at the age of nineteen; removed to Haddonfield, N. J., in 1807; and died at Woodbury, Sept. 23, 1829. See Memorials, etc., for Pennsylvania, 1879, p. 197.

Cresswell, Daniel, D.D., an English divine and mathematician, was born in 1776; became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; was proctor of the university in 1813, and tutor in 1814. He died in 1844. His publications include several mathematical works, and Sermons on Domestic Duties (1829). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cresswell, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wallingford, Berks, Dec. 18, 1804. He was educated at Hoxton Academy and at High-bury; in 1828, on leaving college, he became pastor at Ipswich, where he remained three years; then at Guilford.

ball Street, Canterbury, for five years, as co-pastor, and afterwards in sole charge, until his death, Dec. 1, 1873. See (Lond.) Congregational Year-book, 1882, p. 291.

Cressy, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Christiaticum), was held at Ponthieu, A.D. 676, or at Autun, A.D. 670, the canons being headed with the name of Leodegarius, bishop of Autun: passed several canons, but, among others, one exacting, on pain of episcopal condemnation, from every priest, deacon, subdeacon, or "clericus," assent to the "Athanasian faith."

Cressy, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Corinth, Me., July 7, 1841. He was educated at the East Maine Conference Seminary; spent several years in teaching; entered the Upper Iowa Conference in 1870, and continued in the active work until his death, at Hampton, Dec. 21, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 314.

Cressy (or Cressey), Sir Hugh Paulin, a Roman Catholic clergyman, was born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, England, in 1605. He was educated at the free grammar-school of his native town, and at Merton College, Oxford; in 1626 was elected a fellow of his college; subsequently took holy orders and became chaplain to Thomas, lord Wentworth, and afterwards to Lucius, lord Falkland, who promoted him to the deanery of Laughlin, and a canonry of Windsor. He travelled in Italy, and in 1646, while at Rome, embraced the Roman Catholic faith. He resided for seven or more years in the college of Douay, where he changed his name to Serenus de Cressy. After the Restoration he came to England, and became chaplain to the queen. Shortly before his death, which took place in 1674, he retired to Grinstead, in Sussex. He published, Narrative of the Conversion unto Catholic Unity of Hugh Paulin (Paris, 1647, sm. 8vo; 1653, 8vo; the last ed. contains an answer to J. P., author of the preface to lord Falkland's work on infidelity):—Sancta Sophia (Douay, 1657, 2 vols. 8vo):—R. C. Doctrines no Novelty (1663, 8vo):—Church Hist. of Britanny (1668, fol.; completed only to about 1350). See Church of England Magazine, March, 1845, p. 162; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Crest (Lat. crista), the ornamental finishing which surmounts a screen, canopy, or other similar subordinate portion of a building, whether a battlement, open carved work, or other enrichment: a row of Tudor-flowers is very often used in late Perpendicular work. The name is sometimes applied to the top stones on the parapet and other similar parts of a Gothic building, usually called the capping or coping. The finials of gables and pinnacles are also sometimes called crests. Crests were often made with a row of ornaments, resembling small battlements or Tudor-flowers, on the top, and glazed, and still are so occasionally, but in general they are quite plain. Frequently these ornaments were formed in lead when the ridge of the roof was covered with that material, as at Exeter Cathedral.

Crests on Exeter Cathedral.

Crestey, Pierre, a French philanthropist, was born at Trun, near Argentan, Nov. 17, 1622. He was rector of Barenton, and distinguished himself by his zeal in founding establishments of public utility, the principal of which are, a hospital at Barenton, a house of hospitable monks in the same place, a similar house at Vimoutiers, an Hôtel-Dieu at Bernay, and a seminary at Domfront. He died at Barenton, Feb. 23, 1708. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cresti. See PASSIGNANO.

Creti, Donato, an Italian painter, was born at Cremona in 1671, and studied under Pasinelli at Bologna, where he resided, and painted a number of pictures for the churches there, the best of which is The Adoration of the Magi, in the Medicanti. He died at Bologna in 1749. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cretin, Joseph, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born at Lyons, France, in 1800. He came with bishop Loras to America, and succeeded Petiot among the Winnebagues, where he built a church and school, which failed in competition with the state schools in 1848. On Jan. 26, 1857, he was consecrated first bishop of St. Paul, Minn. After great exertions for the promotion of the interests of his diocese, bishop Cretin was struck down with apoplexy, Feb. 22 following. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 641.

Crétineau-Joly, Jacques, a French historian, was born Sept. 23, 1803, at Fontenay, in Vendée, and was educated at Paris, at the seminary of St. Sulpice. When nineteen years of age he was appointed professor of philosophy, but, before entering upon his duties, he travelled in Italy and Germany. He died Jan. 3, 1875. He edited several politico-religious journals, and is the author of Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus (Paris, 1844-46, 6 vols.; 8d ed. 1851):—Clement XIV et les Jésuites (ibid. 1847):—L'Église Romaine en Face de Révolution (ibid. 1852, 2 vols.):—Le Cardinal Consalvi (ibid. 1864, 2 vols.):—Bonaparte, le Concordat de 1801 et le Cardinal Consalvi (ibid. 1869). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Creutziger (Lat. Cruciger), Caspar, a German Protestant theologian, son of another of the same name, was born at Wittenberg, March 19, 1525. Having been expelled from his professorship there because he had embraced the doctrines of Calvin, he was called as preacher to Cassel, where he died, April 16, 1597, leaving De Justificatione et Bonis Operibus, and some polemical works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Creutziger, Felix, a Polish reformer of the middle of the 16th century, was superintendent of the evangelical congregation of Little Poland, and influential in bringing about the union of the Bohemians in that country, especially enlisting count Ostroró in that movement. See SANDOMIR AGREEMENT.

Creutziger, Georg, was born at Merseburg, Sept. 24, 1575; studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg; became professor and doctor of theology at Marburg; and died July 8, 1637, leaving Harmonia Quatuor Linguarum Cardinalium. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Crevey, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, was born at Old Aberdeen, Sept. 8, 1644; took his degree at King's College there in 1663; was presented to the living at Newhills in 1679; became synod-clerk; protested against the assembly's committee for the north in 1694; was deprived for adultery in 1695, and went to Ireland. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 507.

Crewe, Nathaniel, LL.D., an English prelate, was born at Stean, Northampton, Jan. 31, 1633, and in 1652 admitted commoner of Lincoln College, Oxford, where he was chosen fellow in 1655-56. He entered into holy orders July 2, 1664, and, April 29, 1669, was installed dean of Chichester; in 1671 was elected bishop of Oxford, and consecrated July 2; was translated to Durham, Oct. 22, 1674; in 1686 was appointed one of the commissioners in the new ecclesiastical commission erected by king James, and held several other important offices during his life. He was a very great benefactor to Lincoln College, of which he had been fellow and rector. He died Sept. 18, 1721. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crewenna, an Irish saint, is said to have been one of the companions of St. Breaca from Ireland to Cornwall in the 5th century, but the hagiologies of this period are very uncertain.

Crews, HOOPER, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Puetts Knob, Barren County, Ky., April 17, 1807. He was converted in 1824, licensed to preach in 1828, and joined the Kentucky Conference in 1829. After five years he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, in which he served Springfield, Danville District, and Galena. In 1840 he became a member of the Rock River Conference, in which his appointments were as follows: Chicago, Chicago District; Mount Morris District; Chicago District; agent for Rock River Seminary, Galena; Clark Street, Chicago; First Church, Rockford; Rockford District; Juliet; Chicago District; Indiana Avenue, Chicago; Embury Church, Freeport; Batavia; First Church, Rockford, and Oregon, Ill., where he died, Dec. 21, 1880. Dr. Crews was a delegate to four general conferences. During the year 1862 he was chaplain of the 100th Illinois regiment. He was sound in theology, logical in methods, and preached with power. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881.

Creyghlon. See CRIGHOLAN.

Crichton (occasionally written Creichtoun), the family name of several Scotch clergymen and prelates:

1. DAVID, LL.D., was teacher in a school at Anstruther Easter; then English master at the Madras College, St. Andrews; licensed to preach in 1833; appointed to the chapel of ease, Inverbrothock, in 1838; joined the Free Secession in 1843; and had a son, Andrew, minister of the Free New North Church, Edinburgh. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 809.

2. GEORGE, was made bishop of Dunkeld in 1527, also keeper of the privy-seal, and died Jan. 24, 1548. He was not much skilled in matters of religion. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 94.

3. JAMES (1), D.D., took his degree at Glasgow University in 1655; was admitted to the living at Kilbride in 1663; deprived at the Revolution; was dean of the faculty of Glasgow University from 1679 to 1689, and died in April, 1692, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 290.

4. JAMES (2), D.D., studied at Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1796; presented to the living at Wamphray in 1799; ordained in 1800; transferred to Hollywood in 1806, and died July 26, 1820. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 583, 666.

5. JOHN, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1619; was called as colleague to the living at Abercorn in 1622; transferred to Campsie in 1623; to Paisley in 1629; was deposed in 1688 for Arminianism, etc.; petitioned the presbytery in 1649 to be restored, he being a chaplain in the army. He was afterwards stationed at Dublin. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 164; ii, 53, 196.

6. JOSEPH, was licensed to preach in 1776; presented to the living at Carstairs in 1785, and ordained in 1786; transferred to Ceres in 1793, and died Feb. 15, 1849, aged ninety-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 164; ii, 319, 478.

7. PATRICK (1), was born at Naughton; took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1600; was presented to the vicarage of Forgand in 1606, but changed it for that of Ruthven in 1609; and continued in 1644. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 759.

8. PATRICK (2), was licensed to preach in 1758; presented to the living at Glendevon in 1763, but was kept in suspense and refused admission to the charge till 1770. The presbytery denied him ordination in 1771, and he resigned in 1774. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 768.

9. ROBERT (1), nephew of bishop George Crichton, was promoted to the see of Dunkeld in 1550, where he continued until put out by the reformers, at least as late as Dec. 22, 1561. He is said to have been appointed a commissioner for divorcing the earl of Bothwell from lady Jane Gordon. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 96.

10. ROBERT (2), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1625; was admitted to the living at Essie-with-Nevay before 1637, and died before Aug. 1, 1665, aged about sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 747.

11. WILLIAM, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1649; was called to the living at Bathgate in 1654, and ordained; his ministry was inhibited in 1655, and he was removed by the synod in 1660; was indulged by the privy council in 1672, but refused; returned in 1687, and opened a meeting-house and formed a presbytery; was a member of the assembly in 1690; elected moderator in 1692; transferred to Falkirk the same year; promoted to Tron Church, Edinburgh, in 1695; again elected moderator in 1697; resigned in 1707, and died Nov. 27, 1708, aged seventy-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 56, 167, 186.

Crickett, James, an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1789. He became a wealthy merchant, and on retiring was ordained at Ramsbury, Wiltshire; afterwards removed to Adderbury, Oxfordshire, where he preached many years gratuitously. He died at Portland Isle, in February, 1863. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 232.

Crickett, John, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1780; preached in England and Ireland for twenty-six years, became a supernumerary in 1806, and died Dec. 11, 1806. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1807; Smith, Hist. of West. Meth., ii, 444, 445.

Crida, an obscure Welsh saint, was probably one of the devotees who settled in Cornwall, but others think the name merely a corruption of Credanios (q. v.).

Crigler, A. I., a Lutheran minister, son of Rev. John J. Crigler, was born in Ralls County, Mo., March 24, 1840. In 1871 he graduated from Wittenburg College, O., and subsequently from Wittenburg Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Miami Synod, and for two years served as a home missionary in Iowa; for several succeeding years he preached at Knoxville, Ia.; afterwards removed to Colorado, but soon returned to Knoxville; again went to Colorado, and then to Missouri, and died at Millard, Jan. 16, 1880. See Lutheran Observer, Feb. 13, 1880.

Crigler, John Jefferson, a Lutheran minister, was born in Madison County, Va., March 1, 1811, and spent his childhood in Boone County, Ky. At forty-five years of age he began the study of theology under Rev. D. Harbaugh and professor J. Y. Harris; was licensed to preach May 19, 1856, by the synod of Kentucky, and served as pastor in Dearborn County, Ind.; in 1858 removed to Sullivan County, Mo., and labored there ten years in missionary work; was pastor, in 1874, of Johnston's Grove Church, in Story Co., Ia., besides acting as missionary to neighboring congregations. He died at Knoxville, Marion Co., March 11, 1877. See Lutheran Observer, March 30, 1877.

Crinesius, CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1584 at Schlackenwald, in Bohemia, was at first court-preacher at Gschwend and Grub, on the borders of Styria, then deacon and professor of theology and Oriental languages at Altdorf, and died Aug. 28, 1629, leaving Lexicon Syriacum:—Exercitationes Hebraicae Quinqve:—De Fide Catholica Petri:—Gymnasium Syriacum:—Epistola ad Romanos et Titum

Syriaca:—Analysis Nov. Testamenti:—Lingua Samaritana:—Gymnasium Chaldaicum:—Lexicon Chaldaicum:—De Confusione Linguarum, etc. See Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. (B. P.)

Criniti Fratres (long-haired brethren) was a name under which Augustine censures the Mesopotamian monks for wearing long hair, against the rule of the Roman Catholic Church.

Crinsoz (de Bionens), THEODORE, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born in 1690, at Nyon, near Geneva. He had undertaken a new translation of the Bible, but the clergy of Geneva, wishing, without doubt, to be revenged upon him because he had refused to sign the Formula of Concord, would not permit him to publish it. He died about 1750, leaving Job, Traduit en Français (Rotterdam, 1729):—Les Penumes, Traduits en Français (Ivraerdun, eod.):—Essai sur l'Apocalypse (eod.), and some polemical works. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Cririe, JAMES, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, born at Newabbey in 1752, was a cattle-herd, but fond of reading, and largely self-taught; became master of the grammar-school at Wigton in 1777; was promoted to the rectorship of the high-school at Leith in 1787, where he introduced the monitorial system; licensed to preach in 1791; became a master in the high-school at Edinburgh in 1795; presented to the living at Dalton in 1801, and died Jan. 5, 1835. He was master of several Continental languages, a Fellow of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries in 1795, and filled their office of Latin secretary from 1799 to 1815. He published, Sketches in Verse Descriptive of Scenes Chiefly in the Highlands (1803). See Fasts Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 646.

Criscuolo, Giovanni Andrea (or Angelo), an Italian painter, the younger brother of Giovanni Filippo, was instructed in the school of Marco da Siena. He painted a number of works for the Neapolitan churches, among which are The Stoning of Stephen, in San Stefano; and the picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Jerome, dated 1572. He died about 1580.

Criscuolo, Giovanni Filippo, an Italian painter, was born at Gaeta about 1495, and studied under Andrea da Salerno. He painted a number of fine works for the churches of Naples, particularly an altarpiece in Santa Maria della Grazia, representing the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with Saints below; and the Adoration of the Magi, in Santa Maria del Rosario. He died at Naples in 1584.

Criscenus, a Scotch saint mentioned in the legend of St. Andrews as a companion of St. Regulus (q. v.).

Crismond, JOHN M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born and reared in Baltimore, Md. He was converted in youth, and in 1836, removing to Abingdon, Va., was licensed to preach, and in 1837 entered the Holston Conference, continuing to labor with zeal and fidelity until his death, April 27, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 155.

Crisp, Alfred, an English Congregational minister, was born at Leeds, Oct. 2, 1809. He was converted in early manhood, ordained to the ministry in London in 1850, and continued to labor at home and in the surrounding villages until 1853, when he became pastor at Alfreton, Derbyshire. He removed, in 1857, to the Channel Islands, first to Jersey, and afterwards to Guernsey, where he remained until his death, April 24, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 265.

Crisp, Edmund, an English Congregational minister, was born at Hertford, June 26, 1796, of pious Nonconformist parents. In 1816 he entered the Missionary College at Gosport; in 1821 was ordained at Hertford and set sail for Madras, India, where he labored seven years, and then, removing to Combaconum, toiled seven years longer, until his health failed and he returned to England. In 1840 he again sailed for India, and became tutor at the college for training native pastors, at Bangalore. In 1848 Mr. Crisp finally returned to England because of sickness, travelled one year in aid of the missionary cause, preached four years at Grantham, travelled six years as representative of the Religious Tract Society, and, becoming one of the Association secretaries, settled at Ealing, where he remained until his death, Nov. 6, 1877. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 311.

Crisp, George Steffe, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wrentham, Suffolk, March 8, 1786. He was converted early, studied at Wymondley Academy, and settled at Lowestoft in 1808. He resigned his pastorate in 1817, removed to Aldwinckle, Northamptonshire, and in 1821 resumed the pastorate at Lowestoft, where he continued until 1832. He died May 30, 1863. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 205.

Crisp, Joseph Hemus, an English Congregational minister, was born at Nottingham, June 17, 1782. He was converted at nineteen; became class-leader and local preacher in the New Connection Methodist Church; and in 1804 was called to the regular ministry, being appointed first at Hull, and afterwards at Dewsbury. In 1807 he entered the Independent College at Ille, and in 1810 became pastor of the Congregational Church at Brighouse, near Halifax. He retired to Ashby-de-la-Zouch in 1840, and there died, Jan. 12, 1869. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1810, p. 282.

Crisp, Samuel, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Norfolk about 1667. He received a collegiate education, took orders in the Established Church, and for a time was a parish curate and chaplain in a private family. While he was residing in London, in 1700, he united with the Friends. Not long after he opened a boarding school at Stepney, near London. He died there April 7, 1704. Mr. Crisp published, The Present State of Quakerism in England (1701):—A Libeller Exposed:—also three Letters, on similar subjects. See Friends' Library, xiii, 149-163. (J. C. S.)

Crisp, Stephen, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Colchester about 1640. For thirty-five years he travelled and preached in many parts of England, Scotland, Holland, Germany, and the Low Countries. His life was one of much hardship. He died June 28, 1692. Among his writings, which are numerous, though none of them are long, may be mentioned, A Word of Reproof to the Teachers of the World, etc.:—A Description of the Church of Scotland:—An Epistle to Friends, concerning the Present and Succeeding Times:—A Plain Pathway Opened to the Simple Hearted:—An Alarm in the Borders of Spiritual Egypt. See Friends' Library, xiv, 275. (J. C. S.)

Crisp, Thomas, an English Dissenting minister, was born in 1738. He was educated under Dr. Conder; first settled at Colchester; thence removed to Ringwood, and afterwards to Hertford; but, though a man of excellent character and of a peaceable spirit, he met with great trouble and opposition in every place. He at last returned to the home of his nativity, and died suddenly, near Wrentham, in 1806. He published, The Charge at the Ordination of Sir Harry Trelawney. See (Lond.) Theological and Biblical Magazine, February, 1806, p. 79.

Crisp, Thomas S., D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Beccles, Suffolk, in 1788. He received his education in an Independent college and in one of the Scotch universities; became teacher in the Baptist College, Bristol; in 1818 was associated with Rev. Dr. Ryland as pastor there; and upon the death of the latter was elected president of the college. He died at Cotham, Bristol, June 16, 1868. His scholarship is said to have been of a superior character, although he was singularly diffident. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, viii, 594; Cathcart, Baptist. Encyclop. a. v. (J. C. S.)

Crispi, Geronimo, an Italian prelate, was born at Ferrara, Sept. 30, 1667. He pursued his studies in his native city; became doctor of law in 1696; then was ordained priest, and soon after archdeacon. In 1708 he was appointed auditor of the rota, and in 1720 archbishop of Ravenna. He left this see for the patriarchate of Antioch, and in 1743 was appointed archbishop of Ferrara, where he died in 1746, leaving, Discorsi ed Inni Sacri (Rome, 1720):—Discorsi ed Inni Sacri Altri (Ravenna, 1722):—Compendium Vitæ Clementis XI (ibid. 1728):—Decisiones Rotæ Romanæ (Urbino, 1728). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Crispi, Scipione, a Piedmontese painter, was born at Tortona, and practiced the art from 1592 to 1599. His works are, The Visitation of the Virgin to Elizabeth, in San Lorenzo, at Voghera; and an altar-piece at Tortona, of Sts. Francesco and Domenico.

Crispina, Saint, commemorated Dec. 5 (or Dec. 8), is said to have been an illustrious matron of Thagura, who was put to death A.D. 304, under Aulesius, proconsul at Thebaste, in Africa, and rejoiced in her torture as a Christian (Augustine, in Psalm. cxx, 18; cxxxvii, 8; Serm. 354, cap. 5, 44).

Crispinus was the name of several early Christians, besides St. Crispin (q. v.):

1. A bishop, martyred at Atyagis, commemorated Nov. 19.

2. A presbyter of Lampascus, his native city, who wrote, about A.D. 337, a life of bishop Parthenius (given in the Bollandists, s. a.; see also Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 204; Tillemont, vi, 288).

3. A Donatist bishop of Colama, addressed A.D. 399 and 406 by Augustine (Epist. 51 [172], 60 [173]).

Crispion, archdeacon to Epiphanius, mentioned as archbishop of Salamis cir. A.D. 368 to 403 (Sozom. viii, 15; Migne, Patrol. Græc. lxxvii. 1555, § 345; Ceillier, vi, 380).

Crispölus (or Crispülus), a martyr in Sardinia, is commemorated May 30.

Crispus, a presbyter, martyr at Rome under Diocletian, is commemorated Aug. 18.

Crist, JACOB B., a Lutheran minister, was born in Berks County, near Reading, Pa., Nov. 11, 1798. Removing to Harrisburg, Va., he joined the Methodist Church, and in the fall of 1824 was licensed as a preacher; for one year was pastor of the Warm Springs Circuit; was selected as travelling companion to bishop McKendree three years; and for several years agent for the Sunday-school Union and the American Colonization Society. He afterwards joined the Lutheran Church; became agent for the Illinois College and for the Education Society; in 1850 pastor at Mount Joy, Lancaster Co., Pa., which he served three years; and then successively pastor at Kishacoquillas, Mifflin Co.; Sinking Valley, Blair Co.; Jenner Charge, Somerset Co.; Antis, Blair Co.; supplying, also, the Church at Freeport, Armstrong Co. For a time he was agent for Pennsylvania College. In May, 1870, he removed to Altoona for rest; and afterwards went to Antis Charge, from which he retired in 1875. He died at Altoona, April 28, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, xlix, No. 21.

Cristöta, martyr in Spain, is commemorated Oct. 27.

Cristöilus, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, is the reputed founder of Llangristiolus in Anglesey, and Eglwys Wrw, and Penrydd in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 220).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. 8, 7.

Cristobolo, a Grecian architect, flourished about the middle of the 15th century, and was employed by Mohammed II to erect a mosque at Constantinople, on the ruins of the Church of the Holy Apostles, which he did successfully.

Cristofori, FABIO, and PIETRO PAOLO, Italian artists, father and son, the former of whom flourished in 1658, and the latter died in 1740, deserve great credit for the perfection which they attained in the mosaic art. They executed in concert several admirable works in the Basilica of St. Peter's, among which are The Communion of St. Jerome; and The Baptism of Christ. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Critan is the name of several Irish saints:

1. Son of Illadhon, commemorated May 11, at Achadh-finnich, on the river Dodder, County Dublin, where they are probably interred. Colgan affirms that he was the Credan, Cridan, or Critan who was one of the many pupils whom St. Petroc had during his residence in Ireland (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 125; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 585, c. 4; 586 n.).

2. Bishop of Aendruim, or Nendrum (now called Mahee Island, in Strangford Lough), commemorated May 17, whose death is given at A.D. 638 by the Irish Annalists (O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 256 n., 257; Reeves, ut sup. p. 148).

3. Of Moin-Miolan, commemorated Feb. 7 with Lanan and Mielan or Mellan, all sons of Daire; buried at Cluain-feart-Molua (now Confortmulloe or Kyle, in the barony of Upper Osory, Queen's County) (Colgan, ut sup. p. 58 n.; O'Donovan, ut sup. i, 207 n.).

4. Certronnach, of Bennchar (Bangor), commemorated Sept. 16. In Mart. Doneg. (Todd and Reeves, p. 251) he is called cellarer of St. Comgall of Bangor, and is said to have got the name Certronnach because he used to divide fairly. His mother was Eithne, daughter of Saran, son of Colgan, and sister of Ronan. He died A.D. 669 (O'Donovan, i, 280 n., 281).

Critchlow, BENJAMIN C., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Dec. 14, 1807. He pursued his literary studies at Western University, Pittsburgh, Pa., and graduated at Western Theological Seminary in 1836. His first pastorate was Slippery Rock and New Brighton; his next Beaver and New Brighton; but, after a few years, he left Beaver and confined his labors to Brighton. In 1876 he accepted a call to the Church of Greenville, Mercer County, but resigned in the spring of 1881. After this he occasionally preached at Stoneborough, Mercer County, and at Rochester, until his death, April 21, 1882. See Presbyterian Banner, April 26, 1882.

Crichton, ANDREW, LL.D., a minister and author in the Established Church of Scotland, was born in December, 1790, in the parish of Kirkmahoe, Dumfriesshire. He received his education at the Dumfries Academy and the University of Edinburgh, became a licensed preacher, and was for some time engaged in teaching in Edinburgh and North Berwick. In 1823 he published his first work, the Life of the Rev. John Blackader, which was followed by the Life of Colonel J. Blackader, and Memoirs of the Rev. Thomas Scott. To Constable's Miscellany he contributed four volumes, viz., Converts from Infidelity, and a translation of Koch's Revolutions in Europe. In the Edinburgh Cabinet Library he wrote the History of Arabia and Scandinavia, Ancient and Modern, each in two volumes. He commenced his connection with the newspaper press in 1828 by editing the Edinburgh Evening Post. In 1830 he conducted the North Briton, and in 1832 he undertook the editorship of the Edinburgh Advertiser, in which employment he continued till June, 1851. He contributed extensively to periodicals; among others, to the Westminster, Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, the Dublin University, Frazer's Magazine, the Church Review, and the Church of Scotland Magazine and Review. He was a member of the Presbytery of Edinburgh, being ruling elder of the congregation of Trinity College Church, and sat in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland as elder for the burgh of Cullen, for three years previous to his death, which occurred in Edinburgh, Jan. 9, 1856. See Hardwicke, Annual Biography, 1856, p. 198.

Crithomancy (Gr. κριση, barley, and μαντεια, divination) was a species of fortune-telling by means of the dough of the barley-meal cakes used in sacrifice.

Criticism, BIBLICAL. We add a few items to the account given in vol. ii :

The textual examination of the New Test. in particular has received a powerful stimulus by the labors of the Anglo-American Committee on Bible Revision, who had necessarily to reconsider the Greek text. Although they have not directly put forth any new edition, yet the results of their criticism have been embodied in The Greek Testament, with the Readings adopted by the Revisers of the Authorized Version (Oxford, 1881, 12mo), which may be regarded as the most mature and impartial fruit of the combined scholarship of the times, and probably nearer the autograph than any other text extant. Almost simultaneous with this appeared the Greek Testament prepared by Drs. Westcott and Hort (Oxford, 1881, 12mo), which, with its additional volume of critical remarks, has been republished (Harpers, N. Y. 1882 sq.) under the able editorship of Dr. Schaff, who has also added a Companion, consisting of illustrative matter, largely bearing upon the revision.

Meanwhile Tregelles and Tischendorf each lived just long enough to complete their valuable critical editions, and the Prolegomena to that of the latter is in process of issue at Leipzig (vol. iii, pt. 1, 1884). These nearly exhaust the elements of critical comparison.

A fierce attack has been made by some scholars, especially opposed to Bible revision, on the conclusions arrived at in the foregoing productions. It has been claimed that they unnecessarily depart from the textus receptus, and unduly lean upon the few great uncial MSS., to the exclusion of all other copies and to the neglect of the early versions. This objection leaves room for doubt whether the Greek text to be finally accepted has yet been constructed. But these are valuable contributions toward this final result, and we may hope that ere long another Griesbach will arise, capable of surveying the whole field with broad and accurate scholarship and impartial judgment. Meanwhile we may rejoice at the immense advance already made towards this desirable end.

See Reuss, Bibliotheca Novi Testamenti Græci (Brunswick, 1872), containing the most complete list of printed editions up to that time; Hammond, Outlines of Textual Criticism (Oxford, 1872, 1876); Mitchell, Critical Hand-book (Andover and Lond. 1880); Field, Notes on Select Passages of the Greek Testament (Oxford, 1881, giving gentle criticisms of the revisers); Burgon, New Testament Revision (in the [Lond.] Quar. Rev. Oct. 1881, Jan. and April, 1882; reprinted together, Lond. and N. Y. 1883), a sweeping condemnation of the Revision Committee; and the exhaustive monograph of Hall, Critical Bibliography of the Gr. Test. published in America (Phila. 1883).

Crittenden, SAMUEL WORCESTER, a Presbyterian minister, was born at North Adams, Mass., Feb. 22, 1824. After devoting some time to the study of law, he commenced a theological course in the Union Theological Seminary in 1852, continuing it one year at Princeton, and graduating at Union in 1855. He was ordained April 29, 1856, over the Gilead Presbyterian Church, Carmel, N. Y.; was pastor at Clifton, S. I., in 1858 and 1859, and subsequently at Darby, Pa., from 1862 to 1865, until he received the appointment of corresponding secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. After occupying this post five years, he was financial agent of the Presbyterian Hospital,

Philadelphia, in 1871 and 1872, and died in that city March 2, 1884. See N. Y. Observer, March 6, 1884. (W. P. S.)

Crivelli (Crevilli, or Crivilli), Carlo, a Venetian painter, flourished from 1450 to 1486, and studied under Jacobello del Fiore. He has a fine altar-piece at the Osservanti, in Macerta; and in San Sebastiano, at Venice, two pictures, representing St. Fabian and The Marriage of St. Catharine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Crivelli, Vittorio, a Venetian painter, probably a brother of Carlo, painted some altar-pieces in the churches of Monte San Martino, and in San Giovanni at Venice, in 1489 and 1490.

Croce, SANTA DI GERUSALEMME (Ital. the Holy Cross of Jerusalem), is one of the seven great basilicas of Rome. It was founded by Constantine in 331. It is particularly remarkable for the immense number of relics which it contains, all of which are exhibited on certain days, especially the fourth Sunday in Lent, for reverence and adoration of devotees. All who attend the services at that church on that day are entitled to certain indulgences; and all who share in the masses celebrated are entitled to the release of one soul from purgatory. See Seymour, Pilgrimage to Rome. See BASILICA.

Crocefisso Santissimo (Ital. most holy crucifix) is a wooden cross at Naples, which is remarkable as having been said to have thanked Thomas Aquinas for his beautiful and salutary writings. It belonged to the church of St. Dominic the Great.

Crochet, JAMES, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Gorham, Me., in 1817. He was converted in Lewiston, and ordained February, 1846; for three years was pastor at North Yarmouth and Pownal; preached about a year and a half at Falmouth, afterwards went to Buxton, and finally to Scarborough, where he died, Jan. 16, 1854. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1855, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Crochett, JOHN, a Baptist minister, was born at Stratham, N. H., July 15, 1766. He was converted in 1791, licensed to preach in 1792, ordained at Sanborn-ton, Sept. 8, 1794, and remained pastor there until his death, Feb. 11, 1833. (J. C. S.)

Crochford, W., an English Baptist minister, was born at Keysoe, Bedfordshire, in 1758. For many years he served as pastor, without charge, at Great Gidding, in Huntingdonshire, and died in August 1836. See (London) Baptist Hand-book, 1837, p. 16. (J. C. S.)

Crocus, Johann Georg, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, Jan. 26, 1629. He pursued his studies at Groningen, became doctor at Basle in 1656, fellow professor of theology at Marburg in 1657, titular professor in 1661, and died July 13, 1674, leaving, De Natura Objecto et Necessitate Logices (Bremen, 1644);—De Elementis in Genere et in Specie (Cassel, 1647);—De Animæ Rationalis Ortu (ibid. 1648, 1649);—De Judæis (Groningen, 1650);—De Angelis (Leyden, 1651);—De Baptismo (Marburg, 1656);—De Sanctis (1662);—De Communionis sub Utraque (ibid. 1663). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Crocus, Ludwig, a Reformed theologian, who died at Bremen, Dec. 7, 1655, is the author of De Perseverantia Sanctorum;—De Vera Religione et Catholica Ecclesia;—Examen Calvinistarum Descriptionis D. M. Hæci Austriaci;—Assertio Confessionis Augustanæ;—Comm. in Titum;—Apodeixis Parænetica ad Judæos per Orbem Dispersos de Messia. Crockat(t). See CROCKET.

Crocker, Asahel B., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born at Cambridge, N. Y., in 1813. He graduated from Union College in 1839; spent one year in Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of Troy; was pastor at Glenville, N. Y., from 1842 to 1848; East Congregational Church, N. Y. city, thereafter until his death in 1840. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 224.

Crocker, Nathan Bourne, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Barnstable, Mass., July 4, 1781. He graduated at Harvard College in 1802, and began the study of medicine, which, however, he soon abandoned for theology, and acted as lay reader at St. John's Church, Providence. Becoming deacon in 1808, he accepted the rectorship of that church. On account of failing health he resigned his charge in 1804, but resumed it Jan. 1, 1808, and remained in it until his death, Oct. 19, 1865. Dr. Crocker was a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Rhode Island during his entire rectorship, excepting one year; deputy to the General Convention from 1808 to 1862; and a member of the Board of Fellows of Brown University for nearly fifty years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Jan. 1866, p. 669.

Crocker, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born in North Carolina in 1786, and for more than thirty years was a very successful preacher in Wake, Warren, Granville, and Franklin counties. He died Dec. 8, 1848. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 296. (J. C. S.)

Crocker, William Goss, a Baptist missionary, was born at Newburyport, Mass., Feb. 10, 1805. He graduated from the Newton Theological Institution in 1834, and was ordained at Newburyport, Sept. 25 of the same year, proceeding at once to Africa, where he arrived Aug. 12, 1835. He entered with great zeal into his work, and was a most devoted and laborious missionary for seven years. He succeeded in reducing the Basa language to writing, and prepared also a Basa Spelling-book, and quite a number of hymns in the same tongue. He returned to the United States in 1842, remaining a year and a half, when he re-embarked for Africa, and arrived at Monrovia, Liberia, Feb. 23, 1844, but died the next day. (J. C. S.)

Crocket (also written Crockat or Crockatt) is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. JAMES, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1674; was licensed to preach in 1678; presented to the living at Caputh in 1683; continued in 1689; deprived by the privy council in 1701, and removed to Morinty. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 796.

2. JOHN (1), was licensed to preach in 1703; called to the living at Dallas in 1708, and ordained; and died April 21, 1748. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 179.

3. JOHN (2), was licensed to preach in 1739; called to the living at Parton in 1743; ordained in 1744; and died July 20, 1760, aged forty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 720.

4. JOHN (3), was licensed to preach in 1803; presented to the living at Kirkgunzeon in 1809, and ordained; and died June 20, 1867, in his ninetieth year.

He had a clear and vigorous intellect, correct taste, a wonderfully retentive memory, and was a good scholar. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 587.

Croes, John, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born Sept. 22, 1787. Ordained deacon in 1808, and subsequently a priest, he began his labors in the ministry in St. Peter's Church, Freehold, N. J.; was thence transferred to Christ Church, Shrewsbury, and afterwards to Christ Church, Middletown. After a few months spent in New Brunswick, he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Paterson, where he remained three years. During the following two years he was in Newark, and the two years succeeding he assisted his father, the bishop of New Jersey, in Christ Church, New Brunswick. He became rector of that parish at the death of his father, and continued there for eight years. In Keyport he founded and served St. James's Church nine years, at Brown's Point, erecting the building on his own land and by his own gifts and collections. He finally made his residence at Brooklyn, N. Y., where, and in adjoining places, he was busily employed until his death, Aug. 18, 1849. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1849, p. 446.

Croes, Robert B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, brother of the foregoing, was born at Sweedsborough, N. J., in 1800. He graduated from the General Theological Seminary (N. Y.), and was ordained in 1823. For a number of years he was rector of a church in New Brunswick, N. J., which he left about the year 1859, and removed to New York. He returned, however, in 1861, to New Brunswick, still retaining his connection with the diocese of New York, without regular work; in 1866 he resided at Boyd's Corners, N. Y. Subsequently he removed to Yonkers, and died there, July 22, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Croft, Gabriel, an English Congregational minister, was born at Great Eccleston, Lancashire, Jan. 31, 1791. He entered Hackney Academy in 1811, and about three years later was ordained at Pickering, Yorkshire, where he labored until 1850; afterwards living without charge at Ripon, Eccleston, Kirkham, Garstang, and finally at Preston, until his death, Nov. 14, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, p. 241.

Croft, Sir Herbert (1), an English clergyman, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and became a member of Parliament in the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign. After he had lived fifty-two years as a Protestant he became a Roman Catholic, went to Douay, and had an apartment in the monastery of the English Benedictines as a lay brother of the order. He died April 10, 1622, leaving Arguments to Show that the Church in Communion with the See of Rome is the True Church (1619). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Croft, Herbert (2), D.D., an English prelate, son of the foregoing, was born Oct. 18, 1603, at Great Milton, near Thame, Oxfordshire. He was educated in the English college of the Jesuits at St. Omer's, and at Oxford; entered into orders, and became minister in Gloucestershire, and rector of Harding, in Oxfordshire. In August, 1639, he was made a prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral, in 1640 of Worcester, and the year after canon of Windsor. In 1644 he was nominated dean of Hereford, to which see he was promoted Dec. 2, 1661. About 1667 he became dean of the royal chapel, which position he held until 1669. In 1675, when the quarrel with the Nonconformists was at its height, he published a piece entitled The Naked Truth, or the True State of the Primitive Church (4to), which created some controversy and excited an uncommon degree of attention. He resigned his bishopric some years before his death, which occurred May 18, 1691. He published some single Sermons, and The Theory of the Earth (1688). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Croft, Sir Herbert (3), an English clergyman, was born in London in 1751, and educated at University College, Oxford. He took orders in 1782, succeeded to a baronetcy in 1797, and died in 1816. His publications include, A Brother's Advice to his Sisters (1775):—Love and Madness (1780):—Fanaticism and Treason (eod.):—The Literary Fly (eod.):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Croft, Joel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Philipstown, Putnam Co., N. Y., Feb. 11, 1820. He was converted at the age of sixteen; soon after entered the academy at Peekskill; also began a private theological course; received license to preach in 1842, and in 1845 joined the New York Conference, of which he remained a worthy and acceptable member until his decease, March 27, 1879. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 28.

Croft, Joseph, an English Congregational minister, was born at Great Eccleston, near Preston, Lancashire, Jan. 5, 1802. He studied at Rotherham College, became pastor at Ripon in 1827, and labored there with eminent success for more than forty years. After 1868 he lived in retirement until his death, June 20, 1879. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 317.

Crofts, Edward, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Stamford in 1817. He was educated at the Hoxton Theological Institution, appointed to his first circuit in 1839, became a supernumerary in 1870, and died at Manorbier, near Tenby, July 2, 1878. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 36.

Crofts, Henry Only, D.D., an English Methodist preacher, was born in the city of Lichfield, Sept. 8, 1813. At seventeen he began to preach, at twenty-two entered the New Connection ministry, and after spending four years in England, joined the Rev. J. Addegran in the newly established mission in Canada, of which he was the general superintendent for ten years. Returning to England in 1851, he travelled in nine of the leading circuits with zeal and success. He became a supernumerary in 1879, but continued to preach as he was able, until his death at Manchester, Jan. 21, 1880. Dr. Crofts was president of the conference in 1861, and the author of a volume of Sermons. See Minutes of the Conference.

Crofts, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1798. He was converted when about seventeen, entered the ministry in 1820, labored in Jamaica, Turk's Island, West Indies, Bermuda (1830-33), and Harbor Island, returned home in 1835, travelled English circuits until his retirement in 1854, and died at Sandbach, Cheshire, Dec. 31, 1857. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1858.

Crofts, Matthew Henry, an English Baptist minister, was born at Upton, Northamptonshire, in 1801. He was converted at twenty-nine years of age, at once began to preach, notwithstanding his defective education, and in 1834 became pastor in Ramsey, Huntingdonshire, where he remained until 1852. He then removed to Andover, Hants Co., and was pastor there till his death, Feb. 20, 1856. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1856, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Croggon, Walter Oke, an English Wesleyan minister, was born of Baptist parents, at Penryn, Cornwall. He was converted in his nineteenth year, and in 1817 entered the ministry; was stationed successively in Cornwall (1817-22), at Charenton, France (1823 sq.), Zante, Ionian Isles (1827), Kingswood, England (1834), and London, as superintendent of schools (1836-49). He died at Sittingbourne, Kent, Jan. 30, 1854, in the sixty-third year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854; Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1833, p. 241, 1854, p. 478.

Croi, François de, a French Protestant controversialist of the beginning of the 17th century, was pastor at Uzes, and the author of several works, the best-known of which is his treatise Les Trois Conformités (1605). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Croi, Jean de, a Protestant theologian and scholar, son of François Croi, was born at Uzes. He was successively pastor at Béziers and Uzes, and for some years professor in the Protestant Academy of Nîmes. He died at Uzes, Aug. 31, 1659, leaving, among other works, Observationes in quendam Origenis, Irenæi et Tertulliani Loca (Geneva, 1632);—In Novum Fœdus Observationes (ibid. 1646);—La Vérité de la Religion Réformée (1645, 1650);—Augustin Supposé (1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Croine (or Crone) is the name of several female Irish saints, of whom the following are the best known:

1. A virgin, commemorated Jan. 27. She was of the race of Maine, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and was venerated at Cill-croine (Kilcron) in Ul-Maine, County Galway; but beyond this we have no information.

There were others of the same name, and the ruins of the Church of St. Croine, virgin, of Kill-Crony or Kileroney, in the parish of Kilmacanogue, bar. Rathdown, County Wicklow, still exist in the disused churchyard. At Jan. 27 the Mart. Tullaght has the feast of "Croni Inne Locha Crone" (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 29; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 267 n.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, p. 455, 456; Kelly, Cal. of Irish Saints, p. xiii).

2. Beg (Little), of Tempull-Croine, virgin, commemorated July 7, was the daughter of Diarmaid, son of Garvan, of the race of Connall Gulban, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages. She is given as Cronia by Colgan, among the saints descended from Connall Gulban, the parent-stem of St. Columba, and her church was situated in Tyreconnel (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 189; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 480 n.).

Croiset, Jean, a French ascetic theologian of the Jesuit order, born at Marseilles, was for a long time rector of the House of the Novitiate of Avignon, and governed it with much regularity and mildness. He died at Avignon, Jan. 31, 1738. His principal works are, Vie de Marie-Madeleine de la Trinité (1696);—Vie des Saints pour tous les Jours de l'Année (Lyons, 1723, 1742);—Parallèle des Mœurs de ce Siècle et de la Morale de Jean Croiset (ibid. 1735);—Exercices de Piété pour les Dimanches et Fêtes (ibid. 1736, 1747, 1764, 1804; also under the title, Année Chrétienne, Toulouse, 1812);—Illusions du Cœur (Lyons, 1736, 1748);—Heures et Réglements pour les Pensionnaires Jésuites (ibid. 1739);—Devoion au Sacré Cœur de Jésus Christ (Paris, 1741);—Retraite Spirituelle pour un Jour de Chaque Mois (Lyons, 1822);—Réflexions Chrésiennes (ibid. 1823);—Méditations. Crombach (or Crumbach), HERMANN, a German historian and antiquarian of the Jesuit order, was born at Cologne in 1598. He taught in various colleges of his order, devoted himself to researches upon the ecclesiastical history and antiquities of his native country, and died Feb. 7, 1680, leaving Ursula Vindicata (Cologne, 1647; augmented ed. 1674);—Primitia Gentium (ibid. 1654);—Vita P. D. Jacobi-Marli Hartii (ibid. 1655);—Auctarium Sanctæ Ursule Vindicatæ (ibid. 1669);—Chronographica Descriptio Omnium Parochiarum ad Archi-diocæses Coloniensis Hierarchiam Pertinentium, in the Bibliotheca Coloniensis of Joseph Hartzeim (ibid. 1747). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Crombie, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the vicarage of Knockbain in 1592; transferred to Chanonry about 1594, and to Rosemarkie in 1596; back to Kilmaur Wester in 1597, and again to Rosemarkie in 1599; appointed by the assembly of 1600 to visit the bounds of Murray; and continued in February, 1630. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 274, 283.

Crombie, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, took his first degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1752; was licensed to preach in 1757; presented to the living at Lhanbryde in 1760; accepted a call to Belfast, but resigned in 1770; and died March 1, 1790, aged about fifty-eight years. He published a Sermon (Belfast, 1781). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 167, 168.

Crombie, William, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1753; was licensed to preach in 1759; ordained in 1761 minister of a Presbyterian congregation at Wisbeach, England; presented to the living at Kirkcudbright in 1765; transferred to Spott in 1769; and died Jan. 6, 1789. He published The Soul's Perpetual Progress towards Perfection (1768). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 382, 691.

Cromoruah (or Cromernach) was one of the first idols of the Irish, and was made of pure gold, and surrounded by twelve brazen images. Its worship still existed at the introduction of Christianity into Ireland.

Crome, a name common to several Lutheran theologians, of whom we mention the following:

1. CARL PETRUS THOROD, was born in 1821, and died Aug. 15, 1874. He was a strict Lutheran, who wrote and fought for his Church. He published, Christliches Kirchen- und Haus-Gesangbuch (2d ed. Elberfeld, 1861); Gebetbuch für evangelisch-lutherische Christen (2d ed. ibid. 1860); LXXXV Psalmen aus dem heiligen Psalter ausgesucht und geordnet (ibid. 1856); -Die Wahrheit des Unions- Lutherthums (ibid. eod.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 250 sq.

2. FRIEDRICH ADOLPH, was born Feb. 21, 1757, at Rebburg; was in 1799 superintendent at Eimbeck, in 1823 at Jeinsen, and died March 1, 1825. He published, Versuch einer Vervollkommen der geistl. Beredsamkeit (Hanover, 1825). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 64.

3. FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB, was born in 1775 at Eimbeck, and died as doctor of theology and superintendent at Lüneburg in 1838. He wrote, Probabilia haud Probabilia (Leyden, 1824); -Beiträge zur Erklärung des Neuen Testaments (Göttingen, 1828); -Geographisch-historische Beschreibung des Landes Syrien (ibid. 1834). Cromernach. See CROMCRUAH.

Cromm, ADRIAN, a Dutch Jesuit, was born in 1591 at Anchor, in the Netherlands, and died at Brussels, May 2, 1651. He wrote, Psalms Davidis cum Compensiosa Paraphrasi; -Evangelii Historico Ordine Concordie in Modum Digesta. See Andrew, Bibliotheca Belgica; Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B. P.)

Crompton, SAMUEL, an English Wesleyan minister, began his pastorate in 1813, became a supernumerary in 1847, and died at Unsworth, near Bury, July 6, 1866. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 88.

Cromwell, James O., a Methodist Episcopal minister, began his itinerant life in 1780; served various circuits in the Middle States, namely, Sussex, 1780; East Jersey, 1781; Fluvanna, 1782; Pittsylvania, 1783; Kent, 1784; Port Roseway, 1785; was sent as missionary to Nova Scotia in 1786; and located in 1793. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1780-85; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 103; Stevens, Hist. of the Meth. Episc. Church, ii, 82, 88, 128, 188, 379.

Cromwell, James W. H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Majorville, N. B., Oct. 23, 1843. He removed to Fredericton in 1862, where for a few years he taught school; received license to preach in 1869; and in 1870 joined the East Maine Conference, wherein he continued laborious until his death, Aug. 23, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 79.

Cromwell, Oliver, who deserves notice here as one of the great politico-religious characters of Great Britain, was born in the town of Huntingdon, April 25, 1599. His father was Robert Cromwell, of a family possessed of a baronetcy, and his mother being a daughter of Sir Richard Stewart, efforts have often been made to show that he was connected with the royal family. He is said, by unfriendly authorities, to have spent a dissolute and extravagant youth, interrupted by serious misgivings, which brought him at last to stern self-condemnation, and resulted in a Puritanic piety. He was educated at the Huntingdon grammar-school, and was admitted, April 22, 1616, a commoner of Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge; but on the death of his father, in June, 1617, he left the university, and began the study of law in London. When twenty-one years old he married Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir Thomas Bouchier, and thus, both by descent and alliance, he was a member of the higher country-gentleman class, or of the nobility, as it would be termed in other European countries. In that age, however, refinement was only kept up by attendance at court, and Cromwell, who lived away from town and followed country pursuits, became a man of rustic deportment. Though he had been elected to the brief parliament of 1628, it was not till 1640 that he was known in the House of Commons, and Sir Philip Warwick, who observed his rise, has left a curious notice of his personal appearance.

Mask of Cromwell, taken after death.

"His apparel was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor. His hat was without a hat-band. His stature was of good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swollen and reddish, his voice sharp and untunable, and his eloquence full of fervor." He had been for some years establishing an influence with the Puritan party, who frequented his house and bowed to his strong judgment. He showed his great business capacity in the struggle of the Long Parliament, but it was not until the parliament raised a military force, to which he brought a troop of horse, that his powers of organization and command were fully developed. He speedily rose to authority as lieutenant-general of the horse, and when he was specially exempted from the self-denying ordinance, so that he could both deliberate in parliament and hold command, he became the most powerful man in the country. He showed his eminent sagacity in reconstructing the army, and infusing into it high spirit along with stern discipline. At the battle of Naseby, in 1645, it was seen, in the signal destruction brought on the well-officered royal army, how effectively he could strike with the weapon he had constructed. His military policy throughout was to despise secondary means and ends, but to invest himself with overwhelming power and crush his enemy. He saw the large share which artillery must bear in warfare, and anticipated modern generals in fostering that destructive arm. His repeated victories over the royalists, his establishment of the predominance of the army over parliament, and of the Independents over the Presbyterians, his relentless exertions to bring Charles I. to the block, and his dismissal of the parliament, are all great events in the history of the day, which cannot be narrated with sufficient distinctness without much detail. In 1649 he conducted an exterminating war in Ireland, instigated by the ferocious principle that whatever human being opposed him should be put to death. In Scotland, where he saw there were more suitable materials for the sort of government he desired, he was rather a pacificator than an oppressor. Dec. 16, 1653, he took the title of Lord Protector, and became virtually king of Britain, and one who submitted to very little constitutional restraint. Cromwell died Sept. 3, 1658, and the revolution which he had conducted speedily came to an end. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but in 1661 his remains were dug up and treated with ignominy. How far he was sincere in the religious convictions by which he professed to be led has been matter of debate, and modern writers have by turns decried him as a usurper and lauded him as a liberator. That he was under powerful religious impulses cannot be doubted; the question arises as to the extent to which, by their power alone, and by no promptings of worldliness, he was driven on in his ambitious career. He was an enlightened internal reformer, and established many ministerial improvements, and it cannot be questioned that the line of public policy which has made England famous since, was inaugurated during his administration.

Cromwell, William, an English Baptist minister, was born about 1800, and united with the Church at Beckington; began to preach in two or three churches in Bath, and became pastor in Wood Street; soon afterwards of Providence Chapel, and finally of Ebenezer Chapel. He died April 18, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1855, p. 47. (J. C. S.)

Cron, Joseph Anton, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Podersam, in Bohemia, Sept. 29, 1751. He was for some time professor of polemics and dogmatics at Prague; and in 1822 became doctor of theology and capiculary at Ossegk, where he died, Jan. 20, 1826, leaving Beiträge zur Methodik der Kirchengeschichte (Prague, 1795). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 530. (B. P.)

Cron, William, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Dumfriesshire, was tutor in the family of sir P. A. Irving; licensed to preach in 1812; presented to the living at Menmuir in 1824; ordained in 1825, and died May 4, 1859. See Fusti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 848.

Cronan (Croman, or Chronan) is a very frequent name in Irish hagiologies, and has several synonyms, as Cuaran, Mochuarc, and frequently Mochua, Crow and Cua having in Irish the same meaning.

1. Son of Cummain, of Sliabh Eibhlinne, in Munster, commemorated May 4. Ænghus associates him with Siollan the deacon. His church was among the Slieve-Phelim mountains, County Tipperary (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 120, n., 121).

2. See CUARAN.

3. Commemorated Nov. 11, probably son of Sinell, of the race of Coindri, son of Fergus, of the clan Rudhraidhe. Colgan calls him the brother of St. Beolan, Baitan, or Mobaoi (Dec. 13), Carnan, etc., and St. Ænghus calls his mother Sina. He died of the Yellow Plague in A.D. 664 (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 219, n.⁶; 598, c. 3; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 277).

4. Son of Ualach, abbot of Clonmacnoise, commemorated July 18. He died in 637 or 638.

5. Abbot of Airdne (Arran Isles, in Galway Bay), commemorated March 8, the same day as a Scottish saint, "Cronan the Monk."

6. Abbot of Benuchar (Bangor), 680-691, and commemorated Nov. 6. He is called "filius cuculæ" = "Mac Cuchuilne."

7. Abbot of Cluain-dolcain (now Clondalkin, in the county of Dublin), probably in the 8th century. His father was Lughaidh, of the royal line of Erin, and his mother was Carner of Cluain-dasaileach; his brothers were Bædan (q. v.), etc.

8. Abbot and martyr of Glais-mor (Clashmore), commemorated Feb. 10. His father is said to have been Mellan, and he lived among the Desii of Munster, about the end of the 6th century.

9. An obscure saint of Lismore, who died about 718, and is commemorated June 1.

10. Abbot of Fearrea (Ferns), and perhaps bishop of Luachair, who died in 653, and is commemorated June 22.

11. Priest of Maghbile (now Moville, near Newtownards, in County Down), commemorated Aug. 7, addressed by pope-elect John IV on the Paschal controversy (Bede, Eccles. Hist. ii, c. 19), in A.D. 640.

12. Of Roscrea, commemorated April 28, who flourished about A.D. 625. He was a native of Ely O'Carrol in Munster, his father being Orlan, of that sept, and his mother Coemri, of the sept of Corcobaschin, a district in the west of the present County Clare. Taking with him his maternal cousin St. Mobai, he spent some years traversing Connaught, and then, returning to his native province, built a cell near Loch Crea, at a place called Seanross, now Corbally (O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 412 n.). As this place was so secluded (desertus et avius) St. Cronan afterwards left it, and built his great church by the highway at Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary, where he had one of the most famous schools in Ireland. There, in piety and works that make for peace with God and man, he spent the remainder of his days, the honored friend of Fingen, king of Munster, and the willing advocate of the oppressed.

13. Of Tuaim-greine (now Tomgraney, in the barony of Upper Tulla, County Clare), commemorated Oct. 19. This saint appears twice in the Mart. Doneg., first in the original band at Oct. 19; and next in the second band, on the authority of Mar. O'Gorman, at Nov. 1. Among the saints of the family of St. Colman of Kilmacduach (Feb. 3), or house of the Hy-Fiachrach, Colgan gives "St. Cronan, son of Ænghus, son of Corbmac, etc., Feb. 20 or Oct. 19;" and Mart. Doneg. at Feb. 20 also mentions that there is a Cronan with this pedigree (Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 55, 279, 293; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 248, c. 2).

14. "Beg" of Ændruim (Nendrum), bishop, commemorated Jan. 7. His name appears third among the bishops of the Scots in the north of Ireland to whom, with priests and others, pope John IV, when yet but pope-elect, A.D. 640, addressed the famous letter on the Paschal question and the Pelagian heresy (see No. 11 above). The Irish Annals generally place his death in A.D. 642, and the Ann. Tigb., perhaps more accurately, in A.D. 643; but Lanigan (Eccles. History of Ireland, ii, 412) is mistaken in calling him "bishop of Antrim" (Reeves, Eccles. Ant. p. 10, n., 63, n., 148-150, 187-197; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 95, 96).

There is another Cronan Beg, who, however, is usually known as Cronbeg (q. v.).

15. "Clairenech" (i. e. flat-faced), commemorated Jan. 29. Under Seighin it is stated "the three Clairenechs were Cronan, Baeithin, and Seighin."

Cronánus. See MOCHUA.

Cronbeg, an Irish saint, abbot of Cluain-mic-nois (Clonmacnoise), is commemorated April 6. According to Tighearnach, he succeeded Forcenn in 686, and died A.D. 694, but the other Annals place the dates rather earlier. He is also designated by the double diminutive Cron-an-beg (Cronan-beg). See Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 97; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii, 214, 217; iv, 65; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 291, 297.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. a. v.

Crone. See CRONKE.

Cronin, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harford County, Md., about 1813. He was converted at an early age, and in 1837 entered the Baltimore Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Oct. 3, 1845. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 9.

Cronius is the name of two early Christians:

1. An ecclesiastic who accompanied Athanasius to Tyre, and signed his letter to the church of that place (Athan. ad Constant. i, 797); perhaps the same as the bishop of Metole in the list given by Meletius (ibid. 789).

2. A presbyter and solitary, visited by Palladius A.D. 394 (who was afterwards bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia), and about the same time by Petronius (afterwards bishop of Boulogne, and canonized). He was a disciple and interpreter to St. Anthony, and lived in the deserts of Egypt. He was canonized (Pallad. Hist. Laus. cap. 7, § 718; De Vita Patrum, vii, cap. 19, ap. Migne, Patrol. Lit. lxxiii, 1041, 1122, 1126; Ceillier, vii, 485; x, 161).

Crook, Enoch, an English Baptist minister, was born at Bath, Dec. 11, 1797. He was converted at eighteen years of age; studied at Bradford Academy; was ordained March 11, 1823, at Crewkerne, Somersetshire, and in 1834 went to Battersea, where he continued as pastor until his death, June 28, 1837. See English Baptist Magazine, 1837, p. 381-384; (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1838, p. 22. (J. C. S.)

Crock, John (1), an English minister of the So-city of Friends, was born in Bedfordshire in 1617. After being a justice of the peace, he joined the Friends about 1654; preached in Bedfordshire and the neighboring counties; suffered imprisonment in London, Huntingdon, Aylesbury, and Ipswich; afterwards itinerated in Hertfordshire, and died Feb. 26, 1699. See Friends' Library, xiii, 202, 292; Evans, Piety Promoted, i, 169. (J. C. S.)

Crook, John (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Leigh, Lancashire, in 1742. He entered the army and was converted while quartered at Limerick; afterwards became a class-leader in Liverpool, and the society there sent him, in 1775, as a missionary to the Isle of Man, whose inhabitants were in a heathenish state of immorality. Amid discouragement and persecution he planted Methodism in that island, and in 1782 was appointed to the Lisburn Circuit, in counties Down and Antrim, and thereafter labored in Ireland, except another term of service in the Isle of Man, from 1786 to 1788, and 1798. During the latter part of his life he preached in England. He died at Scarborough, Dec. 27, 1805. See West. Meth. Mag. 1808, p. 8, etc.; Minutes of the British Conference, 1806; Stevens, Hist. of Meth. ii, 325; iii, 202; Smith, Hist. of West. Meth. i, 391, 451; ii, 429; Rosser, Hist. of West. Meth. in the Isle of Man (Lond. 1849), p. 48 sq.

Crook, John David Weaver, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Orangeburg District, S. C., Oct. 6, 1820. He joined the Church when about twenty-two, labored several years as a local preacher, and in 1851 was admitted into the South Carolina Conference. He died May 1, 1866. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 20.

Crook, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born about 1770. He was converted in 1789; studied under the Rev. Mr. Reader at Taunton; settled at Kingsbridge, Devonshire; afterwards removed to Newton Abbot, where he remained pastor for nearly half a century. He resigned in 1835, and removed to Chudleigh, where he died, May 10, 1850. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1850, p. 94.

Crook, William (1), one of the patriarchs of Irish Methodism, was born at Cabystown, County Fermanagh, December, 1784. He was received into the ministry in 1804; became a supernumerary in 1851; resided in Dublin and Belfast, and died in the former city, May 4, 1862, being at the time senior minister in the Irish Conference. Mr. Crook published a pamphlet in 1823, entitled, A Few Plain Proofs that the Church of England is not Calvinistic. See Memorials of Rev. Wm. Crook (Lond. and Dublin, 1868), by his son, Rev. Wm. Crook; Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 36.

Crook, William (2), a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Chester District, S. C., in 1805. He was converted in 1821, licensed to preach in 1825; admitted into the South Carolina Conference; and died Nov. 25, 1867. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1867, p. 113.

Crooke, George Alexander, D.D., D.C.L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland, and was ordained deacon in 1854 and presbyter in 1855. About 1858 he resided in Philadelphia, Pa.; the following year was made rector of St. Peter's Church, Lewes, Del.; in 1860, of St. John's Church, Northern Liberties, Philadelphia, continuing until 1864. The following year he returned to his former parish, in Lewes, and remained until 1867, when he became assistant minister in St. James's Parish, Philadelphia. Subsequently he resided several years in that city, without charge, and died there, April 18, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Crooker, Samuel, a minister of the Bible Christians, was born in North Devon, England, in October, 1808. He was converted in 1833; went to his first circuit, Ringsash, in 1840, but left in discouragement. Two years afterwards he was stationed at Chard, where scores of conversions cheered him. After twenty-two years of effective work he settled at Dunster, Somerset, where he died, May 1, 1881. See Minutes of the Sixty-third Annual Conference of the Bible Christians.

Crookes, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1619; was licensed to preach in 1625; became assistant minister at Leaswalt in 1631; was presented to the living at Kilmaurs in 1638; continued in 1650; went to Ireland; was minister at Ballykelly, from which he was obliged to remove, and had assistance in money from the kirk session at Torphichen in 1659, and charity in 1662. He died in 1697, aged about ninety years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 178.

Crookes, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Barlborough, Derbyshire, Jan. 18, 1803. He was converted when seventeen; entered the ministry in 1825; was appointed to Jamaica, W. I., in 1827; returned home after eleven years of successful labor, and exercised his ministry in England for upwards of thirty years; became a supernumerary in 1871, first at Merthyr-Tydvil, afterwards in Chesterfield; and died at Old Whittington, Chesterfield, May 9, 1879. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 38.

Crooks, David, a faithful minister of the German Reformed Church, was born March 12, 1820. He studied at Mercersburg, Pa.; was licensed by the classis of Zion in 1838; subsequently went to North Carolina, where he was ordained as pastor at Davidson; and, after some years, removed to Lincoln, where he died, Jan. 24, 1859. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Ref. Church, iv, 817-320. (D. Y. H.)

Crooks, John, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1643; was called to the living at New Luce in 1646; admitted in 1647; transferred to Ballantrae in 1658; and died after Feb. 16, 1661. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 753, 767.

Crooks, John Conrad, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greenup County, Ky., about 1824. He was converted in early life; entered the local ministry in 1855; acquired a good education; devoted several years to school-teaching; and in 1866 united with the Western Virginia Conference, wherein he labored with unsurpassed acceptability and success till his death, March 2, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 15.

Crookshank, William, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, took his first degree in one of the Scotch universities; went to London, and was ordained pastor of the Scotch Church, Swallow Street, in January, 1784. He was a man of learning, but in 1767 fell under the censure of the Church, removed into the country, and died July 28, 1769, when more than seventy years old. In 1749 he published, in two volumes, The History of the State and Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution. He also published an English translation of Witsius on the Covenants, and five separate Sermons. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 46; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crookshank, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1624; appointed assistant to his father-in-law in 1625; called to the living at Redgorton in 1626, and ordained; joined the Protestors in 1651; continued in March, 1661; and he is said to have been "slain at Pentland." See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 655.

Croom, M. G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1820. He was converted when quite young, and was first a member of the African M. E. Church. In 1871 he joined the North Carolina Conference, in which he served as pastor and presiding elder until his death, at Wilmington, March 17, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 72.

Crop is a name for the top or final of a pyx (q. v.).

Croquet (or Crocquet), ANDRÉ, a French Dominican, was born at Douay, and was first prior of the monastery of Haanlon. He was doctor of theology, and died in 1580, leaving, Commentarius in Epistolam Pauli ad Romanos (Douay, 1577):—Enarratio Epistolæ ad Hebræos (ibid. 1578):—Catecheses Christianus (ibid. 1575; Lyons, 1593):—Paraphrasis sive Conciones in Septem Psalmos Pœnitentiales (Douay, 1579). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Crosbie, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, born at Merklund, was licensed to preach in 1804; presented to the living at Buittle in 1807; ordained in 1808; and died Dec. 3, 1847, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 704.

Crosbie, John Geddes, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was called to Birmingham in 1824; ordained by the Glasgow Presbytery in 1825; resigned his English charge in 1826; was presented to the living at Fenwick in 1828; resigned in 1836, in consequence of a change of opinion, and left the Scotch Church. He died June 16, 1838. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 170.

Crosbie, William Glendonwyne, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1828; was licensed to preach in 1829; appointed to the living at Parton the same year; ordained in 1830; and died March 18, 1845, aged thirty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 720.

Crosby, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to Sierra Leone in 1834, and died April 24, 1837, aged twenty-nine years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1837.

Crosby, Daniel, a Congregational minister, was born in Hampden, Me., Oct. 8, 1799. He graduated from Yale College in 1823, and completed his theological course at Andover in 1826; became pastor at Conway in 1827, and of Winthrop Church, Charlestown, in 1833; in 1842 entered upon the editorial duties at the Mission House in Boston, and died Feb. 28, 1843. He published a small work on the Character of Christ, and several Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 822.

Crosby, Jewett Vernon, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Staunton, Va., July 8, 1816. He graduated from Hampden-Sidney College in 1837, taught for a time, spent one year in Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, then became stated supply at Manning's Neck, N. C., and Jerusalem, Va., in 1848; was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of East Hanover, Sept. 23 of the same year; preached at Southampton and Smithfield, Va., until 1847; afterwards at Bardstown, Ky.; from 1848 to 1860 was pastor of that church, at the same time being principal of the female academy there; stated supply at Midway and Clear Creek until 1864; was also principal of Rose Hill Female Academy; thereafter stated supply and principal of the female academy at Barlstown, until his death, Nov. 14, 1877. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 186.

Crosby, John (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Whitby in 1755. He was converted in 1774, under the preaching of a Church of England minister, and in 1783 Wesley appointed him to a circuit. He labored with great success for twenty-eight years, travelling eighteen circuits, finally settled at Bolton as a supernumerary, and died there, March 29, 1816. See West. Meth. Mag. 1819, p. 3; Minutes of the British Conference, 1816.

Crosby, John (2), a Congregational minister, was born at Bangor, Me., in 1803. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1823; taught for a year in Hallowell; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827, and, June 11, 1828, was ordained pastor in Castine; resigned in 1831; labored for a year in Pennsylvania as agent of the American Colonization Society; then went to Savannah, Ga., and subsequently to Barbadoes, where he died, May 26, 1833. See History of Bowdoin College, p. 261, 262; Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 74. (J. C. S.)

Crosby, John (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Powis House, near Kirbythorpe, Westmoreland, Aug. 9, 1804. He was converted in 1819; in 1829 was sent to Penrith as supply; the following year to Appleby, and in 1831 to Kendal, where he died, Jan. 3, 1832. See West. Meth. Mag. 1834, p. 493; Minutes of the British Conference, 1832, p. 111.

Crosby, Joshua, A.M., a Congregational minister, was ordained pastor in Enfield, Mass., Dec. 2, 1789, and died in 1838. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 142.

Crosby, Stephen, a Congregational minister, was born at Thompson, Conn., about 1795. He entered Brown University, but graduated from Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1816 or 1817; pursued his theological studies there under president Nott; in June, 1819, was ordained pastor in Spencer, Mass., and dismissed May 31, 1825. Subsequently he was pastor in East Granby, Conn.; next in the western part of New York, and finally in or near Norwich, Conn., where he died in 1839. See Hist. of Spencer, p. 100. (J. C. S.)

Crosby, Thomas (1), an English Baptist historian, was born about 1700. For some time he was at the head of an institution for the education of boys. He was a deacon of the Church of which Dr. Gill was pastor. His great work was his History of English Baptists, from the Reformation to the Beginning of the Reign of George I (Lond. 1738-40, 4 vols. 8vo). See Haynes, Baptist Cyclop. p. 168. (J. C. S.)

Crosby, Thomas (2), an English Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Stockwith, March 25, 1816. He was converted at eighteen, received into the ministry in 1842, and died at Haslingden, June 28, 1875. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 28.

Crosdale, JOHN, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector for many years in Newtown, Md., and also of Pocomoke and Coventry parishes. He died at Newtown, March 11, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Croser, JOHN P., a distinguished Baptist philanthropist, was born in that part of Springfield now called West Dale, in Delaware Co., Pa., Jan. 13, 1793. At the age of fifteen he united with the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, and at twenty-eight commenced the struggle of life, which eventuated in a career of great success in business. Mr. Croser's interest in the kingdom of Christ early developed itself, and was exhibited in labors and contributions to the Bible and tract societies, the temperance and anti-slavery causes, foreign missions, and especially in the cause of education. He subscribed liberally in aid of the Lewisburg University, gave ten thousand dollars to the American Baptist Publication Society for a Sunday-school Library Fund, and five thousand dollars to purchase books for poor ministers. As wealth increased, so did his benevolence grow more expansive, and his donations flowed in a steady stream in every direction. He died March 11, 1866. He perpetuates his memory through the fifty-thousand-dollar memorial fund for missions among the colored people of the country, and through the theological institution at Upland, Pa., which bears his name. See Dr. J. Wheaton Smith's Life of J. P. Croser. (J. C. S.)

Crosier, SAMUEL B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Halifax, Vt., in 1812. He was converted at the age of twenty; soon after received license to preach; in 1851 was admitted into the Black River Conference; became a superannuate in 1868, and died at Clyde, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1870. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 128.

CROSS. The statement of Bede relating to the four kinds of wood of which the cross of Christ was made—the upright of cypress, the cross-piece of cedar, the head-piece of fir, and the foot-support of box—departs from the Eastern tradition, which substitutes olive and palm for the two latter varieties of wood. See CROSS, CHRIST'S.

The private use of crosses, or representations of the cross, is highly uncertain before Constantine, though Martigny refers to Perret for certain stones, apparently belonging to rings, on which the cross is engraved, and which appear to be of date prior to Constantine. It seems probable that the use of the monogram prevailed before and during his time, with sacrificial meaning attaching more and more to the cruciform in the Christian mind. See MONOGRAM OF CHRIST.

The following engravings illustrate the various forms which this symbol of Christianity assumed in early times. See CRUCIFIX; INSCRIPTIONS.

Engraved Stone of the Earliest Period.

Cross on a Single Tomb in the Callixtine Catacomb.

The term "station-cross" is derived from the Roman military term statio, and applied to a large cross on the chief altar, or in some principal part of a church, but occasionally removed or carried in procession to another spot, and then constituting a special place of prayer. Processional crosses may be traced to the use of the Labarum in Constantine's army, and also to his substitution of the cross for the dragon, or placing it above the dragon on standards of cohorts, etc. See STATION.

Anchor-Cross.

CROSS, as an architectural ornament in churches and religious edifices, was almost always placed upon the points of the gables, the form varying considerably, according to the style of the architecture and the character of the building; many of these crosses are extremely elegant and ornamental; it was also very frequently carved on gravestones, and was introduced in various ways among the decorations of churches.

A small cross (which was often a crucifix) was placed upon the altar, and was usually of a costly material, and sometimes of the most elaborate workmanship, enriched with jewels; crosses were also carried in religious processions upon long staves.

A large cross with the figure attached, called the rood, was placed over the main entrance of the chancel in every church.

It was formerly the custom in Great Britain, as it still is in Roman Catholic countries, to erect crosses in cemeteries, by the road-side, and in the market-places and open spaces in towns and villages, of which numerous examples remain, though, with the exception of the market crosses, most of them are greatly defaced: those in cemeteries and by the way-side were generally simple structures, raised on a few steps, consisting of a tall shaft, with sometimes a few mouldings to form a base, and a cross on the top; in some instances they had small niches or other ornaments round the top of the shaft, below the cross; the village crosses appear generally to have been of the same simple description, but sometimes they were more important erections. Market crosses were usually polygonal buildings with an open archway on each of the sides, and vaulted within, large enough to afford shelter to a considerable number of persons; of these good examples remain at Malmesbury, Salisbury, Chichester, Glastonbury, etc. Crosses were also erected in commemoration of remarkable occurrences, of which Queen Eleanor's crosses are beautiful examples; these are memorials of the places at which her corpse rested each night on its journey to Westminster for interment.

The cross was a favorite form for the plan of churches, and great numbers are built in this shape, the Western churches mostly following the Latin form of cross, the Byzantine churches following the Greek form, i. e. with the chancel, nave, and two transepts all of equal length.

CROSS OF ABSOLUTION was a metal cross, inscribed with a papal absolution, buried in graves. Specimens have been found at Meaux, Mayence, Périgueux, and Bury St. Edmund's. One of a bishop, cir. 1088, is preserved at Chichester.

CROSS, ADORATION OF. See ADORATION OF THE CROSS.

CROSS, APPARITION OF THE, at Jerusalem, about the third hour of the day, in the time of Constantius, in the year 346, is commemorated May 7 in the Byzantine and Ethiopic calendars.

CROSS OF BOUNDARY (WAYSIDE, and SANCTUARY). Crosses engraved on boundary stones are mentioned as early as 807; and standing crosses for the same purposes are frequently alluded to in old English cartularies. Near Hereford there is a good example, of the 14th century. At Bury and Beverley, the whole precinct was distinguished at the cardinal points of the compass by tall crosses. In Cornwall and the Isle of Man crosses are very common; in the former region they sometimes have a rounded head. One at Towednack has a curious double-incised cross, like a patriarchal cross, which may mark the boundary of a religious house. St. Burian's has a church-yard cross of the 18th or 14th century; and at a little distance a sanctuary cross, with a crucifix. At Battel, as late as the 17th century, the boundaries were marked by watch crosses. There is a wayside cross, of the 14th century, in Burleigh Park.

CROSS OF CALVARY is a cross on three steps. These steps are said by some writers to signify the three theological virtues—faith, hope, and charity.

CROSS OF CONSECRATION. See CONSECRATION CROSS.

CROSS CROSSLET is a cross with equal arms, each of the ends of which is terminated by another cross.

CROSS, GREEK, a cross in which the vertical and transverse parts are of equal length.

CROSS, INCENSING THE, is a ceremony by which all crosses to be erected in Roman Catholic countries, in public places, high-roads, and cross-ways, as well as on the tops of chapels, are prepared previous to erection. Candles are first lighted at the foot of the cross, after which the celebrant sits down before it and delivers a discourse to the people on its manifold virtues. Then he sprinkles the cross with holy water, and afterwards with incense, and at the close of this ceremony candles are set upon the top of each arm of the cross.

CROSS, LATIN, is a cross the transverse beam of which is placed at one-third distance from the top of the perpendicular portion.

CROSS OF MALTA is a cross of eight points, the badge of the knights of Malta. The points are said to symbolize the eight beatitudes (Matt. vi).

CROSS, MARKET, is an erection of stone, commonly vaulted, supported on four or more pillars, and entered by arched apertures on each side, surmounted by a cross, usually built in the centre of the cross-streets, for the shelter of persons attending market. Many curious and remarkable ancient specimens exist; e. g. at Glastonbury, Chichester, Malmesbury, and Winchester. All these are of Pointed architecture.

CROSS, MEMORIAL, was a beautiful structure of stone, erected near Durham, in memory of the victory of the Red Hills, and called Neville's Cross, while an humbler crucifix of wood marks the spot on which the monks had stood, praying for the rout of the Scots.

CROSS, ORDEAL OF THE, is a mode of trial anciently practiced among the Anglo-Saxons. The accused person brought eleven compurgators to swear to his innocence. Two pieces of wood, on one of which the cross was delineated, were placed under a cover, and he was to choose one of these. If he took the one with the cross, he was regarded as innocent; if the other, guilty. This species of ordeal was abolished about A.D. 820, as exposing the sacred symbol to profanation.

CROSS, PAPAL, is a cross with three transverse beams, the upper one less wide than the second, and the second less wide than the third.

CROSS OF PRELATES (or CROSIER). Of this episcopal emblem we give the following additional particulars from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.:

"It reminded bishops of their duty, as the pastoral staff was for the direction of the flock. The archiepiscopal cross of Canterbury was distinguished from the processional cross (which had but one) by two crucifixes, behind and before. The double-crossed patriarchal cross, so called, formed by the addition of the scroll, was used in Greece, but in the West is merely a conventional and arbitrary invention of painters (it resembles, however, the cross of Lorraine); and the triple-barred cross of the pope is equally modern and unauthorized. The cross was carried by a subdeacon in front of pope Leo IV, when he rode on horseback, according to the custom of his predecessors. The archbishop of Ravenna was allowed to have his cross borne before him throughout his province, and within three miles of Rome. Augustine entered Canterbury with a cross borne before him; Thomas à Becket was preceded by his silver cross; and St. Anselm refused to allow the archbishop of Dublin such a privilege in England; while archbishop Peckham, in 1279, excommunicated all persons selling victuals to the archbishop of York, if the latter persisted in having his crosier carried in state within the province of Canterbury. After the 9th century, legates apostolic were permitted to enjoy this distinction; and in the 13th century it was extended to metropolitans who had received the pall; but in the 13th century it became common to all archbishops. Innocent III and the Council of Lateran, in 1215, granted the use of the banner of the cross to be carried before the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, except in the city of Rome. The cross-bearing is a prerogative, not an act of jurisdiction, but simply a sign of honor and reverence due to a dignity. The bishop of CROSS, PECTORAL, is a cross of precious metal worn round the necks of Roman Catholic and Greek bishops, attached to a chain, symbolizing to the faithful authority and jurisdiction. It was worn by St. Alphege in the 11th century.

CROSS FOR PREACHING. Crosses, at which sermons were delivered, existed on the north side of Norwich and Worcester cathedrals and St. Paul's, and on the south at Hereford. A beautiful example remains in the Dominican monastery at Hereford.

Crosier.

Lucca wears the pall, and, like the bishop of Pavia, has his cross carried before him by grant of Alexander II, 1070; his canons walk mitred in processions, like cardinals. The kings of Hungary also carry the cross, in memory of king Stephen, to whom it was granted, in 1000, by pope Sylvester II. The archbishop of Nazareth had the right of using the cross everywhere; and the archbishop of Toledo throughout Spain. In 1452 Booth, of York, by a compact made in 1353, gave an image of himself to Canterbury, having carried his cross within the province. The bishop of Funchal, on certain days, has a crozier carried before him, instead of the staff, in memory of the see having once been metropolitan. The pope never carries a crozier, unless he should be in the diocese of Treves, where St. Peter is said to have given his staff to its first bishop, Eucherius. The reason is, that the bend at the top of a crozier betokens restricted jurisdiction, while the pontiff claims unlimited sovereignty. It is certain, however, that originally he received a ferula, or staff, at his inauguration. The bishop of Capetown was the first colonial metropolitan who carried a crozier. There is a fine crozier of the 15th century at Toledo, which cardinal Mendoza, in 1492, planted on the Alhambra; and another, with enamel work, at Cologne. Ragenfrol's cross, of the 12th century, with Goliath in the head, is at Goodrich Court; a third, with enamel and figures, is in the British Museum."

CROSS, RED OR BLUE, is the mark set on houses infected, in times of plague.

CROSS, RELIQUARY, is a box of precious metal, in the form of a cross, so arranged as to receive particles of the relics of the saints.

CROSS OF THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST is a tall, slight cross, to the top of which is affixed a floating pennon of white, charged in its turn with a scarlet or crimson cross.

CROSS, SCREEN (OR ROOD). A cross on or above the altar is one of the legal ornamenta of the same; and the cross, with the figure of our Lord attached, can be erected in sculpture over the altar, or as an important part of the rood-screen. Anciently, almost every English church owned its rood-cross, with the figures of Mary and John on either side.

CROSS, SIGN OF THE, is a signal current among Christians, made in the West by drawing the three fingers of the right hand from the forehead to the breast, and from the left to the right shoulder. The use of this sign is a very ancient Christian practice, possibly as old as Christianity itself. Minutius Felix asserts that it was a badge of faith among the primitive disciples; and Tertullian, long before material crosses were in use, tells us that "upon every motion, at their going out or coming in, at dressing, at their going to bath, or to meals, or to bed, or whatever their employment or occasion called them to, they were wont to mark their foreheads with the sign of the cross; adding, that this was a practice which tradition had introduced, custom had confirmed, and which the present generation received upon the credit of that which went down before them" (Tertullian. De Coron. Mil. c. iii). The following is the ordinary Oriental mode of making the sign of the cross. The tips of the thumb and the two fore-fingers of the right hand are brought together (the third and fourth fingers being folded in the palm of the hand). The hand is then lifted, and the three finger-tips brought into contact with the middle of the forehead; it is then brought down to the chest, and moved transversely upwards to the right shoulder; and, lastly, horizontally to the left. The meaning of the act is thus explained by certain mystical Eastern writers. The conjunction of the three finger-tips signifies in one action the equality and unity of the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity; the raising of the hand to the forehead signifies that God the Word was in heaven glorified together with the Father and the life-giving Spirit from all eternity. The descent of the hand to the waist or breast denotes that this same God came down from heaven to the earth, and was incarnate by the Holy Spirit in the womb of the ever-virgin Mary, thus becoming man for our salvation; the motion upward to the right shoulder symbolizes that he has reascended into heaven, and is sitting at the right hand of God the Father; the horizontal motion, from right to left, that our blessed Saviour's arms were stretched out on the cross to make atonement for the sins of the world; that he is gathering together into one body the faithful out of all nations, and that at the last day he will set the righteous on his right hand and the wicked on his left. After the joined fingers have touched the left shoulder some Easterns lay the open palm on the left breast over the heart and bow the head. This is reputed as a declaration of devotion to the cause, and submission to the will, of the divine Master.

CROSS, WEeping, is one at which penance was performed.

Cross, Abijah, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1798. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1821; studied in Andover Theological Seminary in 1823; was ordained March 4, 1824; was pastor at Salisbury, N. H., until 1829; at West Haverhill, Mass., stated supply until 1831, and pastor until 1853; without charge at the same place thereafter until his death, July 16, 1856. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 67.

Cross, Coleman Harwell, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Giles County, Tenn., Oct. 5, 1833. He was converted in 1857, and in the same year entered the Tennessee Conference, in which he successfully labored to the close of his life, Aug. 9, 1860. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 212.

Cross, David, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Wilnot, N. H., Jan. 22, 1786. He was converted at thirty years of age, soon after began to preach, and died in Newark, Vt., June 22, 1870. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1871, p. 81. (J. C. S.)

Cross, John, a Presbyterian minister, styled by Dr. Brownlee "a Scottish worthy," was received as a member of the New Jersey Synod in 1782, and settled at a place called The Mountains, back of Newark. The remarkable revival in his congregation, in 1734 and 1735, is noticed in Edwards's Thoughts on Revivals. He was the minister of Baskingridge and Staten Island, and one of the first members of the New Brunswick Presbytery. He was wonderfully successful as a revivalist. Whitefield was refreshed by meeting with him, and they labored together at Baskingridge and the vicinity. Cross afterwards fell into sin, and it is not known where he died. (W. P. S.)

Cross, Joseph Gould, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Onondaga County, N. Y., Jan. 12, 1840. He was converted at the age of nine; removed to Illinois with his father early in life; spent four years in school at Evanston; and in 1867 was admitted into the Rock River Conference, wherein he labored with marked success until his death, May 28, 1870. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 275.

Cross, Joshua L., a Baptist minister, was born in Tennessee in 1822. He joined the Church in 1847, was ordained in October of that year, and began his work in western Tennessee in 1848, visiting the churches in Henderson County, and acting as pastor at Unity until the close of 1849; after which he labored in Fayette County, other parts of western Tennessee, and in parts of northern Mississippi for a number of years. In 1869 his labors were divided between the churches at Byhalia and Olive Branch, until his death, March 11, 1870. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 113. (J. C. S.)

Cross (née Fisher), Mary, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in the north of England about 1623. She appeared as a minister in 1652, and was imprisoned and even whipped for addressing public assemblies during her travels in the south of England. Subsequently she visited the West India Islands and North America, in 1658. In 1662 she married William Bayley, and in 1678 John Cross, of London; but finally came to America, and resided on the banks of the Ashley River, near Charleston, S. C., where she died, about 1700. See Bowden, Hist. of the Soc. of Friends in America, i, 38-41. (J. C. S.)

Cross, Robert, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Ballykelly, Ireland, in 1689. He was licensed by the synod in 1717; preached some time in New Castle, Pa., and became pastor there in 1718; was ordained March 17, 1719; in September, 1723, was called to Jamaica, N. Y.; in 1737 to Philadelphia; resigned June 2, 1758, and died in that city, Aug. 9, 1766. (W. P. S.)

Cross, Walter, A.M., an English Independent minister, studied in Scotland and Holland, and settled as pastor in Rope-maker's Alley, Moorfields, London, in 1675. He preached at Utrecht in 1685; returned to London, and died there in 1701. He published two Sermons, and in 1698 A Treatise on the Art of Expounding Scripture by the Points called Accents. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 535.

Cross, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted at the age of twenty-one; in 1827 was sent to New Zealand, in 1829 to the Friendly Islands, and in October, 1835, with Gargill, to the cannibals of Fiji. He remained at his post until his death, Oct. 15, 1842. The story of his trials and dangers and marvelous successes may be found in the Life of Cross, by John Hunt (Lond. 1846, 12mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1844; Moister, Hist. of Wesleyan Missions, 1858.

Cross, William G., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Morgan County, Va., Jan. 17, 1822. He experienced religion at the age of twenty-two; united with the Baltimore Conference in 1846; became a superannuate in 1873; and died Aug. 4 of the same year. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1874, p. 4.

Cross-alphabets is a name applied to certain characters made by the pope at the dedication of churches. A pot of ashes is provided, which, in the course of the ceremony, is strewed in two lines, each about a span in breadth, in the form of a cross, transversely from angle to angle of the church. During the chanting of the Benedictus the pontiff scores with the point of his pastoral staff on one of these lines the Greek alphabet, and on the other the Latin.

Cross-week. The days of the rogation were so called in 1571; the name formerly designated the week in which the finding of the Holy Cross, May 8, was kept.

Crosse, JOHN, A.M., an English divine, was born in 1737. For upwards of thirty years he was vicar of Bradford, Yorkshire, and died there June 17, 1816. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, July, 1816, p. 485.

Crossett, CORTEX Z., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Danbury, N. H., Sept. 17, 1853. He was converted in 1875, joined the West Wisconsin Conference in 1877, and labored at Necedah, Ellsworth, and Pepin, where he died, Sept. 17, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 319.

Crossette, ROBERT, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary, was settled for a time at Dennyville, Me., and afterwards served churches in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. In 1868 he removed to College Hill, O., where he died, June 24, 1872. See Presbyterian, July 6, 1872.

Crossley, David, an English Baptist minister, a co-laborer in early life of John Bunyan as a preacher, became pastor in 1705 at Curriers' Hall, Cripplegate, London, and years afterwards retired into the country, where he eventually kept a school, and died about 1743. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 572. (J. C. S.)

Crossley, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at White Hall, Over Darwen, Nov. 20, 1790. He was converted when about fourteen years of age; educated himself; was ordained at Tosside, Yorkshire, in 1820; afterwards labored at Horwich, Buxton, and Lichfield; and then, resigning the regular ministry, removed to Farnworth, where he died, Oct. 23, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 232.

Crothwaite, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan missionary, was accepted by the Conference in 1830; labored partly in Nova Scotia and partly in the West Indies, and died May 1, 1836, aged thirty-one. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1836; Cooney, Autobiog. of a Wesleyan Missionary (Montreal, 1856), p. 234.

Croswell, Andrew (1), a Congregational minister, was born in Charlestown, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1728; was ordained in Groton, Conn., in 1736; installed over a new society in Boston, Mass., Oct. 6, 1738, and died April 12, 1785, aged seventy-six years. He published a number of Sermons and controversial pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 822.

Croswell, Andrew (2), an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Falmouth, Mass., July 9, 1822. He studied at the academy in his native place and at Phillips Academy in Andover; graduated from Brown University in 1843, and from the theological seminary at Alexandria, Va., in 1846. He was ordained deacon the same year, took charge of a mission station in Johnston, R. I., was ordained a presbyter in 1848, had charge of a Church in Chicopee, Mass., then became rector of St. Paul's Church in Brunswick, Me., where he remained till the spring of 1853, and then removed to Newton Lower Falls, Mass., and was rector of St. Mary's Church in that place three years. He afterwards resided in Cambridge for a time; out of his efforts grew St. James's parish, North Cambridge, of which he was rector till the spring of 1871. He died on Cushing's Island, near Portland, June 30, 1879. See Brown University Necrology, 1879, 1880; Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 171. (J. C. S.)

Croswell, Harry, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal

clergyman, was born at West Hartford, Conn., June 16, 1778. He was ordained deacon in 1814, and presbyter in 1815. He began his ministerial work in Christ Church, Hudson, N. Y., in May, 1814, and on Jan. 1 of the following year commenced his services in Church Street, New York city, and was instituted rector of the parish Feb. 22, 1816. For more than forty years he was rector of Trinity Church, New Haven, Conn., and died there, March 18, 1858. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1858, p. 178.

Crouch, Benjamin T., Sr., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in New Castle County, Del., July 1, 1796. He joined the Church in 1816; received license to exhort in 1818; and in 1819 was licensed to preach, and admitted into the Ohio Conference. On the formation of the Kentucky Conference, in 1820, he became one of its members. He took a superannuate relation in 1827, re-entered the effective ranks in 1830, and continued faithful until 1856, when he again became a superannuate and took charge of a school at Goshen, Oldham Co., Ky., where he died, April 26, 1858. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1858, p. 8.

Crouch, Benjamin T., Jr., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born and reared in Kentucky. He embraced religion early in life, and in 1851 entered the Memphis Conference. After two or three years of useful service, he went as missionary to California, subsequently returned to the regular work of the Memphis Conference, wherein he was faithful until the beginning of the Rebellion, when he became chaplain in the Confederate army, and was shot in the battle of Thompson's Station, Middle Tennessee, in 1863. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1863, p. 434.

Crouch, Christopher J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cecil County, Md., Jan. 1, 1811. He joined the Church when about eighteen; received license to exhort in 1831, and in 1833 entered the Philadelphia Conference, wherein he served with zeal and fidelity until 1868, when he became a supernumerary. He was post-chaplain in the Union army two years, and died Feb. 4, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 34.

Crouch, John F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cecil County, Md., May 27, 1804. He embraced religion at fifteen; was licensed to exhort in 1826; to preach in 1831; and in 1833 entered the Philadelphia Conference; was a supernumerary seven years, and died Sept. 23, 1852. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1853, p. 173.

Crouch, William, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Penton, in Hampshire, April 5, 1628. In 1656 he joined the Friends in London, and by his preaching and pecuniary help did much to sustain their then feeble cause. He died Nov. 18, 1710. See Friends' Library, xi, 287-331. (J. C. S.)

Crouched (or Crutched, i. e. crossed) Friars were a religious order, called also Crosiers or Cross-bearers, which was founded in the 4th century, in honor of the discovery of the Cross by the empress Helena. They came to England in 1244, and carried in their hand a staff, on the top of which was a cross. They had monasteries at London, Ryegate, and Oxford.

Crouched-mas-day is the festival in the Greek Church in honor of the erection of the cross. From this feast, which occurred on Sept. 14, the Eastern Church commenced to calculate its ecclesiastical year.

Crouseilles, PIERRE VINCENT, baron Dombidaud, a French prelate, born at Pau, July 19, 1751, became grand-vicar at Aix, and afterwards canon of the cathedral. He went abroad during the Revolution, and after his return to France was appointed bishop of Quimper, April 21, 1806, and distinguished himself by his zeal for the imperial government. He also employed himself actively in the promotion of missions. He died June 29, 1823, leaving several Mandements, addressed to refractory Britons, the object of which was the celebration of the victories of Napoleon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Crowder, Thomas, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Wake County, N. C., Sept. 22, 1797. He was piously trained, and received a liberal education; was converted in 1819, and in 1821 entered the Virginia Annual Conference, in which he did good service until his death, in December, 1852. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1853, p. 445; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 654.

Crowe, George H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his ministry in 1867, as assistant minister in St. Michael's Church, New York city, and died Sept. 28, 1868. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Crowe, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Coventry, converted young, entered the ministry in 1815, became a supernumerary in 1855, and died while on a visit to Bourton, near Shaftesbury, Oct. 13, 1857, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1858.

Crowe, John Finley, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Green County, Tenn., June 17, 1787. In 1812 he entered Transylvania College, in Kentucky; in 1815 was licensed by the Lexington Presbytery, and soon after accepted a call to Shelbyville, where he labored until 1833. He was professor in Hanover College, Ind., until about 1855, and died Jan. 17, 1860. Dr. Crowe was a man of sound judgment and deep piety. As a teacher, he was ranked among the first. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 84.

Crowe, William, an English Baptist minister, was born at Braintree in December, 1796. He was converted at sixteen; studied with Dr. Bogue of Gosport, and was appointed a missionary to Quilon, in the Bombay presidency. After laboring four years, he returned to England; preached, for a time, at Lutterworth; in Kingston, Surrey, nine years; in Worcester, sixteen years; and then resided, without charge, in Hammersmith, until his death, Nov. 27, 1872. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1873, 258. (J. C. S.)

Crowell, Churchwell Anderson, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Mecklenburg County, N. C., Sept. 15, 1806. He was converted in 1825; licensed to exhort in 1826; to preach in 1828; in 1829 united with the South Carolina Conference; was transferred to the Georgia Conference in 1850, and in 1867 to the South Georgia Conference, laboring faithfully until his death, Jan. 10, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1872, p. 681.

Crowell, Jesse T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Villanova, Chautauque Co., N. Y., April 2, 1839. He was converted in boyhood, and notwithstanding a partial loss of eyesight, acquired much knowledge; was licensed to preach, after a year's study at Wyoming Seminary; entered the Wyoming Conference in 1862, and labored with great success until 1868, when his health failed. He died Feb. 18, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 111.

Crowell, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Middlefield, Mass., Sept. 22, 1806. He was carefully educated, and began to preach in early manhood. In 1838 he became editor of The Christian Watchman, and conducted that paper with distinguished ability. In 1848, the journal being united with The Christian Reflector, Dr. Crowell occupied a pastorate in Waterville, Me., for a year or two, and then for several years was the editor of The Western Watchman, at St. Louis. About 1860 he became a pastor in central Illinois, and was officially connected for a time with Shurtleff College, at Alton. He died at Flanders, N. J., Aug. 19, 1871. Dr.

Crowell was the author of several works, among the best known and most valuable of which are, The Church Member's Manual, and a History of Baptist Literature, which he prepared for the Missionary Jubilee volume. (J. C. S.)

Crowley, Ann, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Shillingford, Oxfordshire, in 1765. She was converted at sixteen, and at twenty-six "first came forth as a minister." In 1796 she removed to Uxbridge, and labored in that vicinity until her death, April 10, 1826. See Piety Promoted, iv, 289. (J. C. S.)

Crowley, Robert, an English divine and poet, was born in Gloucestershire or Northamptonshire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he was elected probationer fellow in 1542. In the beginning of the reign of Edward VI he settled in London, there carried on the trade of printing and bookselling, and preached often, being in orders. Eventually several benefices were bestowed upon him, among which were the archdeaconry and a prebend in Hereford, both of which he resigned in 1567, a prebend in St. Paul's, the rectory of St. Peter le Poor, and the vicarage of St. Giles's, Cripplegate. He died June 18, 1588, leaving, among other works, The Voice of the Last Trumpet, blown by the Seventh Angel:—Pleasure and Pain, Heaven and Hell:—The Four Usual Notes of Christ's Church (1581, 4to). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

CROWN OF CHRISTIAN PRINCES. From the portraits on their coins, it appears that the early emperors adopted the diadem, or simple fillet, worn either simply or encircling the helmet with which their head was covered. The coins of Constantine the Great depict him wearing diadems or fillets of various kinds; some ornamented with gems; some enriched with a double row of pearls, with the loose ends of the fillet hanging down over his shoulders. Sometimes he wears a helmet surrounded by a diadem, with a cross in front. This combination is also seen on the coins of Gratian, Valentinian II, Theodosius, and the emperors Leo and Basil. Heraclynus, A.D. 610-641, is represented as wearing a helmet encircled by a gemmed diadem with pendent ends, and a cross above the forehead. The combination of the diadem with the tiara was borrowed from the Orientals, among whom it had been in use from ancient times. It was worn by Zenobia, and was adopted by her conqueror, Aurelian. It is seen in medals, under the form of a peaked cap ornamented with gems, rising from a jewelled diadem or fillet, tied behind. The cap, in later times, assumed the popular name of tuphan,

Justinian and Theodora. (From Mosaics at San Vitale, Ravenna.)

Tuphan. (From Ferrario.)

the origin of the modern turban. Zonaras describes the emperor Basil, in the 9th century, as wearing a "tiara," popularly known as "tuphan." Another form of the imperial head-gear was a low-crowned cap, apparently destitute of diadem or any special distinction of royalty. This was known as CAMELAIUM

Constantine. (From his Arch at Rome.)

(q. v.). Constantine appears in this cap on his triumphal arch in Rome, and in an illumination from a MS. of the 9th century, representing the Council of Nicea. Justinian, in the mosaics of the sanctuary of San Vitale, at Ravenna, has his head covered with a jewelled cap, while the empress Theodora wears a tiara surrounded with three circlets of gems. Strings of pearls and other gems hang down from each.

The diadem, in its original form of a linen or silken ribbon or fillet, gradually went out of use from Justinian's time, and was replaced by a flexible band of gold, sometimes adorned with a band of pearls and precious stones, representing the old "diadem." The name

Diadem. (From Ferrario.)

"crown" was in use for the imperial symbol as early as the time of Constantine. This circlet was closed by a cap of rich stuff decorated with gems. In the time of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus the royal treasury contained circlets or stemma of various colors, white, green, and blue, according to the enamel with which they were coated. These circlets decorated with gems are mentioned by Claudian in connection with the two sons of Theodosius, Arcadius and Honorius, towards the end of the 4th century.

The most ancient examples of crowns are those long preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Monza, in Lombardy, belonging to the early part of the 7th century. These crowns were three in number: (1) the so-called Iron Crown, "Corona Ferrea;" (2) the crown of Agilulf; and (3) that of Theodelinda. Agilulf's crown was taken to Paris as a prize of war by Napoleon I. in 1804, by mistake for the Iron Crown, and was stolen from the "Cabinet des Médailles," in which it was deposited, and melted down. See CORONATION.

CROWN, as a Christian Emblem, being the symbol of victory and recompense (Rev. ii, 10; 2 Tim. iv, 8), became the token of martyrdom; first, the cross was crowned, and then crowns of laurel, flowers, palm, or precious metal were suspended or carved over the tombs of martyrs and confessors. Sometimes the divine hand offers the crown; sometimes two crowns are represented, for a virgin martyr; or doves carry crowns of olive, emblems of peace bought by the martyr's triumph; or the palm and cross are associated, to represent the merit, the labor, and prize. Hence came the hanging crown of light; and the "oblations," the representation of the Blessed offering their crowns to the Redeemer. The Christian emperors gave their soldiers crowns of laurel, adorned with the monogram of Christ.—Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.

CROWN OF CHRISTIANS. See AUREOLE.

CROWN, CLERICAL. See CORONA CLERICALIS.

CROWN, DEDICATED. See CORONA VOTIVA.

CROWN, FUNERAL, was made of leaves and flowers among the Greeks generally of parsley, which was usually wreathed around the head of a dead person before interment. Floral wreaths were often placed upon the bier, or scattered on the road along which the funeral procession was to pass, or twisted round the urn in which the ashes were contained, or the tomb in which the remains were laid.

CROWN OF LIGHT. See CORONA LUCIS.

CROWN, NATAL, was that which it was customary to suspend at the threshold of a house in which a child was born. At Athens, when the child was a boy, the natal crown was of olive; when a girl, of wool; while at Rome they were of laurel, ivy, or parsley.

CROWN, NUPTIAL, was one with which persons just entering into the bonds of matrimony were decked. Newly married persons of both sexes among the Hebrews wore crowns upon their wedding-day. Among the early Christians the act of crowning the parties was the commencement of the marriage ceremony. This was done by the priest with due solemnity. On the eighth day the married pair presented themselves again in the church, when the minister, after an appropriate prayer, took off the nuptial crown and dismissed them with his solemn benediction. The ceremonies of coronation and dissolving the crowns are still observed in the Greek Church. The crowns used in Greece are of olive branches twined with white and purple ribbon; but in Russia they are of gold and silver, or, in country places, of tin, and are preserved as the property of the Church. Among the Jews, nuptial coronation continued until the beginning of the war under Vespasian; and crowns of roses, myrtle, and ivy are still used in Jewish marriages in many places. See CORONA NUPTIALIS; MARRIAGE.

CROWN, RADIATED, is one with rays apparently emanating from it, and used by the ancient Romans to place upon the heads of the images of their gods or deified heroes.

CROWN, SACERDOTAL, was worn by the priests or sacerdotes of the ancient Romans when engaged in offering sacrifices. It was formed of different materials, sometimes of olive, sometimes of gold; but the most ancient sacrificial garland used by the Romans was made of ears of corn.

CROWN, SUTILE, was composed of any kind of flowers sewed together, and used by the Salii (q. v.) at their festivals.

CROWN OF TAPERS. See CORONA LUCIS.

CROWN, VOTIVE. See CORONA VOTIVA.

Crowns (Heb. כִּטְוֹן, taggin) is a name given to points or horns with which certain letters in the MSS. used in the Jewish synagogues are decorated, and which distinguish them from the MSS. in ordinary use. The rabbins affirm that God gave them to Moses on Mount Sinai, and that he taught him how to make them. See TITTLE.

Crowns, ADAM, a Lutheran minister, was born at Sharon, N. Y., in 1798. He studied the classics and theology at Hartwick Seminary, graduating in 1823; the same year was licensed by the New York Ministerium, and began to preach in Sharon and Rhinebeck (then Guilderland), where he remained over twenty years. He was thereafter pastor at Middleburg, and subsequently returned to Guilderland. He died in May, 1865. See Lutheran Observer, Aug. 25, 1865.

Crowson, ELIJAH L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was converted at twenty, labored many years as a local preacher, and in 1854 entered the Little Rock Conference. He became superannuated in 1867, and died Jan. 3, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1868, p. 274.

Crowther, Jonathan (1), an early English Methodist minister, was converted in youth, and labored for thirty-eight years in the Wesleyan connection. In 1819 he was chosen president of the English Conference, and in 1820 of the Irish Conference. He died June 8, 1824. He is the author of Portraiture of Methodism (1811), and a number of minor works of the same character. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1824, p. 472; Osborn, Meth. Literature, s. v.

Crowther, Jonathan (2), an English Methodist minister, son of Timothy, and nephew of the above and of Robert, was born at St. Austell, Cornwall, July 31, 1794. He was converted in youth, and educated at Kingwood School. In 1814 he began to preach, and in 1823 was appointed head-master of that school, having already held the same office at Woodhouse Grove. He afterwards served several important circuits, until he was called in 1837 to the superintendency of the Wesleyan missions in Madras, where he labored with great efficiency. In 1843 he returned to home work in England, and in 1849 was appointed classical tutor in the Wesleyan Theological Institution at Didsbury, where he remained until his death, Jan. 11, 1856. He published several Sermons and other pamphlets. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856, p. 202.

Crowther, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Booth-town, near Halifax, in 1762. He was converted at about the age of fifteen, was received by the conference in 1789, and continued to travel until 1830, when he became a supernumerary at Rochdale. He died there Jan. 19, 1833. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1833; Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1834, p. 881 sq.

Crowther, Samuel, A.M., an English divine, was born in London, Jan. 9, 1769. He was educated at Croydon Free-school and Winchester College; became fellow of New College, Oxford; was ordained in 1792 to the curacy of East Bergholt, Suffolk, and removed in 1795 to Barking, Essex. In 1800 he received the united livings of Christ Church, Newgate Street, and St. Leonard's, Foster Lane; and was shortly after chosen one of the lecturers of St. Botolph, Bishopgate. March 27, 1825, he was seized with apoplexy, and he died Sept. 28, 1829. See (Lond.) Christian Guardian, Nov. 1829, p. 440.

Crowther, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Bridlington Quay, England, July 7, 1840. He graduated from Columbia College, N. Y., in 1858; spent about four years in teaching; one in Princeton Seminary (1863); and graduated from Union Seminary, N. Y., in 1865. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 18, 1866, and ordained an evangelist in 1867; went to Southfield Congregational Church, New Marlborough, Mass., as a supply, and was installed Jan. 23, 1868; next at Pittsfield, in 1872; and in 1875 was called to Brooklyn, N. Y., first as pastor of the Memorial Presbyterian Church, and then as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, where he died, Oct. 10, 1877. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 62.

Crowther, Timothy, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Halifax in 1757. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, under the ministrations of a clergyman of the Church of England; entered the ministry in 1784, became a supernumerary in 1815, and died March 25, 1829. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1829.

Crowther, William, an English Baptist minister, was born at Gomersal, Yorkshire, April 2, 1816. He was baptized in 1834; spent the greater part of his ministerial career as a supply and occasional preacher, while continuing in business at his native place; but eventually accepted the pastorate of Rehoboth Chapel, Lockwood, where he died in 1882. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1883, p. 257.

Croxall, Samuel, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Walton-upon-Thames, in Surrey, and received his education at Eton School and St. John's College, Cambridge. He probably was ordained about 1713. Soon after leaving the university he was instituted to the vicarage of Hampton, in Middlesex, and afterwards, in February, 1731, to the united parishes of St. Mary Somerset and St. Mary Mounthaw, in London. He was also chancellor, prebendary, canon residentiary, and portionist of the church of Hereford. In 1732 he was made archdeacon of Salop and chaplain to the king, and in February, 1734, obtained the vicarage of Sellack, in Herefordshire. He died Feb. 13, 1752. The following are some of his works: Two Original Cantos, in Im- itation of Spenser's Fairy Queen, as a Satire on the Earl of Oxford's Administration:—The Vision:—The Fair Circassian (1722, 4to). He was the author of Scripture Politics (1735, 8vo). His latest publication was The Royal Manual. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Croy (or Crouy), GUSTAVE MAXIMILIEN JUSTE, prince de, a French prelate, was born at the chateau of the Hermitage, near Vieux Condé, Sept. 12, 1778. From early youth he exhibited great piety and an inclination towards preaching. He entered the ecclesiastical calling as canon of the grand chapter of Strasbourg. His noble birth gave him high honors in the Church, but at the time of the French Revolution he was obliged to take refuge at Vienna, where he was one of the four canons of the Lichtenstein foundation. In 1817 he was appointed bishop of Strasbourg; in 1821 succeeded the cardinal of Perigord as grand-almoner of France; became peer of France in 1822; in 1824 was transferred from the bishopric of Strasbourg to the archbishopric of Rouen; was made cardinal in 1825, and died in 1844. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Crozet, THOMAS, a French theologian of the order of Recolets, devoted himself to preaching, resided for a long time at Madrid, and died at Avignon in 1720. He published, Consejos de la Sabiduría Recapitulación de las Maximas, etc. (Marseilles, 1690):—Maximes Morales:—Histoire de la Bienheureuse Vierge Marie (ibid. 1695); republished under the title La Mystique Ciel de Dieu:—Censura Censura (Cologne, 1697):—Introduction aux Vertus Morales et Héroïques (Brussels, 1722):—Indiculus Universalis (Lyons, 1705). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Crozier, ROBERT, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Trory, near Enniskillen, in 1765. He was converted in early life; entered the ministry in 1793; was secretary of the conference in 1815; pleaded strongly for the right of societies to receive the sacraments during the famous discussions at that time; retired to his native place in 1822; and died very suddenly, Nov. 8, 1856. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Cruaidh, surnamed COB-PRADA (i. e. Longlegs), an Irish saint of Bolana (now probably Ballina, in Tipperary), commemorated Oct. 26, is represented as having been appealed to by St. Moling (q. v.) for help in a case of danger.

Crucifix. It is necessary to distinguish between the use of this figure as an object or instrument of devotion, and that of pictorial or other representations of the Crucifixion as a scene. Every variety and combination of the arts of sculpture, mosaic, painting, and engraving has been applied to this great subject from early times, and to all parts of it; and this distinction is one of principle as well as convenience.

If the end of the 5th century be considered the beginning of the Middle Ages, the public representation of the Crucifixion may be said to be a mediæval usage in point of time. Martigny claims for France the honor of having possessed the first public crucifix-painting which ever existed; for which he refers to Gregory of Tours, and which he says must have been at least as old as the middle of the 6th century. But he says, probably with great correctness, that all the most eminent Crucifixions known were objects of private devotion, instancing the pectoral cross of queen Theodelinda, and the Syriac MS. of the Medicean Library at Florence. The official or public use of the cross as a symbol of redemption begins with Constantine, though, of course, it had been variously employed by all Christians at an earlier date. See Cross.

Antique Blasphemous Graffiti of the Crucifixion.

Crucifixes, according to Guericke, did not appear in churches till after the 7th century. Such images, probably, in the early days of the Church, would produce too crude and painful an effect on the Christian imagination, and to that of the more hopeful pagan they would be intolerable; not only because his feelings would recoil from the thought of the punishment of the cross, but from superstitious terror of associating the "unhappy tree" with a Divine Being. The Graffito Blasfemo of the Palatine illustrates this; but Christian teachers may have refrained from any addition to the cross, as a symbol of divine humiliation and suffering, from purely charitable motives.

Perpendicular of the Vulcan Cross.

The cross itself may have been felt to be temporarily unwelcome to persons in certain stages of conversion.

Cruciger. See CREUTZIGER.

Cruden, the name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. DAVID, D.D., took his first degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1764; was licensed to preach in 1768; presented to the living at Nigg in 1769; and died Nov. 18, 1826, aged eighty years. He published, in 1821, Observations on the Conduct of a Minister; also An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 511.

2. GEORGE, took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1791; became schoolmaster in that city; was licensed to preach in 1805; became a teacher of mathematics at Aberdeen; was presented to the living at Logie-Buchan in 1817; and died Sept. 11, 1850, aged seventy-six years. He published, Historical Evidence of the Fulfilment of the Promise, "Lo, I am with you always," etc. (1823);—An Account of the Parishes of Old Deer and Logie-Buchan. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 610.

3. WILLIAM, was born at Pitaligo in 1725; took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1743; became a teacher of English at Montrose; was licensed to preach in 1752; called to the living at Logie in 1758, and ordained; presented to the living in 1759; resigned, on being called to the Relief Meeting-house, Glasgow, in 1767; was elected minister of the Scots Church, Crown Court, London, in 1778, where he continued till his death, Nov. 5, 1785. His publications were, Hymns on a Variety of Divine Subjects (1761);—Sermons on Evangelical and Practical Subjects (1787). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 888; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 9.

Crudup, JONAH, a Baptist minister, was born in Wake County, N. C., June 5, 1791; ordained in August, 1813, and was pastor of several churches in North Carolina for about fifty years. Mr. Crudup was a preacher of surpassing eloquence, and was a member of Congress from 1821 to 1823. He died May 20, 1872. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 299. (J. C. S.)

Cruet (Urceolus, amula, burette) is a vase for holding the water and wine used at holy communion. John de Garlande, writing cir. 1080, says there should be two cruets—one for wine, the other for water. The ancient cruets were very rarely of crystal or glass, generally of enamelled copper, and, in consequence, about the 14th century, were distinguished by the letters V and A to mark their contents. Several ancient examples are preserved—one of the 13th century, at Paris; one, in the form of an angel, of the 14th century, at Aix-la-Chapelle; and another of the 14th or 15th century in the same cathedral, silver gilt. Sometimes the handle was made in the form of a dragon. After the time of the Renaissance the cruetes were made of transparent material; there was one at Grandmont Abbey, however, of crystal, mounted in silver, of the 18th century, with an eagle engraved upon it. A cruet for oil, in bronze, used at the coronations of the emperors, and shaped like an antique bust, is preserved in the treasury of Aix-la-Chapelle. Four of silver, of the 9th century, are preserved in the Vatican; they are of classical form. See AMA; AMPULLA.

Crüger, Johann, a German composer of Church music, was born April 9, 1598, at Gross-Breesa, near Guben, in Brandenburg. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1622 organist at St. Nikolai, in Berlin, and died there, Feb. 23, 1662. He wrote, Præcepta Musica Practica Figurata (Berlin, 1625);—Synopsis Musica (ibid. 1630);—Quæstiones Musicae (1650); and composed, besides, many chorals, which are still in use in the German Church. He also published, Neues Gesangbuch augsburger Konfession (ibid. 1640);—Geistliche Kirchenmelodien (Leips. 1649);—Psalmodes Sacra (1658);—Praecepta Pietatis (eod.). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleides, iv, 99 sq.; Grove, Dict. of Music, s. v. (B. P.)

Crüger, Theodor, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1694 at Stettin, in Pomerania. He studied at Jena and Wittenberg; was in 1721 rector at Lucka, in Lower Lusatia; in 1727, pastor at Kirchhain; in 1732, superintendent at Colditz, and in 1735 at Chemnitz. He was made doctor of theology in 1737, and died June 1, 1751, leaving, Schediasma Historicum, etc. (Wittenberg, 1719);—De Successione Pontificum Romanorum (ibid. 1723);—Heptalogos in Ara Crucis (Frankfort, 1726);—De Veterum Christianorum Disciplina Arcana (Wittenberg, 1727);—Introductio in Christologiam Moralem (Dresden, 1732), etc. See Mosera, Jetztlebende Theologen; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 634; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Crugot, Martin, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Bremen, Jan. 5, 1725. Under Iken and Nonne he prepared himself for the ministry, without attending any university. In 1746 he accepted a call to Herford; in 1747 went to Carolath; in 1748 was called as second preacher to Blomberg, but returned again to Carolath, where he died, Sept. 5, 1790, leaving Sermons, besides some ascetical works, as, Morgen- und Abendgedanken (Züllichau, 1777);—Das Wesentliche in der Christlichen Sittens- und Glaubenslehre (Sajan, 1776);—Der Christ in der Einsamkeit (Breslau, 1761; 5th ed. 1779). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 288 sq. (B. P.)

Cruikshank (or Cruikshank) is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. ALEXANDER, was licensed to preach in 1748; presented to the living at Mearns in 1752; and died Jan. 22, 1791, aged sixty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 228.

2. GEORGE (1), studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen; was schoolmaster for a time; licensed to preach in 1735; called to the living at Arbroath in 1737, and ordained in 1738; transferred to Kinnell in 1748; and died Nov. 12, 1753. He published, Answers to the Queries of Mr. Mailland. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 786, 801.

3. GEORGE (2), took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1771; was schoolmaster at Inveravon, and assistant minister at Rothies; appointed to the living there in 1788, and ordained; and died June 15, 1838, aged eighty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 226.

4. JAMES (1), D.D., son of the rector of Banff Academy, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1806; was licensed to preach in 1812; ordained in 1816 as assistant at Turreff; presented to the living in 1821; transferred to Fyvie in 1843; and died April 12, 1858, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 648.

5. JAMES (2), was licensed to preach, and presented to the living at Manor in 1833 and ordained; transferred to Stevenston in 1843. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 251.

6. JAMES ALEXANDER, son of the minister at Glass, became schoolmaster of that parish in 1822; took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1823; was licensed to preach in 1827, appointed assistant at Mortlach the same year, and ordained; presented to the living in 1837. He was one of the majority who joined in ordaining the presentee to Marnoch in 1841, against the wish of the assembly. He was living in 1863. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 211.

7. JOHN, a native of Culsaund, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1789; was licensed to preach in 1795; presented to the living at Glass in 1799; and died Dec. 20, 1841, aged seventy-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 200.

8. THOMAS, was the first Protestant minister at Kinloch; called to the living in 1567, presented in 1573, and in 1574 had three other places in charge. He continued in 1590. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 807.

9. WILLIAM, was licensed to preach in 1740; called to the living at Ruthven in 1743; ordained in 1744; and died July 14, 1756. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 759.

Cruikshank, William, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in 1798, at Salem, N. Y. He graduated from Union College in 1821, studied theology in New Brunswick Theological Seminary, entered the ministry in 1824, and was settled on Long Island, at Flatlands and New Lots (1825-34). In 1835 he founded the Reformed Church at Newburg, N. Y., and was its pastor until 1838. For several years thereafter he was without charge, on account of ill-health, and only served as stated supply in the retired church of Mamakating from 1849 until his death in 1854. Mr. Cruikshank was an eloquent and powerful preacher, of logical mind and impressive delivery, possessed of a voice of great power and flexibility, and graceful in appearance and manners. He was the author of a standard tract published by the American Tract Society, entitled David Bulwin, or, the Miller's Son, also of a printed sermon on the Intermediate State. While without pastoral care, he published a series of papers under the heading of Washington's Body-Guard. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 225. (W. J. R. T.)

Cruimmin, an Irish saint, commemorated June 28, was the son of Cormac, of the race of Tadhg, and of Darerca, the sister of St. Patrick. The latter placed him in charge of some relics at Lecain (now Leckin), and he lived as bishop there till an extreme old age. By some he is confounded with St. Cruemus, and by others with St. Cruimthor Nathi (festival on Aug. 9), who prophesied St. Fechin's greatness.

Cruimther (dimin. cruimtheran), an Irish word for presbyter or priest, often occurring in the calendars prefixed to proper names.

Cruimtheria, a daughter of king Longobardus, placed by St. Patrick in a cell on Mt. Kengobha, to the east of Armagh (now Ballyboley Hill, in Antrim), and was there occupied in making ecclesiastical embroidery.

Cruithnechan (otherwise called Caricamus, by way of diminutive), an Irish saint, commemorated March 7, flourished about the beginning of the 6th century. He was the son of Cellachan, and, after marrying and having children, renounced the world, with his three daughters. He baptized St. Columba in the Church of Tulach-Dubglaise (now Temple-Douglas, in Donegal).

Crum, George Cramer, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Winchester, Va., June 29, 1809. At seventeen he removed to Hillsborough, O., where he was converted in 1827, licensed to preach in 1831, and received into the Ohio Conference the same year. During his long service in the itinerant ranks he served many of the best charges in his conference. He was a member of the Cincinnati Conference from its organization in 1852 until the close of his life. He was superannuated in 1877, and died in Xenia, March 4, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 321.

Crum, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Elizabeth, Allegheny Co., Pa., Dec. 25, 1809. He united with the Seceder Church in early manhood, about a year afterwards was converted, and soon joined the Methodists in Ashtabula County, O. He entered the Erie Conference in 1836, and travelled with but slight intermission until his death at Volant, Pa., Jan. 10, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 316.

Crume, Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was converted in 1785, in Shenandoah County, Va.; emigrated to Kentucky later; was licensed to preach in 1793, and labored in that capacity until 1808, when he entered the Western Conference. In 1823 he became superannuated, and thus continued until his death in 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 52.

Crump, John, an English Nonconformist divine, became minister at Maidstone about 1653, and was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He published The Great Supper (1669). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Crump, John Henry, A.M., an English Congregational minister, was born at Coventry, March 15, 1803. In 1822 he entered the Congregational College at Hoxton; in 1826 became pastor at Weymouth; in 1838 chaplain of the Protestant Dissenters' Collegiate School at Mill Hill, Middlesex, and in 1847 removed to Lechlade, Gloucestershire, where he died Feb. 14, 1849. He wrote a beautiful memoir of his friend, Rev. Thomas C. Everett. See (Lond.) Evang. Magazine, 1849, p. 225.

Crump, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Dudley in 1800. He was converted in early life, began his ministry in 1825, retired to his native place in 1860, and died June 5, 1862. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 31.

Crumpton, Thomas, an English Baptist minister, was born near Tenbury, Worcestershire, in December, 1780, or January, 1781. He was baptized about 1800, and, for many years, was officially connected with "The Baptist Itinerant and Missionary Societies," "The Sunday-school Union," and other kindred institutions. In September, 1840, he commenced a six years' pastorate at Shrewsbury. He died at Leeds, Sept. 25, 1868. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1869, p. 138. (J. C. S.)

Crummhael is the name of several old Irish saints. See also CONAMHAIL.

1. Also called Cruindmael-Erbuilg, son of Ronan, of the sept of the Hy-Cennsealch, ruled for three years as chief of the clan, and then became a monk at Clonard, in Meath. He was a special friend of St. Lasrean, bishop of Leighlinn, and died A.D. 650. He is commemorated June 22.

2. Abbot after Dubhdabbhoireann at Clonard, A.D. 787 till his death in 793, and also for some time at Druim-Ineaglaínn (now Dromiskin, in Louth). He has no festival day.

Cruse, Christian, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 27, 1794, of Danish parents. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1815; was appointed professor in that institution in 1831, but resigned in 1833; was ordained in 1842; became rector of Trinity parish, Fishkill, N. Y., in April, 1846; resigned in 1851; soon after became librarian of the General Theological Seminary, and devoted himself to the study of ancient languages. He died in New York city, Oct. 5, 1865. In Syriac, Hebrew, and Greek, Dr. Cruse was one of the most learned men in his Church. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. January, 1866, p. 669.

Crusenius, NICOLAUS, prior of the Augustinian monasteries at Brussels and Antwerp, and general visitor of his order in Austria and Bohemia, who died at Vienna in 1629, is the author of Monasticum Augustinianum, etc. (Munich, 1623). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 705; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Crustius, Magnus, a Lutheran theologian, was born in Schleswig, Jan. 10, 1697. He studied at Kiel, was in 1723 called to Copenhagen, and accompanied as chaplain the Danish ambassador to France. In 1781 he was appointed to the pastorate at Bramstedt, in Holstein, in 1733 first preacher and member of consistory at Flensburg, in 1735 professor of theology at Göttingen, where he also took, in 1787, the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1747 he was made general superintendent at Harburg, and died Jan. 6, 1751. He is the author of De Senectute Heroica Veterum Christianorum (Harburg, 1721); — Prologi Origenis in Evangelia SS. Mat., Lucae et Joannis (Göttingen, 1735); — De Resurrectione Spirituali (ibid. 1788); — De Mysterio Silentii et Clamoris (ibid. eod.), etc. See Mosers u. Neubauer, Jetztlebende Theologen; Heinsius, Kirchen Historie, iv; Strodtmann, Neues Gelehrtes Europa, v; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 897. (B. P.)

Cruso, Timothy, A.M., an English Nonconformist minister, was born in 1655. He was educated for the ministry, first in a dissenting academy, and then at one of the universities of Scotland; and was pastor of a church which met in Crutched Friars, London, where he continued to the close of his life, Nov. 26, 1697. Mr. Cruso was chosen one of the preachers of the Merchants' Lecture at Pinner's Hall, and his sermons there verify the high eulogium given him by all for his great ability. See Bogue and Bennet, Hist. of Dissenters (2d ed.), i, 467; (Lond.) Theol. and Bibl. Mag. Oct. 1805, p. 383; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 56.

CRUX ANSATA. See CROSS.

Crux (Saint), JUAN DE, a Spanish ascetic theologian, whose family name was Yesiez, was born in 1542 at Ontiveros, in Old Castile. At twenty-one he became a Carmelite at the monastery of Medina del Campo, and aided St. Theresa in reforming the monks, who eventually, however, through enmity, took him to Toledo, where he was imprisoned for nine months, and then was released through St. Theresa's interposition. He afterwards founded and controlled some monasteries. In 1591 he encountered new persecutions, and was banished to the convent of Pegnuela, upon the Sierra Morena, but obtained the liberty of retiring to the convent of Ubeda, where he died, Dec. 14, 1591. He was beatified in 1675, and canonized in 1726. He wrote, Noche Obscura del Alma; — Subida del Monte Carmelo; — Cantico Espiritual entre le Alma y Chrysto, su Esposa; — Llamu de Amor Viva; and other works in Spanish. His works, collected and published for the first time at Barcelona in 1619, were translated into French by P. Cyprian (Paris, 1641); by P. Louis of St. Theresa (ibid. 1665); by P. Maillard (ibid. 1694); and in Latin by P. Andrew de Jesus (Cologne, 1639). They are written in an obscure and mysterious style. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Cryer, Thomas, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Bingley, Yorkshire, in 1800. He was converted at twenty, and in 1829 was sent as a missionary to India. He labored in Bangalore, Madras, Negapatam, and Manargoody. During an interval from missionary labor (1840-41) he was stationed at Dewsbury, England. He was appointed to Madras in 1852, arrived in that city Oct. 1, and died Oct. 5. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1853, p. 186.

Crypt. Of this important form of church architecture we give additional details from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. a. v.:

"The earliest crypts which we possess are those of Hexham and Ripon. They have several entrances; one used exclusively by the priest serving at the altar, the others for the ascent and descent of the worshippers, and opening into a chapel containing relics and a recess for an altar. In the wall are niches, with funnel-headed openings for lamps. At Winchester, a low, arched doorway, below the screen of the feretory, led down to the relic chamber, which was in consequence called the Holy Hole. In later times, umbries and secret hiding-places for plate and treasures were generally provided. In the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries crypts became developed into magnificent subterranean churches, like those of Canterbury, Gloucester, Rochester, Worcester, Winchester; St. Peter's, Oxford; Bayeux, Chartres, Salines, Auxerre, Bourges, Holy Trinity, Caen; St. Denis, Ghent; Fiesole, Padua, Florence, Pavia, Palermo, and Modena. The earlier examples are of moderate dimensions, resembling cells, as in the pre-Norman examples at Lullingham, at St. Melon, at Rouen, of the 4th century; St. Maur, and Faye la Vineuse. After the 14th century the crypt was replaced by lateral chapels built above ground. In fact, all crypts—called in some places the crowds—the shrouds, or undercroft—were built to put Christians in remembrance of the old state of the Primitive Church before Constantine. The crypts of the Duomo and San Ambrogio, Milan, Parma, and Monte Cassino, are still used as a winter choir; and the parish church of St. Faith, in the shrouds of St. Paul's, was occupied until the Great Fire. Several of the largest cathedrals, built on unfavorable sites for excavation, as Durham and Chichester, have no crypt. The crypts of Winchester, Rochester, Gloucester, Worcester, and Canterbury were all made before 1035; and after that date the construction of crypts was laid aside, except where they were a continuation of existing buildings, as at Canterbury and Rochester. There is, however, an exceptional Early English example under the Lady Chapel of Hereford, and one of Decorated date at Waltham. A curious Decorated contrivance for constructing a crypt in an earlier church, which was never designed to have one, may be seen at Wimborne Minster, where the crypt under the presbytery lies open to the aisles. At Bosham and Dorchester (Oxon) there is a small crypt in the south alley of the nave, under a raised platform, for an altar or chapel, which is only another specimen, on a much smaller scale, of the same principle which, at Lubek, Hildesheim, Naumburg, Halberstadt, Rochester, and Canterbury, left the crypt floor on a level almost with the nave, and raised the choir-level to a great height, enclosing it with stone screens. At Christchurch and Gloucester there was a crypt under each corner of the cross, except the western one. At Auxerre and Bourges the crypt, like the subterranean church of Assisi, was useful as a constructional arrangement to maintain the level of the choir. Occasionally the crypt assumes rather the character of a lower church, as in the Salnte-Chapelle (Paris), Eton, and St. Stephen's, Westminster. There is no example of a crypt in the Peninsula or Ireland, and Scotland possesses only one, at Glasgow. At Westminster, Glasgow, and Wells there is a crypt under the chapter-house, which contained an altar. The crypt was frequently lighted brilliantly on great festivals, and its chapels were constantly thronged with pilgrims and visitors, so that at present we can hardly portray to ourselves, in their cheerless desolation, that once they were much frequented places of prayer."

Crypta seems to have been sometimes used in Christian times as synonymous with "cemetery." We may, however, mark this distinction between the two words, that "cemetery" is a word of wider signification, including open-air burial-grounds, while "crypta" is strictly limited to those excavated beneath the surface of the ground.

We sometimes meet with the expression crypta arenarum, or crypta arenaria (i. e. "of the sand-pits"), in connection with the interment of Christian martyrs. These would seem to indicate the galleries of a deserted pozzuolana pit, as places of sepulture. But though the subterranean cemeteries very frequently had a close connection with these quarries, and were approached through their adits, the sand-pits themselves were seldom or never used for interment, for which, indeed, they were unfit, without very extensive alteration and adaptation. The passages referred to, which are chiefly found in the not very trustworthy Acts of the Martyrs, have probably originated in a confusion between the catacombs themselves and the quarries with which they were often so closely connected.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. a. v. See CATACOMBS.

Crystallomanicy (Gr. κρυστάλλος, crystal, glass, and μαντεία, divination) is a species of divination by means of a mirror or enchanted glass, in which future events were said to be represented or signified by certain marks or figures.

Cseles, MARTIN, a Hungarian theologian, was born at Rosenthal, Jan. 23, 1641. He took holy orders in 1657, and afterwards went to Rome as pontifical penitentiary. Returning to his country, he was appointed provost of Raab and Presburg. During the civil troubles which broke out in Hungary he fell into the hands of the Rakotzki party, who held him prisoner for a year. He died at Patak, Jan. 14, 1709, leaving, Educatio Historico-Chronologica de Episcopatu Transylvanica:—Descriptio Amplitudinis Episcopatus Sirmiensis. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Ctesiphon, a Roman (probably) to whom St. Jerome writes from Bethlehem (Epist. 138, ed. Vall.) on the question of Pelagianism, on which Ctesiphon had written to ask his opinion.

Ctesiphon (on the Tigris), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Ctesiphonense), was held A.D. 420, under Taballaha, archbishop of Seleucia, on the opposite bank of the river. Here the Nicene faith was received, and with it the canons to which the consent of the rest of the Church westward had been given.

Ctibor, JOHN (called Cotwa), a Moravian theologian, was canon of Brünn, of Olmutz, and of Prague, dean of Sinczka in 1615, and provost of Lutomerz. He died in 1687. He wrote in the Bohemian language. His principal work is directed against the Protestants, and is entitled Larve. His sermons were also esteemed. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Biog. Universelle, a. v.

Ctistolātrēs (κτιστολάτραι, called also, from their founder, Gajanitēs) were a subdivision of the Aphthartodocetæ (q. v.), themselves a sect of the Monophysites, who, in opposition to the Akistatæ, taught that the body of Christ was created. See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 281, Clark's translation; Dörner, Person of Christ, div. ii, vol. i, p. 181; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. ix, 749.

Cuach. See COCCA.

Cuan (Cuanna, Cuanan, or Cuannache; diminutive of Cu, "a hound;" Lat. Cuanus) is a name of several Irish saints:

1. Of Airbre in Hy-Cennsealach, Leinster, commemorated July 10, is thought to have succeeded St. Brogan (q. v.) in the abbacy of Mothel, Waterford.

2. Of Cluain-mor (now Clonmore, Carlow), commemorated Oct. 15, is thought to have accompanied St. Moliny (q. v.).

There is another Cuan, "of Ath-easrach" (now probably Ahasragh, in Galway), who died A.D. 788 or 793, and is commemorated also on Oct. 15.

3. Son of Tigher-nach, of the race of the Nine Hostages, and brother of Sta. Begbile, Colman, and Conna, is commemorated March 2, and lived about the close of the 6th century.

There are also Cuan-Cam and Cuan the anchorite of Lilcah (not identified), who both died A.D. 748; also Cuan of Imleach-Jubhair (Emly), who died A.D. 787; and Cuan of Louth, who died in 823.

Cuanan GLINNE, an Irish saint, commemorated Feb. 8, was abbot of Maghbie (now Morville, County Down), and died in 747.

Cuanghas MAC DALL (i. e. blind boy, although he afterwards received his sight), an Irish saint, commemorated March 13, succeeded St. Pulcherius as abbot of Liathmore (Leamakevoge, in Tipperary), and died in 747.

Cuanna (or Cuanda) is the name of several early Irish saints:

1. Abbot of Killchuanna (now Killoona, in Galway) and Lismore, celebrated Feb. 4, is said to have been born at the close of the 6th century, his mother being Meda (Finmeda or Conmanian), daughter of Fingen, and his father unknown, while his brother was St. Carthach of Rahen. Many miracles are related of him, and he died about 650. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 249 sq.

2. Son of Miodhawn of Rosco, celebrated April 10, is of obscure and confused history, but seems to have died in 721. See Forbes, Scott. Saints, p. 10; Kelly, Irish Saints, xxi.

3. Surnamed "the Blind," celebrated March 11, is thought to have been the son of Tulan, and is said to have been miraculously taught music by St. Patrick.

CUANNA. See MOCHUA.

Cuaran (Koran, Cronan, Mochuaroc, or Crovinus), an early Irish saint (surnamed the Wise), commemorated Feb. 9, is said to have been born in Munster, being the son of Nethservan, of a noble family, and became a bishop, but of what place is unknown. He seems to have flourished about A.D. 570, and is therefore different from Cronan of Lismore.

Cuba, in pagan mythology, was the tutelary goddess of sleepers, especially of children.

Cuba, an early Saxon presbyter, attested a charter of archbishop Ethelheard, A.D. 805.

Cubbitt, GEORGE, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Norwich, in December, 1791. He joined the Church in 1808, at Sheffield, whither his family had removed. He commenced his ministry in 1813; labored in Carbonear and St. John's, Newfoundland, from 1816 to 1818; in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1819, and from 1820 to 1835 in Boston, Oxford, Bristol, Sheffield, Huddersfield, and London. From 1836 to the end of his life he was editor of the conference office publications. In 1839 he replied to the attacks on Methodism made by Daniel O'Connell in the Manchester newspapers. The Times spoke highly of Cubbitt's answers. He died after three days' illness, Oct. 13, 1850. Cubbitt wrote Conversations on the Miracles of Christ (18mo);—Conversations on the Parables, and other minor publications. He was one of the acutest and ablest of Wesleyan theologians. During the latter part of his life he lived as a recluse. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851; Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Meth. iii, 438, 439.

Cubero, PEDRO, a Spanish missionary and traveler, was born in 1645, near Calatayud, in Aragon. He commenced his travels at the age of twenty-five, going from Saragossa to Paris, afterwards visited Rome, Venice, Vienna, Constantinople, Warsaw, Moscow, Astrakhan, Kasbin, Ispahan, Shiraz, Laar, Surat, Goa, Malacca, Manila, and Mexico, returning to Europe after a nine years' absence, and published an account of his missions in Spanish (Madrid, 1680; Saragossa, 1688). Cubero was the first traveller who made the tour of the world from west to east, and in part by land. His work gives a detailed account of the steppes of Astrakhan, of the deserts of Persia, and of Manila. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, & v.; Biog. Universelle, & v.

Cubert. See CUDBERTH.

Cubiculum is a term used in early Christian architecture in two senses.

1. We find it employed to denote what we should now call the side chapels of the nave of a church. The first instance of its use in this sense is in the writings of Paulinus of Nola, who describes the church erected at Nola, and particularizes these side chapels, which were evidently novel features in church arrangement. There were four on each side of the nave, beyond the side aisles, with two verses inscribed over the entrances. Their object was to furnish places of retirement for those who desired to pray or meditate on the word of God, and for the sepulchral memorials of the departed. They differed from the side chapels of later ages in containing no altars, as originally there was but one altar in a church. Paulinus also speaks of these chapels under the name of cellæ or cellule, e. g., when speaking of a thief who had concealed himself in one of them all night. Perhaps the earliest existing example in Rome of such a chapel attached to the body of a church is that of St. Zeno in the Church of Santa Prassede, built by pope Paschal I about A.D. 817.

2. The word cubiculum is likewise employed to designate the family grave chambers in the subterranean cemeteries at Rome. In addition to the ordinary places of interment in the ambulacra, the catacombs contain an immense number of sepulchral chambers or cubicles, each enshrining a larger or smaller number of dead, as well in table tombs and arcosolia, as in loculi pierced in the walls. These were originally family burial-places, excavated and embellished at the expense of the friends of the departed, and from the date of their first construction served for the celebration of the eucharistic feast and agape, on the occasion of the funeral, and its successive anniversaries. In times of persecution they may have supplied places of religious assembly where the faithful might gather in security for the celebration of the holy mysteries, at the graves of the departed martyrs and others whose fate they might be soon called to share by sealing their testimony with their blood. The name cubiculum is of exclusively Christian use as applied to places of interment. From inscriptions in which the term occurs, Marchi infers "that in the 4th century the persons named caused that their own cubacula should be excavated at their own expense. Each cubiculum was of sufficient dimensions to serve for several generations of the respective families. If it proved insufficient loculi were added at a greater or less distance from the cubiculum." Sometimes we find the arch of an arcosolium of the 1st century cut through and used as a door or entrance to a second cubiculum excavated in its rear, the original sarcophagus being removed and carried to the back of the chapel that other bodies might be placed near it.

Cubiculum in the Catacomb of St. Agnes. (With Seats Hewn out of the Rock.)

The number of these sepulchral chambers is almost beyond computation. Marchi reckons more than sixty in the eighth part of the catacomb of St. Agnes. In that of St. Callixtus they amount to some hundreds. They are equally frequent in the other cemeteries. Their form is very varied. In the catacomb of St. Callixtus, with very few exceptions, they are rectangular, and that appears to have been the earlier shape. But there are examples of many other forms, triangular, pentagonal, hexagonal, octagonal, circular, and semicircular. The roof is sometimes a barrel vault, sometimes a coved ceiling, nearly flat; in one instance, it expands into a lofty dome, lighted by a luminare. Both the roof, the vaults, and the recesses of the arcosolia are generally coated with stucco, and richly decorated with religious paintings. In the later restorations the walls are often veneered with plates of costly marble. See PLATONIA. In a very large number of examples the Good Shepherd occupies the centre of the ceiling, the surrounding lunettes containing Adam and Eve after the Fall, The History of Jonah, The Sacrifice of Abraham, Moses Striking the Rock, The Three Children in the Furnace, The Visit of the Wise Men to Christ, The Raising of Lazarus, The Healing of the Blind Man, The Paralytic Carrying his Bed, The Miracle of the Loaves, and other scenes from the limited cycle of Scriptural subjects to which early Christian art confined itself, treated with a wearisome uniformity; embellished with palm branches, vines laden with grapes, the dove, the peacock, and other familiar Christian symbols. The walls of the chamber were also similarly decorated. See FRESCOS. The vault is in some cases supported by columns, either cut out of the tufa, or formed of brick coated with stucco. Light and air were not unfrequently admitted by means of a shaft communicating with the surface of the ground, called luminare. A chamber so lighted was known as a cubiculum clarum. These cubicula were very frequently double, one on either side of the gallery, and, as we have just noticed, in some instances a luminare was sunk in the centre so as to give light to both. The cubicula, generally speaking, are of small dimensions, and are incapable of containing more than a very limited number of worshippers. But there are also found halls and chambers of much larger proportions, which have been considered by the chief Roman Catholic authorities on the subject to have been constructed for the purpose of religious assemblies. These are distinguished by Marchi, by an arbitrary nomenclature, into cryptæ, for the smaller, and ecclesiæ, for the larger, excavations. See CATACOMBS.

Cubitt, JAMES, an English Baptist minister, was born at Neateshead, Suffolk, in 1808. He graduated from Stepney College in 1884, and the same year became pastor of the Church at Ilford, Essex. In 1837 he removed to Stratford-on-Avon, in 1841 to Bourton-on-the-Water, remaining there seven years, and then was pastor at Thrapston, Northamptonshire, for twelve years. In 1861 he became one of the tutors in Mr. Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle, Southwark, but in 1863 was compelled to desist from all occupation, and died Aug. 5 of the same year. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1865, p. 121. (J. C. S.)

Cuboirne (Coubtran, or Cubran), an Irish saint, commemorated Nov. 10, is said to have died as abbot of Cillarhaidh (now Killeigh, in King's County), A.D. 762.

Cubrious. See MANES.

Cucojo, the head of a heretical Syrian sect of Valentinians in the latter part of the 2d century (Ephrem. Contra Hæreticos, xxii, 485 b, in Assemani, vol. ii).

Cucufas, an early martyr at Barcelona, celebrated July 25.

Cuculla was a hood worn by Benedictine monks and nuns, equivalent to the later cowl (q. v.).

Cuculus, an epithet of an unknown disciple of Alcuin.

Cucumellum, a flagon or bowl belonging to the altar in early Christian churches, which was used probably for containing the communion wine. See Bing-ham, Antiq. bk. viii, chap. vi, sect. xxi. Compare AMA.

Cudaman, an early Saxon abbot, attested a charter of Ethelheard, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 805.

Cudbert (Cudberct, or Cudbrictus). See CUTHBERT.

Cudberth (or Cubert), an early English abbot of the see of Canterbury, died A.D. 777.

Cudburg (or Cudbuch). See CUTHBURG.

Cudda, an early English abbot of Mercia, cir. A.D. 742.

Cuddy, JAMES BILLINGSLEY, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Aug. 16, 1836. He was converted at sixteen; studied one year at Manchester Academy, and two at Dickinson Seminary, Williamsport; received license to exhort in 1857; and in 1860 entered the East Baltimore Conference, wherein he served until his death, Aug. 2, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 32.

Cudsuida. See CUTSUIDA.

Cuduald, abbot of the monastery of Oundle (Undalun), in North Hants, A.D. 709 (Bede, Eccles. Hist. v, 19).

Cue— See QUE—.

Cueilly, OLIVIER DE, a French theologian, was born at Laval in 1665. He became a Dominican at the convent there, and afterwards went to Paris, where he taught several branches of theology. He died about 1620, leaving Interprétation sur les Premiers Chapitres du Prophète Ezéchiel (Paris, 1611):—Les Fléaux de Dieu (ibid. 1613). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cuenburh (Cenburg, Quenburgera, etc.), sister of Ina, king of Wessex, co-foundress of Wimburn Abbey with her sister, is perhaps also the same as the abbess Cuenburga, probably of Wimburn, A.D. cir. 718.

Cuernert, DIRK (or THEODORE VAN), a Dutch engraver, was born at Amsterdam in 1522, and lived chiefly at Haarlem, where he was more noted for religious controversy than for attainments in the art

He died in 1590. The following are his chief works: The Descent from the Cross; Joseph Explaining his Dream; Joseph Interpreting the Dreams of his Fellow-Prisoners; Job Reproached by his Wife; Balaam and his Ass.

Cueuret (or Curet), PIERRE, a French theologian, who lived about the middle of the 16th century, was canon of the Church of Mans, and chaplain of the duke of Mayenne, who intrusted him with important matters. He wrote, La Fleur de Prédication selon Saint Ephrem (without date), from the Latin of Ambrose the Camaldole. According to La Croix du Maine, we are indebted to Cueuret for the first edition of the Triomphant Mystère des Actes des Apôtres, of Arnoul and Simon Criban, published in 1537. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cueva, MARTIN DE LA, a Spanish grammarian of the order of Cordeliers, lived in the middle of the 16th century. He wrote De Corrupto Docendæ Grammaticæ Latine Genere (Anvers, 1550). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cufa, an abbot of the diocese of Winchester, who attested an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803.

Cuff, JOHN HARCOTTE, an English Congregational minister, was born near Chard, Somerset, in 1790. He was educated at the Western Academy, Axminster; in 1812 commenced his ministry at Wellington, Somerset, and continued it there until his death, November, 1846. See (Lond.) Evang. Magazine, August, 1847, p. 401.

Cuffee, PAUL, a native Indian preacher of the Shinnecock tribe of Indians on Long Island, was born in 1757, and was for thirteen years in the employ of the New York Missionary Society. He died March 7, 1812.

Cuganaeich. See CONGAN.

Cui— See QUI—.

Cuichelm, an early English prelate, was consecrated seventh bishop of Rochester by archbishop Theodore, but deserted the see (Bede, Hist. Eccles. iv, 12).

Cuirbin. See CERBAN.

Culan (Colan, or Daohualen), a doubtful Irish saint, given by Colgan (Acta Sanctorum) under Feb. 18.

Culbertson, JAMES, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Franklin County, Pa. He was educated at Canonsburg College, and installed at Zanesville, O., in 1812, where, after a long and useful service, he died suddenly, Feb. 23, 1847. (W. P. S.)

Culcheth, WILLIAM, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Daventry in 1810. He was converted early in life, admitted into the ministry in 1833, and died July 26, 1852. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1852.

Cull, HUGH, a Methodist Episcopal minister, and an eminent local preacher for nearly sixty years, died near Richmond, Ind., Aug. 30, 1862, in his one hundred and fifth year. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1863, p. 672.

Cullen Gavin, a Scotch clergyman, born in Lanarkshire, was licensed to preach in 1821; presented to the living at Balmacellan in 1825, and ordained; and died Jan. 18, 1844, aged fifty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 697.

Cullen John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Newark, Nottinghamshire, Oct. 25, 1786. He commenced his ministry in 1809, became a supernumerary in 1851, settled at Wellingborough, and died April 15, 1863. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1863, p. 20.

Cullen John Edward, an English Congregational minister, first cousin of cardinal Cullen, was born at Gort, in the west of Ireland, May 10, 1794. He was early designed by his parents for the priesthood, and educated for that purpose in Dublin, but his study of the Scriptures led him to renounce the Roman Catholic faith. He resolved to commence preaching at once at Omagh, in the north of Ireland, and at the same time was engaged as private tutor in the family of James Buchanan, Esq., father of president Buchanan of the United States. Persecution from the Catholics induced him to remove to London, where he maintained himself by teaching in schools and private families. About 1820 he was ordained, and preached successively at Caistor, in Lincolnshire; Flocton, in Yorkshire; Fairford, in Gloucestershire; Lacock, in Wiltshire; Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire; Burwell, in Cambridgeshire; and, lastly, at Fordham, until 1856, where he died, Dec. 30, 1878. He published The Voice of Truth. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 318.

Cullen Paul, an eminent Roman Catholic prelate, was born April 27, 1803, at Prospect, in Ireland. He studied at the college in Carlow; went in 1820 to Rome, where he completed his education. In 1828 he received the degree of doctor of theology; was rector of the Irish college at Rome, and in 1849 was appointed archbishop of Armagh. In 1851 he was transferred to Dublin, where he opened, in 1854, the Catholic high-school, whose first rector was John Newman. In 1869 he was made cardinal. He died Oct. 24, 1878. His Pastoral Letters and other Writings of Cardinal Cullen (edit. Moran) were published in 1883. See Brady, The Episcopal Succession in England, Scotland, and Ireland, i, 345; Bellesheim, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cullingsford John, an English Wesleyan preacher, entered the ministry in 1825, and was sent as a missionary to the West Indies. Being seized with illness in 1845, he left Trinidad for Barbadoes, and died there, March 4, 1846, in the forty-sixth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Cullum Sir John, an English clergyman and an accomplished antiquary, was born in 1733, and educated at St. Catharine Hall, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1758. In April, 1762, he was presented to the rectory of Hawstead, in Suffolk; and in December, 1774, instituted to the vicarage of Great Thurlow. He died Oct. 9, 1785. His History of the Parish of Hawstead and Hardwick House was originally published as the twenty-third number of the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Culmer Richard, an English clergyman of Kent, is represented by Wood (Fasti Oxonienses) as "an ignorant person, and with his ignorance one of the most daring schismatics in all that country." He published, Cathedral News from Canterbury (1644) — Minister's Hue and Cry (1651) — Lawless Tithe Robbers Discovered (1655). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Culshaw Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born of Roman Catholic parents at Ormskirck, Sept. 25, 1856. In 1877 he entered the Richmond Theological School; early in 1879 began circuit-work at the diamond fields, South Africa; and the year following removed to Kronstadt, in Orange Free State. He was drowned Feb. 8, 1880. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 60.

Culter was a knife used by the ancient pagans in slaughtering victims at the altars of the gods. It usually had one edge, a sharp point, and a curved back.

Cultrarius (Lat. culter, a knife) was the person who killed the victims which were sacrificed to the gods by the heathens of ancient times. The presiding priest never performed this service himself, but appointed one of his attendants to the office of cultrarius for each occasion.

Culver Aaron L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dubb's Ferry, N. Y., Feb. 19, 1841. He was converted at twelve; after studying at Claverack in 1859 or 1860, labored for four years as a local preacher, and then in the New York Conference, till his death in 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 43.

Culver, Cyrus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Chester, Mass., in 1780. He was converted in early life; labored several years as a local preacher; in 1811 entered the New York Conference; in 1827 became a supernumerary, in 1830 a superannuate, and died March 11, 1846. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 29.

Culver, Newell, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Pomfret, Vt., July 13, 1811. He joined the Church in January, 1833, and in July of the same year was received on trial into the New Hampshire Conference. He continued in the active work, except for three years (1849-52), until 1871, when his health failed. He died Sept. 22, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 84.

Culverwell, Ezekiel, an English Puritan divine, published a Treatise on Faith (Lond. 1629):—A Blessed Estate (1633):—Meditations (1634). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cuman was an abbot of Glastonbury, England, A.D. 800-802.

Cumanus (or Conanus) was second abbot of Abingdon, died A.D. 784.

Cumberland, Dextison, an Irish prelate, became bishop of Clonfert in 1763, and was translated to Kilmore in 1772. He published some single Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cumbertus (or Tumbertus), was abbot of Glastonbury, England, A.D. 744-768.

Cumin (Cumian, Cumeanus, Cumeneus, or Cummeln), was the name of about a score of Irish saints, of whom but few are clearly identifiable.

1. Son of Dubh, and abbot of Drumdruth, commemorated Jan. 12.

2. Bishop of Bobbio, commemorated Aug. 19, died after seventeen years of piety, at the age of ninety-five, about A.D. 744.

3. A poet of Connor, about the middle of the 7th century.

4. Otherwise called Cadhan, commemorated June 1, seems to have been the son of Cronchu, son of Ronan, of the race of Corbmac Cas, and to have lived about A.D. 738.

5. Surnamed Fin, "the Fair," commemorated Feb. 24, is thought to be the same as the son of Erman, of the district of Tyronnell, who retired to the monastery of Hy. He probably became abbot A.D. 657, and died in 699. He is famous as the earliest biographer of St. Columba.

6. Surnamed Fodu, "the Tall," of Cluainferta-Brennainn (now Clonfert), commemorated Nov. 12, was the son of Fiachna, of the royal line of West Munster. He was born about A.D. 590, and his original name was Aedh. He seems to have been a man of great learning, and wrote a hymn in praise of the apostles and evangelists (edited by Todd, Book of Hymns, i, 81). He died A.D. 662.

Cumin, John. See COMIN.

Cumin, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, was born in 1660; called to the living at Riccarton in 1694; ordained in 1695, and died April 8, 1739. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 136.

Cumine, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, was teacher at the grammar-school in Irvine in 1696; called to the living at Largs in 1701, and died July 4, 1762, aged eighty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 253.

Cumine, John, a Scotch clergyman, son of the foregoing, was licensed to preach in 1739; called, in 1742, to be assistant to his father at Largs, and died Jan. 31, 1748. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 253.

Cumine, William, a Scotch clergyman, originally schoolmaster of Fraserburgh, was licensed to preach in 1754; presented to the living at Tyrie in 1761; ordained in 1762; transferred to Ruthen in 1772, and died Feb. 8, 1800, in his eightieth year. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 639, 643.

Cuming (or Cumming) is the family name of many Scotch clergymen. For others of later date see CUMMING.

1. ALEXANDER (1), was licensed to preach in 1672; called to the living at Dallas the same year, and died May 24, 1681. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 179.

2. ALEXANDER (2), was licensed to preach, and presented to the living at Moy-and-Dalarossie in 1680, and ordained. Though a Jacobite, he continued after the Revolution in 1688, and died April 27, 1709. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 268.

3. ALEXANDER (3), was bursar to the presbytery in 1684 and 1685; minister at Liberton in 1689; deprived the same year for not praying for the king and queen, and died at Edinburgh, April 26, 1713, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 115.

4. DAVID, born at Relugas, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1667; succeeded his brother as schoolmaster at Turrif, and then in the living at Edenkeillie in 1672, and was ordained; received into communion in 1694; was one of the ministers appointed in 1699 to visit the Highland parishes of Moray, and died at the end of the same year, aged about fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 183.

5. GEORGE (1), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1619; was appointed to the living at Dallas in 1624, and ordained; in 1631 was charged before the presbytery with making railing verses, found among the people, which he denied on oath; was the only minister in the presbytery who refused to subscribe the Covenant in 1638; officiated as synod clerk in 1643; was a member of the Commissions of Assembly in 1644 and 1645; and subscribed the marquis of Huntly's bond in 1646. He died before May 3, 1648, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 179.

6. GEORGE (2), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1647; became schoolmaster at Elgin, where he was obtruded on the grammar-school by the magistrates, in 1649, without the consent of the presbytery; was licensed to preach in 1655; called to the living at Urray in 1658, and died in 1705, aged about seventy-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 305.

7. GEORGE (3), born at Elgin, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1667; was licensed to preach in 1674; presented to the living at Easil in 1676, and ordained. He died Sept. 20, 1723, aged about seventy-six years. His two sons, Archibald and George, both settled as clergymen in England. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 170.

8. JOHN (1), born at Relugas, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1661; became schoolmaster at Turrif; was presented to the living at Edenkeillie in 1688, and ordained; transferred to Auldearn in 1672; resigned in 1682, and settled at Cullen. He died at Edenkeillie, Feb. 9, 1689, aged forty-eight years. His son John was the first regius professor of divinity and church history in the Edinburgh University. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 183, 246, 673.

9. JOHN (2), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1663; was licensed to preach in 1668; called to the living at Birnie in 1670, and ordained; instituted in 1671; deprived in 1690 for nonconformity; went to Ireland, where he is said to have joined the Romish Church. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 159.

10. JOHN (3), was called to the living at Sandsting-and-Aithsting in 1701; ordained in 1702; falling under censure, was removed by the synod in 1704. He died May 21, 1731. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 428.

11. JOHN (4), son of the minister at Edenkeillie, studied theology at Glasgow University; was called to the living at Eyemouth in 1708, and ordained; transferred to Humber in 1715, and died Feb. 26, 1754, aged seventy-four years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 338, 437.

12. JOHN (5), D.D., was born in 1685, in Ireland; educated in a Scotch university; removed to England, and was chosen pastor at Cambridge. In 1714 the court designed the overthrow of dissent by act of parliament, and Mr. Cuming resisted that act by publishing The Corruptions and Defections of the Present Times as to Matters of Religion. In 1715 he wrote and published Remarks on Dr. Bentley's Sermon on Popery. In 1716 he took charge of the Scotch Church at Founder's Hall, Lothbury, London. In 1717 he preached a Sermon to Controvert One on the Kingdom of Christ, published by bishop Hoadley. He took an active part in the Salter's Hall Synod in 1719, in defense of the Trinity, and was one of the signers. He preached and published a sermon on the subject, which, in 1722, he defended by a bulky volume On the Authority of Scripture Consequences in Matters of Faith. In 1724 he published the Funeral Sermon of Benjamin Robinson. He died Sept. 7, 1729. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 487.

13. MICHAEL, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1659; became a chaplain; was licensed to preach in 1663; appointed to the living at Drainy in 1666; declined to take the test in 1681, but was returned to his ministry in 1683, and died in March, 1695. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 161.

14. PATRICK (1), was presented by the king to the parsonage of Dallas and vicarage of Alderney in 1576, which he resigned before February, 1586; was transferred to Urquhart in 1578, his former parishes being conjoined. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 173, 178.

15. PATRICK (2), born at Relugas, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1670; became minister to a Presbyterian congregation in Dublin; was called to the living at Ormiston in 1689; ordained in 1690, reserving the liberty to return to Ireland. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1690, and was appointed with principal Dunlop, in 1694, to get the royal sanction to hold the General Assembly, which had been interrupted. He had the care of all the churches, was a constant friend to all young ministers and scholars, and a most instructive and cheerful companion. He died March 10, 1731, aged eighty-one years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 302.

16. PATRICK (3), D.D., son of the minister of Relugas, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1716; became chaplain to lord justice Clerk (Grange); was licensed to preach in 1720; appointed to the living at Kirkmahoe the same year, and ordained; transferred to Lochmaben in 1725, and to the Collegiate Church, second charge, Edinburgh, in 1732; elected moderator of the General Assembly several times, and died April 1, 1754, aged eighty years. He was distinguished for erudition, liberal sentiments, and extensive benevolence. His talents as a speaker gave him great influence, and, patronized by the Argyll family, then holding in their hands the government of Scotland, he acquired the chief management of the affairs of the Church in Scotland from the year 1751. His sons, Robert and Patrick, were professors in the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 15, 568, 642.

17. PATRICK (4), D.D., was born in 1695; in 1737 became professor of church history in the University of Edinburgh, and was also one of the ministers of the city, having been ordained when but seventeen years old. He resigned his professorship in 1762, in favor of his son. Soon after his removal to Edinburgh he became the leader of the Church party known as the Moderates. He was several times moderator of the assembly, and died April 1, 1776, at Rybrees, in the parish of Edenkellie. Dr. Cuming was a man of extensive historical and critical knowledge; and as a preacher, equalled by few, having an easy, fluent, neat, and elegant style. See Annals of the Church of Scotland (1739-1766), i, 319.

18. ROBERT, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1680; was licensed to preach, and admitted to the living at Urquhart-and-Glenmorriston in 1686, and ordained. He died before April 8, 1730, aged about seventy years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 120.

19. WILLIAM (1), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1622; was licensed to preach, but not settled; complained of to the synod in 1624 for marrying irregularly at Inverness, but continued in the ministry. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 344.

20. WILLIAM (2), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1661; was appointed to the living at Dores in 1663, and ordained; removed in 1664; called to Halkirk in 1677, and continued in 1688. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 262, 362.

21. WILLIAM (3), brother of the minister at Riccarton, was licensed to preach in 1693; called to the living at Caterline in 1708, ordained in 1709, and died in 1717. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 877.

Cumings, ABIAH PRESTON, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Dover, N. Y., July 4, 1803. He graduated from Union College in 1832; studied theology for two years in Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Oct. 21, 1835; was editor of the New York Observer from 1836 to 1871, and died at Nice, France, May 13, 1871. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 88.

Cumma was abbot of Abingdon, England, about A.D. 725-737.

Cumman is the name of two early Irish virgins and saints:

1. Commemorated July 6, seems to have been twin-sister of Ethne and daughter of Cormac, of the royal race of Ireland, and flourished about A.D. 560.

2. Commemorated May 29, apparently of the Ards (County Down), and of the royal race of Erin, before A.D. 800.

Cumman (often confounded with St. Cumin [q. v.]), an early Irish ecclesiast of unknown parentage, was probably educated in St. Columba's monastery at Durrow, and had his church at Kilcomin (King's County). He is known for his zeal in the Paschal controversy, and a letter of his is extant on the subject, written A.D. 634 (given in Usher, Works, iv, 430). He is also thought to be the author of an abridgment of the penitential Psalms (in Fleming, Collect. Sacra, p. 197).

Cumming, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1828; presented to the living at Dunbarrie in 1833; ordained in 1834; joined the Free Secession in 1848, and became minister at Gorbals Free East Church in 1853. His publications were, a Lecture, a Sermon, and An Account of the Parish. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 634.

Cumming, Andrew, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hawkins County, Tenn., Nov. 18, 1817. He was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1833, and three years later removed with his father's family to Illinois. There he was licensed to preach in 1843, joined the Illinois Conference, and was transferred immediately to the Arkansas Conference. At the division of the Church the following year he became a member of the southern branch. He was a member successively of the Indian Mission, the East Texas, and the North Texas conferences. He became superannuated in 1864, and died at Turner's Point, Texas, Oct. 6, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 145.

Cumming, David B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Mercersburg, Pa., June 3, 1796. He was converted in 1818, licensed to preach in 1819, and entered the Tennessee Conference in 1821. In 1823 he was ordained deacon, and transferred to Holston Conference in 1824. In its bounds he travelled until 1834, excepting three years that he was a supernumerary, being agent for the American Bible Society. From 1834 to 1838 he had charge of the Indian Mission work of that conference. He was transferred in 1838 to the Arkansas Conference, within the bounds of which he served during the next six years. From 1845 until his death he was a member of the Indian Mission Conference. From 1872 to 1879 he was superannuated. He was the pioneer of Methodism among the Wyandottes, the Senecas, the Delawares, the Creeks, and Cherokees. He served three terms as presiding elder, and was a delegate to the General Conference of 1854. His death occurred in McDonald County, Mo., Aug. 25, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 151.

Cumming, Francis H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., Oct. 28, 1799. His literary and theological studies were pursued under Rev. Dr. Rudd of Elizabeth, N. J.; and he was ordained deacon in 1819, and priest in 1820. He remained a year in his first cure in Binghamton, N. Y.; was then called to St. Luke's, Rochester, officiating there during nine years; spent one year in Reading, Pa., and one in Le Roy, N. Y.; became secretary, agent, and editor of the Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, removing to New York meanwhile, and holding these offices for the space of four years. He was the first rector of Calvary Church, New York city; in 1839 entered upon the duties of rector of St. Andrew's, Ann Arbor, Mich., continuing there four years; became rector in 1843 of St. Mark's Church, Grand Rapids, which post he held until his death, Aug. 26, 1862. He was chaplain of the 3d regiment Michigan Infantry, and twenty-five years represented the diocese of Michigan in the General Convention. Possessed of great energy of character, and a mind well stored, he was by no means an ordinary man. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1863, p. 150.

Cumming, Hooper, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton College in 1805, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1810; was ordained in 1811; preached in the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J., from 1811 to 1814; at Schenectady, N. Y., from 1815 to 1817; in the Third Presbyterian Church, Albany, from 1817 to 1822; and in the Vandewater-street Church, New York city, in 1822 and 1823. He went to Charleston, S. C., in 1824, and died there, Dec. 18, 1825. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 17.

Cumming, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the Holston Conference, and died in 1868 or 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 264.

Cumming, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, a native of Kilmarnock, was licensed to preach in 1795; became assistant minister at Dundee, and afterwards librarian at Glasgow; was presented to the living at Fraserburgh in 1814, ordained in 1815, and died Jan. 25, 1867, aged eighty-four years. See Fests. Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 628.

Cumming, John (2), D.D., an eminent minister of the Scotch Church, was born in Aberdeenshire, Nov. 10, 1810. He went to London in 1833; became minister of the Church in Crown Court, and through life maintained his connection with the Established Kirk, having no sympathy with the cause which led Chalmers to forsake it. He died in London, July 6, 1881. Dr. Cumming was equally noted as an opponent of the Church of Rome and as a believer in the speedy advent of Christ. He was a clear thinker and an able preacher, possessing much learning and vivid imagination, which rendered him interesting to those even who did not accept his peculiar views. In 1872 he preached before the queen on "Communion between Heaven and Earth," and was personally thanked by her majesty for his effort, with which she professed herself greatly pleased. His church was not large enough to hold the vast crowds which attended his ministry. The writings of Dr. Cumming were very numerous, among which we notice, The Church of Scotland;—Apostolical Sketches;—Lectures on the Seven Churches;—Lecture on the Miracles;—Lecture on the Parables;—Lecture on Daniel;—The Finger of God;—Christ our Passover;—The Comforter;—A Message from God;—The Great Sacrifice;—Christ Receiving Sinners;—Is Christianity from God?;—Sabbath Morning Readings on Genesis;—On Exodus;—On Leviticus;—Benedictions;—Voices of the Night;—Of the Day;—Of the Dead;—God in History;—Infant Salvation;—Baptismal Font;—Lectures for the Times;—Christian Patriotism;—The Communion Table;—Almost Protestant;—The Church Before the Flood;—Liberty;—Equality;—Fraternity;—The Revolutionists;—The True Charter;—The True Succession;—Exposition of Psalm xci;—Occasional Discourses;—Thanksgiving, an Exposition of Psalm civ;—Our Father;—a Week's Family Prayers;—An Edition of the Pulpit Psalm-book, Church of Scotland;—An Edition of Fox's Book of Martyrs;—An Edition of Albert Barnes's Notes;—Translation of Bonaventura's Psalter of the Blessed Virgin;—Discussion on Protestantism with Daniel French, Esq.;—The Tent and the Altar;—Daily Family Devotion, etc. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (W. P. S.)

Cumming, John A., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Buncombe County, N. C., Nov. 23, 1826. He embraced religion at an early age; and in 1849 was licensed to preach, and received into the Indian Mission Conference. He began his labors among the Indians on the Shawnee and Delaware Mission under great disadvantages. On the change of boundaries he became a member of the St. Louis Conference, in which he ended his days in 1859 or 1860. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 205.

Cumming (or Cuming), Moses, an Irish Presbyterian minister, was ordained over the First Dromore Church in 1784, and removed to Armagh in 1796, where he died in 1816. For many years he was clerk of the synod of Ulster. See Stuart, Armagh, p. 498; Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Cumming, Paxton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Rockingham County, Va., Feb. 12, 1808. He experienced religion at sixteen; and the same year was licensed to preach, and admitted into the Holston Conference. In 1828 he located, because of ill-health; subsequently removed to Illinois, and in 1837 entered the Illinois Conference. In 1838 he became superannuated, and died Aug. 21, 1839. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 53.

Cummings, Archibald, a minister of the Church of England, appeared before the vestry of Christ Church, Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 9, 1726, with an appointment to that church from the bishop of London, and was accordingly received as rector, a position which he held until his death, in April, 1741. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 88.

Cummings, Asa, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., Sept. 29, 1790. He graduated from Harvard College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; was ordained pastor at Yarmouth, Me., in 1821, where he remained until 1829, and then removed to Portland, as proprietor and editor of the Christian Mirror. Here, for thirty years, he labored most faithfully, and by his pen, through the columns of his paper, he was the instrument of largely increasing the efficiency of the Congregational churches of the state. He wrote the interesting and useful Memoirs of Edward Payson. His death occurred suddenly, on the steamer George Luc, on his way home from Aspinwall, June 5 or 6, 1856. See Boston Advertiser,

July 16, 1856; Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Cummings, Charles (1), a Presbyterian minister, was an Irishman by birth, and came to America in early manhood. It is believed that he obtained most of his education in this country. He was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery, April 18, 1767, as preacher at North Mountain, Va., where he remained for five years. He died March, 1812. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 285.

Cummings, Charles (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Seabrook, N. H., Sept. 23, 1777. He removed in early life to Dublin, where he was converted, and was baptized July 16, 1797. In 1805 he was licensed, and in 1810 was ordained at Sullivan, where he remained fifteen years, during a part of the time preaching in Keene, and also laboring as a missionary throughout the state. He was next pastor in Hillsborough, afterwards in Marlborough, and finally in Swansey. He died in Roxbury, Mass., Dec. 27, 1849. (J. C. S.)

Cummings, Cyrus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bridgewater, N. H., April 23, 1791. He experienced religion in 1809, received license to exhort in 1810, and in 1811 entered the New England Conference. In 1816 he located at North Yarmouth, Me.; in 1818 removed to West Cumberland; in 1848, to Portland; in 1852 was admitted into the Maine Conference as a superannuate, laboring as chaplain to the poor, until his death in 1859 or 1860. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 114.

Cummings, Henry, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Tyngsborough, Mass., Sept. 25, 1737. He graduated at Harvard College in 1760, and began the study of theology; in 1762 preached as a candidate at Billerica, and in November accepted a call from the Church to become their pastor. He resigned his charge in 1814, and died Sept. 5, 1823. Dr. Cummings was appointed delegate to the convention which framed the Constitution of Massachusetts. In 1795 he preached the annual sermon before the convention of ministers in Massachusetts, and the same year delivered the Dudley lecture in Harvard College. He published a great number of Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 55.

Cummings, Jacob, a Congregational minister, was born at Warren, Mass., Dec. 5, 1792. He studied at Phillips Academy; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1815; taught at the Hampton, N. H., Academy; was ordained in 1824 at Stratham, and remained there for eleven years. His other pastorates were Sharon, Mass., in 1835; Southborough, in 1838; Hillsborough Bridge, N. H., in 1843; and Exeter, where he died, June 20, 1866. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 40.

Cummings, Jeremiah W., D.D., a Roman Catholic divine, was born in Washington, D. C., April 5, 1824. His father was a lieutenant in the United States navy, and died when on a cruise in the Mediterranean sea when Jeremiah was young. His mother became a Catholic, and sent her son to a seminary established at Nyack-on-the-Hudson by bishop Dubois, whence he went to the Propaganda College, Rome, where he received the highest honors. In 1847 he returned to America, and was for a time stationed at the old St. Patrick's Cathedral, Mott Street, New York city. Thence he went to a temporary church at Madison Avenue and Twentieth Street, and finally built St. Stephen's Church, Twenty-eighth Street, of which he remained pastor until his death, Jan. 4, 1866. Dr. Cummings was well known as an effective preacher, a popular lecturer, a graceful poet, and an elegant writer. He was the author of Italian Legends:—Spiritual Progress:—Hymns and Songs for Catholic Schools:—The Silver Stole. He wrote and corrected many articles on Catholic subjects for the first edition of Appleton's Cyclopaedia. He was a genial gentleman, and of great popularity among all classes. See (N. Y.) Cath. Annual, 1881, p. 54.

Cummings, Preston, a Congregational minister, was born in Seekonk, Mass., May 1, 1800. He spent his early life in Attleborough, where he fitted for college, and graduated from Brown University in 1822. He studied theology with Dr. Calvin Park; was ordained at Lebanon, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1825; dismissed in February, 1827; was pastor in Dighton, Mass., from Dec. 26 following until Oct. 5, 1835; of the North Church, Wrentham, from July 6, 1836, to Jan. 1, 1838; and at Buckland from 1840 to 1848. He resided in Leicester from 1851 to 1871, and thereafter in Holden, where he died April 8, 1875. Mr. Cummings compiled a valuable Dictionary of Congregational Usages and Principles. See Hist. of Meriden Association, p. 183. (J. C. S.)

Cummings, Seneca, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Antrim, N. H., May 16, 1817. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1844, began his theological studies at Lane Seminary the same year, and completed them at Union Seminary in 1847; was ordained a Congregational minister, Sept. 30, the same year; became a missionary to Foo-Chow, China, in 1848; returned to the United States in 1856, and died at New Ipswich, N. H., Aug. 12 of that year. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 45.

Cummings, Stedman, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Washington, Vt., Nov. 10, 1806. He was converted when fourteen years of age, ordained in 1825, and labored as an evangelist in Vermont and Canada. In 1854 he went West, and about 1870 removed to Kansas, where he preached occasionally. He died at Kirwin, Kansas, Oct. 19, 1883. See Morning Star, May 14, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Cummins, Alexander, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Albemarle County, Va., Sept. 3, 1787. He embraced religion in his twentieth year, and in 1809 entered the Western Conference. With the exception of one year's intermission as supernumerary he labored zealously until early in 1823, when he became superannuated. He died Sept. 27 of that year. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1825, p. 474; Meth. Mag. vii, 225.

Cummins, Asa, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Thompson, Windham Co., Conn., Sept. 1, 1762. He was converted in his twenty-fifth year, licensed to preach in 1797, and in 1802 entered the itinerant ranks, and began travelling the Albany and Saratoga circuits. His latter years were in connection with the Oneida Conference, as a superannuate. He died Sept. 5, 1836. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1836, p. 411.

Cummins, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Strasburg, Pa., July 15, 1776, of Scotch-Irish Presbyterian parents. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1799, was licensed to preach by the New Castle Presbytery in 1801, and in 1804 was ordained pastor of the churches of Chestnut Level and Little Britain. In 1808 he accepted a call from a church in Florida, Orange Co., N. Y., where he remained until his death, Jan. 9, 1863. (W. P. S.)

Cummins, Charles P., M.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Franklin County, Pa., in 1803. He graduated from Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and practiced medicine in his native county until 1836; was licensed by the Carlisle Presbytery the same year, and installed pastor of Dickinson Church, where he remained until 1843. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Clarion, Clarion Co., from 1847 to 1862, and died March 22, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 100.

Cummins, Francis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Shippensburg, Pa., in 1752, of parents who had been Presbyterians in Ireland. He graduated from the college called "Queen's Museum," in North Carolina, in 1776, and engaged for several years afterwards in teaching; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, in Mecklenburg County, Dec. 15, 1780, and in 1782 accepted a call from Bethel Church, in York District, S. C. He was never long stationary in any one field. He labored about one year in North Carolina, twenty-four years in South Carolina, and twenty-five years in Georgia. He died Feb. 22, 1832. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 418.

Cummins, Frederick P., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, entered the ministry in 1871, doing service as a missionary, in connection with which he was rector of St. John's Church, Crawfordsville, Ind. The following year he was rector, not only of St. John's, but also of St. Philip's Church in Covington, which two parishes he served until his death, Jan. 17, 1874. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Cummins, George David, D.D., senior bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church, has already been noticed under that denomination in Vol. VIII. We here add that he was born near Smyrna, Del., Dec. 11, 1822, graduated from Dickinson College in 1841, was a preacher in the Methodist Church for two years; joined the Protestant Episcopal ministry, and was ordained presbyter in 1847. For six years he was rector of Christ Church, at Norfolk, Va., and afterwards of St. James's Church, at Richmond; Trinity Church, Washington, D. C.; and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, Md. In 1866 Mr. Cummins was elected assistant bishop of the diocese of Kentucky. Seven years thereafter bishop Cummins withdrew on account of the Romanizing tendencies of the Episcopal Church, and founded the Reformed Episcopal Church, of which he was made the first bishop, in December, 1873. He died suddenly, June 26, 1876, at his residence in Lutherville, Baltimore Co., Md. Bishop Cummins was emphatically a Low-Churchman, of broad and evangelical views, of dignified and commanding presence, a ready and clear thinker, and a free pulpit orator and platform speaker. See Memoir, by his wife (N. Y. 1878).

Cummins, John, an English Congregational minister, was born in Manchester, April 11, 1804. He was converted in youth, and in due time, after a preparation for village preaching, being recommended to the London Missionary Society, was sent to Madagascar as an artisan missionary. Soon after his arrival Mr. Cummins was compelled to leave, in consequence of the death of king Radama, and the accession of queen Ranaivalona to the throne. Returning to England, he settled at Smallbridge, and afterwards successively at Blackpool, Holbeck, Kirkheaton, and Stubbin-Elsecar, where he labored fourteen years, and then retired to Sheffield, where he died, May 29, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 321.

Cummins, V. C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Harrison County, Ky., in May, 1848. He joined the Church in 1863, was educated at the Kentucky Wesleyan University, and in 1872 connected himself with the Kentucky Conference, in which he labored until his death, July 20, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 223.

Cumner, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Massachusetts, about 1789. He was licensed to preach in 1826, and in 1833 entered the Maine Conference, in connection with which he labored, with the exception of a three years' location, until his death, Feb. 5, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 109.

Cundiff, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was converted in 1824, licensed to exhort in 1825, in 1826 to preach, and was admitted into the Kentucky Conference. In 1830 he removed to Illinois, and in 1837 joined the Illinois Conference. He died in 1839 or 1840, aged about thirty-five. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 54.

Cundinamarca was the goddess of love of the Mexicans, in whose temple religious and secular assemblies were held.

Cunego, Aloysio, an Italian engraver, the elder son and scholar of Domenico, was born at Verona in 1767, and resided principally at Leghorn, where he executed two works, St. Margaret and Mary Magdalene.

Cunego, Domenico, an Italian engraver, was born at Verona in 1727. He went to England and engraved the following plates: Three Subjects of the Creation, from the Sistine Chapel; The Birth of St. John Baptist; The Prodigal Son; St. Cecilia Receiving the Palm of Martyrdom. He died at Rome in 1794. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cunegonda (or Kinge), Saint, daughter of Bela IV, king of Hungary, and granddaughter of Theodore Lascaris I, emperor of Constantinople, married Boleslas, called the Chaste, king of Lesser Poland, but lived, like her husband, in a state of complete continence, devoting herself to the sick in the hospitals. After her husband's death, in 1279, she retired to a monastery at Saudecz, and died there, July 24, 1292. She was canonized by Alexander VIII in 1690. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cungar, an early English anchorite, is said to have been the son of a prince at Constantinople, and went to Britain about A.D. 71, establishing a monastery in Congressbury (named from him), on the Yeo, and afterwards one in the north of Wales.

Cungi (Congi, or Cugni), three painters, brothers—GIOVANNI BATTISTA, LEONARDO, and FRANCESCO—were natives of Borgo San Sepolcro, where they flourished in the middle of the 16th century. They were chiefly employed in the churches and convents in their own country, especially in the Church of San Rocco and the convent of the Osservanti at San Sepolcro.

Cunha, Don Rodrigo da, a Portuguese prelate and writer, was born at Lisbon in 1577. He first studied with the Jesuits, then went to Coimbra; after being admitted to the Royal College of St. Paul, took orders, and familiarized himself especially with canonical jurisprudence. He was promoted in 1615 to the bishopric of Portalegre, and some years later to that of Oporto. In 1626 he occupied the archiepiscopal see of Braga. He also became primate of an important part of the peninsula, and occupied the archbishopric of Lisbon from 1635, where he gave further proof of his patriotism and love of independence when the revolution of 1640 placed the duke of Braganza upon the throne. In the absence of the new sovereign, he was chosen by the people governor of the kingdom. He died at Lisbon Jan. 3, 1643. We are indebted to this prelate for an Ecclesiastical History of Oporto, Braga, and Lisbon, in which he was aided by Poutaleo de Ciabra (Oporto, 1623, 1742). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cunha (or Cugna), Theodosius da, an Augustinian and professor at Coimbra, who died April 26, 1742, is the author of, Proemialia Theologia Universalis; —Tractatus de Incarnatione, de Advocacione, de Resurrectione. See Keller, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cunibert. See CYNBERT.

Cunibert (Hunibert, or Chunebert), bishop of COLOGNE in the 7th century, was born in the bishopric of Trier. He was made bishop in 623, and died in 663. He took an active part in the religious and political affairs of his time. Under Sigebert III and Childeric II he exercised a great influence. See Gallia

He died July 11, 1839. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 58.

Cunningham, Timothy, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in March, 1756. He served in the Revolutionary war; was converted in 1790, and commenced preaching soon after. He was ordained Jan. 25, 1804, by the Edgecomb Quarterly Meeting, Me., and, after a ministry of great usefulness, died, Jan. 16, 1836. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1837, p. 67. (J. C. S.)

Cunningham, T. M., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was called to succeed Dr. Duncan, in the Church which bore the latter's name in Baltimore, Md., but declined, and was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church in St. Louis, Mo. After some years he removed as pastor to Indianapolis, and thence to the Alexander Church, Philadelphia. For the benefit of his health he went to San Francisco, Cal., and became pastor of the Central Church. He identified himself with the Presbyterian Theological Seminary there, and crossed the Continent several times in its behalf. He died at Oakland, Cal., Feb. 22, 1880. He was a preacher of distinguished ability, and his sermons were eloquent and powerful. See (San Francisco) Occident, March, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Cunningham, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Blairsville, Pa., June 14, 1827. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1852; spent three years teaching at Harrodsburg, Ky.; studied one year at the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and graduated from Princeton Seminary in 1858. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Blairsville, June 17, 1857. In June, 1858, he went as supply to Blairsville; served as chaplain to a regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers one year; after which he devoted himself to study and occasional preaching until 1863, when he went West. He served as stated supply Prospect Church, in the Presbytery of Peoria, and then the Church of Princeville, until 1865, teaching at the same time. Returning to Pennsylvania, he became pastor of Fairfield and Union churches, in the Presbytery of Blairsville. He died April 21, 1879. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880, p. 44.

Cunningham, William Madison, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Jonesborough, Tenn., June 28, 1812. He was a student of Washington College; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1833; was ordained by the Lexington Presbytery, June 26, 1835; served as pastor at Lexington, Va., until 1840; stated supply at Chattanooga, Tenn., for a short time; pastor at La Grange, Ga., from 1841 until his death, March 3, 1870. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 75.

Cunningham, W. I. W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Indiana about 1830. He was converted in early life; educated in part in Asbury (now De Pauw) University; engaged in teaching for a time, and began preaching in 1858. After supplying a circuit in the North-west Wisconsin Conference, he was received into the travelling ranks, where he continued for six years, then took a supernumerary relation, and the next year was transferred to the Minnesota Conference, in which he labored until compelled to take a supernumerary relation. He died April 3, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 318.

Cunyngham. See CUNNINGHAM, CUNNINGHAM.

Cuonburg, an English abbess in Mercia, A.D. 811.

Cup of Blessing, a cup which was blessed among the Jews in ceremonial entertainments, or on solemn occasions. Paul employs the expression (1 Cor. x, 16) to describe the wine used in the Lord's supper.

CUP, EUCHARISTIC. See CHALICE.

CUP of SALVATION, an offering, probably a libation of wine poured on the victim sacrificed on thanksgiving occasions, which the Jews of Egypt offered in their festivals for deliverance (2 Macc. vi, 27).

Cupé, Pierre, a French theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 18th century, was rector of Bois, in the diocese of Saintes, and wrote Le Ciel Ouvert à Tous les Hommes (1768), a work reputed to be profane. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cupella, in Christian archaeology, is a small sepulchral recess for children, in the catacombs. At present we have only one instance of its use, which is given by Marchi (Monumenti Primivi, p. 114). The inscription upon it records the burial of her two children, Secundina and Laurentius, by their mother Secunda. The solecisms in grammar and orthography of which it is full show that Secunda was a person of humble rank. The stone is preserved in the Museum Kircherianum.

Cupella is evidently the diminutive of cupa, explained to mean "urn," "sepulchral chest." This sense is a derivative one, from its classical meaning of a large cask, butt, or vat. It appears in pagan inscriptions but rarely. The use of the word survived until later times. The idea has been propounded that we may find in cupella, as a place of Christian burial, the etymology of the word capella, chapel, which has so long perplexed philologists, and of which no satisfactory derivation has ever yet been discovered. The architectural term cupola is another form of the same root.

Cupellomancy, divination by means of cups. The practice is very ancient. It was known in Egypt in the time of Joseph (Gen. xlv, 5), and is still practiced in England, among the ignorant, who profess to "read" in cups a sign of future events. See DIVINATION.

Cuper, Willem, a Flemish historian of the Jesuit order, was born at Antwerp in 1686, and died Feb. 2, 1741, leaving De Patriarchis Constantinopolitanis (Antwerp, 1738). Cuper aided in collecting the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, July and August. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cupido (Cupid), in Roman mythology, was the god of loving desire, a translation of the Greek Ἔρως. The name is more poetical than mythical, and usually he is identified with Amor (q. v.).

Cupola (Ital.), a concave ceiling, either hemispherical or of any other curve, covering a circular or polygonal area; also a roof, the exterior of which is of either of these forms, more usually called a dome, and in Latin tholus.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v.

Cupples is the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. GEORGE (1), son of the minister of Kirkoswald, was licensed to preach in 1752; appointed to the living at Swinton in 1754, and ordained. He died Sept. 14, 1798, aged seventy-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 447.

2. GEORGE (2), son of the minister of Swinton, was licensed to preach in 1807; became assistant at Dunbar; was presented to the living at Legerwood in 1811; ordained in 1812; elected presbytery clerk in 1825; transferred to the second charge, Stirling, in 1833; admitted in 1834; joined the Free Secession in 1843; and was admitted minister to the Free Church, Kilmadock, the same year. He died May 1, 1850, aged sixty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 529; ii, 682.

3. WILLIAM, took his degree at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in 1717; presented to the living at Kirkoswald in 1719; and was the first in Scotland who gave in a letter of acceptance with the presentation, according to the act of Assembly. He was ordained in 1720, and died March 17, 1751, aged about sixty-one years. He published The Experiences of John Stevenson, Land-laborer of Dailly (1729). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 121.

Cupra, in Roman mythology, was the name of Juno among the Etrurians. She had a temple at Firmum Picenum, in Asia.

Cura (care), in Roman mythology, was an allegoric deity of which a fable is told. In thought, she was sitting by the shore of the sea, and watching the waves. Unconsciously to herself, her fingers formed out of clay a form—and behold! it was man. She begged Jupiter to give him life, which he did, but required that the man should belong to him, to which Cura was opposed, as she had formed him, and, moreover, the earth, from which he had been taken, would not agree. Saturn, as judge, said: Jupiter shall receive the body after death. Cura shall have it during life, and his name shall be homo (man), because he was taken from humus (the earth).

Curaçao is an island of the Caribbean Sea, belonging to the Dutch. A large proportion of the population consists of free negroes, and for their benefit the Netherlands Bible Society published in 1846 the Gospel of Matthew, to which, since 1865, the Gospel of Mark has been added by the American Bible Society.

Curæ (cures), in Roman mythology, were revenging goddesses, who lived at the entrance to Tartarus.

Curate. We add an account of the history of this office from Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.:

"Until the 4th and 5th centuries in the East there were country curates, and Cyprinus mentions town clergy. In the large cities, from the 4th to the 5th century, in the East and at Rome, the churches had their own priests, who instructed the people, the communion being given only in the cathedral. In the beginning of the 4th century pope Marcellus established twenty-five titles for preparatory instruction before baptism and reconciliation of penitents. In the Greek Church cardinal priests discharged the same duty. In the beginning of the 6th century the bishop sent the eucharist for distribution to the parish priests: then by degrees the latter received power to reconcile penitents in case of necessity and heretics in danger of death, in the absence of the bishop; to visit the sick, to administer extreme unction, and to choose singers. In the 7th century the number of assistant clerks was augmented or diminished according to the condition of the Church revenues, as in the 6th century they had received authority to celebrate in their churches and oratories, chapels of ease required by the increase in the numbers of the faithful. The bishops gradually regarding them as fellow-workers, subordinated their assistants to them in all things touching divine worship and burial. It was not until the close of the 16th century, in England, that the word was restricted to assistant clergy, deputies, or substitutes. In France the latter are still called vicars. In England, in the Middle Ages, the distinction was drawn between temporary and perpetual curates."

Curcach (Corcair, or Quorrair) is the name of several Irish virgin saints, of whom only two are clearly traceable:

1. Commemorated March 8 or Aug. 8, is said to have been the sister of St. Finnian and daughter of Corpreus, of a princely family in Ulster, and to have lived in the middle of the 6th century.

2. Commemorated July 21 as the patron saint of Kilcorkey, in County Roscommon.

Curchus, a deity of the ancient inhabitants of Prussia, who was believed to preside over eating and drinking, on which account they offered to him their first-fruits, in his honor kept up a continual fire, and every year, breaking his old statue, erected a new one.

Carcenus. See CORCAN.

Curcodemus, an ancient deacon commemorated in Usani's Martyrology as a martyr at Auxerre on May 4.

Curdie, JAMES, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University. He was licensed to preach in 1821, ordained in 1825 as missionary at Tarnbert, presented to the living at Gigha and Cara in 1826, and admitted in 1827. He was there in 1860. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 41.

Cure by Faith. See FAITH-CURE.

Curētæ, in Greek mythology, were originally priests of the orgiastic Jupiter cultus on Crete. They were armed, and their worship consisted in weapon-dances. The latter was also the case with the Corybantes and with the Idaeus Dactyles; therefore these three classes were eventually confused. According to Strabo, those Curētæ who were among the oldest inhabitants of Æolia were different from the above.

Cureus, JOACHIM, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born at Freistadt, in Silesia, Oct. 22, 1532. He studied at Wittenberg, and in 1554 was rector in his native city. He then went to Padua and Bologna for the study of medicine, and after his return, in 1559, settled as physician at Glogau, where he took an active part in the introduction of the Reformation, but in the spirit of his friend Melancthon. He died at Glogau, Jan. 21, 1573. One year after his death his Exegesis Perspicua, etc., appeared, which caused the deposition and expulsion of all Philippistic theologians by August of Saxony, because he believed them to be the authors of the same. See Grusinger, Commentatio de Joach. Curuo (Marburg, 1853); Heppé, Geschichte des deutschen Protestantismus (ibid. ed.), ii, 422 sq., 467-494; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Curia, FRANCESCO, a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1538, and was a pupil of Gio. Filippo Crisculolo; afterwards visited Rome, where he studied the works of Raphael. On his return to Naples he painted for the churches there. His masterpiece was a grand picture of The Crucifixion, in the Chiesa della Pieta. He died in 1610.

Curial (or Curiel), JUAN ALFONSO, a Spanish Benedictine, was professor of theology at Salamanca, where he died, Sept. 28, 1609. After his death were published Lectura in D. Thomæ Aq. 1, 2 (Douay, 1618; Antwerp, 1621): — Controversia in Diversa Loca S. Scripturæ (Salamanca, 1611). See Le Mire, De Script.

Curig. See CYRICUS.

Curio was the president of a curia or ward in ancient Rome. His office was to officiate as priest. There were thirty curiones, and over these was a curio maximus or chief priest.

Curitan is the name of two early Irish saints:

1. Abbot and bishop of Rosmeinn, commemorated March 16, was one of those who assisted in releasing certain women of Erin from bondage.

2. Of Kilmore, commemorated Aug. 9.

Curnan, an early Irish saint, commemorated Jan. 6, was bishop of Kileonan, and was the son of Sinell, of the race of Coinan, in Ulster.

Curnock, NKHEMIAH, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bristol in 1810. He united with the Church at thirteen; began to preach at an early age; entered the ministry in 1834, and died July 26, 1869. He was known as "the children's preacher." He published a work entitled The Father of Methodism (Lond. 1847, 18mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 27; Stevenson, Wesleyan Hymn-book and its Associations (Lond. 1870), p. 315.

Curradi (or Currado), FRANCESCO, a Florentine historical and portrait painter, was born in 1570, and studied under Battista Naldini. His Magdalen, and The Martyrdom of St. Thecla, in the Florentine galleries, are considered his best. He died in 1661. See Hoefér, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Curran, RICHARD AUGUSTUS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mifflintown, Pa., July 15, 1808. He graduated from Washington College in 1834, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; became stated supply at Millville, N. J., and Gallipolis, O., in 1838; Cassville, Ga., in 1839. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Jersey the same year, and became stated supply at Cedarville, N. J., and pastor in 1842; at Shavers Creek Church, Pa., in 1849; Cottage Church in 1854, and dismissed in 1859, on being appointed professor of Pottstown Cottage Seminary. He afterwards became stated supply and teacher at Huntington, Ind.; pastor at Minerva, O., in 1872; at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1874, and dismissed in 1875. He died at Bourbon, Ind., March 26, 1883. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Alumni, 1884. (W. P. S.)

Currelly, CHARLES, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born at Devonport, Jan. 4, 1806. He was converted at fifteen; began to preach in 1827; was received by the conference in 1830; and retired to Bristol in 1862, where he died, Sept. 29, 1868. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 10.

Currie is the family name of numerous Scotch clergymen:

1. HENRY, a native of Kinross-shire, was licensed to preach in 1798; presented to the living at Carsphairn in 1802, and ordained; and died suddenly, Dec. 9, 1815, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 707.

2. JAMES (1), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1645; was called to the living at Shotts in 1649, and ordained; deprived by act of Parliament in 1662; cited before the privy council in 1669 for keeping conventicles, but escaped censure by not appearing; accepted indulgence in 1672, thereby offending his parishioners, who forsook the church; was again cited in 1677 and in 1684 for keeping conventicles; refused to read the proclamation of thanksgiving for the escape of the king from the Rye-house plot, and was imprisoned in 1685; was returned to his charge at Shotts in 1687, and died before Jan. 24, 1693. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 297, 298.

3. JAMES (2), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1695; was licensed to preach in 1697; called to the living at Hoddam in 1700, and ordained; and died Feb. 25, 1726, aged fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 621.

4. JAMES (3), son of the minister at Hoddam, received a bursary in Glasgow University in 1741; was presented to the living of Kirkpatrick-Fleming in 1745; ordained in 1746; transferred to Middlebie in 1768; and died Oct. 24, 1778, aged fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 622, 624.

He was educated at Transylvania University, Lexington; licensed by the New York Presbytery in 1822, and sent as a missionary to the northern part of Georgia, where his labors were abundantly blessed. About 1830 he was appointed general agent for the Home Missionary Society of northern Ohio. He died May 19, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 179.

Cursōrēs, ECCLESIAE, were messengers employed in the early Christian Church, in times of danger, to give private notice to each member of the time and place of holding meetings for worship. It was also the term used to denote messengers sent from one country to another upon the important affairs of the Church.

Cursuales Equi (post-horses), i. e. horses belonging to the "public course;" called also for shortness cursus, "course." The Roman posting or postal system—the distinction between the two belongs to a late stage of civilization—was established by Augustus. According to the Secret History of Procopius, the day's journey consisted of eight posts, sometimes fewer, but never less than five. Each stable had forty horses, and as many stablemen. Bingham gives a quite incorrect idea of the system in describing the cursuales equi as being simply impressed for the army and exchequer. The early Christian emperors made minute laws regulating these messengers, and some of them evince their regard for the life and comfort of the animals. The clergy were exempt from this service, and from the tax for it. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. a. v.

Cursus is the original name of the breviary (q. v.) in the Romish Church. The same term was used to denote the Gallican liturgy, which was used in the British churches for a long period, until the Roman liturgy came to be employed. See LITURGY.

Curtain (cortina, auleum, velum; βῆλον, παρὰ-πίρσασμα, καταπίρσασμα, ἀμφίθυρον). Curtains were used in ancient churches for the following purposes: (1) to hang over the outer doorway of the church; (2) to close the doorway between the nave of the church and the sanctuary, or perhaps rather to fill the open panels or cancelli of the door, during the time of the consecration of the eucharist; (3) to fill the space between the pillars of the ciborium, or canopy of the altar; (4) curtains were also used in baptisteries.

Curtchew (Cutohou, or Cowslan) is apparently an early Scottish name for ST. CONSTANTINE (q. v.).

Curtis, THOMAS, D.D., an English divine, one of the prebendaries of the cathedral at Canterbury in 1755, rector of Sevenoaks, in Kent, of St. Dionis Backchurch, London, and one of the proctors in convocation for the diocese of Rochester, died April 28, 1775. See Annual Register, 1775, p. 209.

Curtenius, ANTONIUS, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Holland in 1698, and came to America in 1730. He was pastor at Hackensack until 1737; at Hackensack and Schraalsenburgh until 1755; Brooklyn, Flatlands, Bushwick, Flatbush, New Utrecht, and Gravesend in 1756, when he died. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 226.

Curti, Francesco, a Bolognese engraver, was born in 1603, and studied under Cherubino Alberti. The following are his principal plates: The Virgin and St. Catherine; The Virgin Teaching the Infant Jesus to Read; The Marriage of St. Catherine; The Infant Christ Sleeping. He died about 1670. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Curti, Pietro, an Italian Hebraist of the Jesuit order, who was born in Rome in 1711, and died there April 4, 1762, was regarded as one of the best metaphysicians of his time. He taught Hebrew in the Roman College, and published several dissertations on difficult passages of Scripture, especially Christus Sacerdos (Rome, 1751):—Sol Stans (ibid. 1754):—Sol Retrogradus (ibid. 1756). See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Edmund Noyes became his colleague, Nov. 20, 1751. Mr. Cushing died Jan. 25, 1752, aged eighty years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 453.

Cushing, Christopher, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Scituate, Mass., May 3, 1820. In 1844 he graduated from Yale College; spent one year in Yale Divinity School, and in 1847 graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. In February, 1849, he was ordained pastor of the Edwards Church, Boston, and remained there until April, 1851; from September following until September, 1868, was pastor in North Brookfield; for ten years, from 1867, was secretary of the American Congregational Union; from January to July, 1879, treasurer of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society; from 1867 to 1875 one of the editors of the Congregational Quarterly, and was its sole editor and proprietor during the succeeding three years. In 1855 he became one of the overseers of the Charity Fund of Amherst College; from 1852 to 1863 he prepared and published the Annual Reports of the Brookfield Auxiliary Foreign Missionary Society. He also published many Sermons and Addresses. He died Oct. 23, 1881. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 26.

Cushing, Jacob, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Job Cushing, of Shrewsbury, Mass., graduated from Harvard College in 1748; was ordained pastor in Waltham, Nov. 22, 1752; and died Jan. 18, 1809, aged seventy-nine years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 514.

Cushing, James Royal, a Congregational minister, was born at Salisbury, N. H., Nov. 24, 1800. He studied at the Thetford (Vt.) Academy; graduated from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1828; the next year, Aug. 12, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Boxborough, Mass., where he remained until June 10, 1833; the next two years was city missionary in Boston; from June, 1835, until April, 1844, pastor in East Haverhill; from November following until May, 1854, pastor in Wells, Me. After this he was acting pastor in the following places: Taunton, Mass., until 1861; North Rochester till 1869; Cotuit Port the next year; Waquoit, 1871-74; subsequently resided without charge at East Haverhill until his death, June 11, 1881. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 27.

Cushing, Job, a Congregational minister, was born at Hingham, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1714; was ordained first pastor of the Church in Shrewsbury, Dec. 4, 1723; and died Aug. 6, 1780, aged sixty-seven years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 514.

Cushing, Jonathan, a Unitarian minister, was born at Hingham, Mass., in 1690. He graduated from Harvard College in 1712; was ordained at Dover, N. H., Sept. 18, 1717; and died March 25, 1769. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 74.

Cushing, Jonathan Peter, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rochester, N. H., March 12, 1793. He studied at Phillips Academy, Exeter; graduated from Dartmouth College in 1817; went to Virginia, and became connected with Hampden-Sidney College, first as a tutor, then as a professor, and after the death of Dr. Hodge, in 1820, as president, in which office he continued until the close of his life, April 25, 1835. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 524.

Cushing, Perez Lincoln, a Baptist minister, was born in Boston, Mass., March 6, 1822. He graduated from Brown University in 1849; spent one year at the Newton Theological Institution, and was ordained in 1852. For six years thereafter he was chaplain of the Reform School at Westborough; and subsequently, for twelve years, of the State Almshouse at Bridge-water. He was also a teacher at Middleborough for a time. He died at Santa Barbara, Cal., March, 14, 1875. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 89. (J. C. S.)

Cushing, Samuel A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Brattleborough, Vt., Jan. 24, 1812. In 1831 he entered the ministry, and the following year joined the Vermont and New Hampshire Conference, where he served eleven charges in New Hampshire. His health failing, he became superannuated, supplying, for a season, East Cambridge. Taking a transfer in 1844 to New England Conference, he filled four more pastorates; and from 1859 was again a superannuate.

During the Rebellion he entered the work of the Christian Commission, until himself prostrated by disease, which terminated his life at Waltham, Mass., March 10, 1881. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 88.

Cushman, Chester Lemuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Stafford, Conn., March 29, 1831. He graduated at Amherst College in 1856; was ordained pastor at Townshend, Vt., Dec. 22, 1859; dismissed Oct. 15, 1866; became pastor at Ludlow and Phillipston, Mass., and at Ludlow Mills; and died April 21, 1880. See Minutes of Gen. Convention of Vermont, 1881, p. 49.

Cushman, Elisha, a Baptist minister, son of Rev. Elisha Cushman, was born at Hartford, Conn., July 4, 1813. In March, 1836, he commenced, with Mr. Isaac N. Bolles, the publication of what was subsequently known as the Hartford Courier, a political newspaper. In March, 1838, he began a religious paper, the Christian Secretary, the organ of the Baptists in Connecticut, which had been discontinued for a short time. In the autumn of 1839 he became a Christian, and united with the First Baptist Church in Hartford. Soon after this he retired from the editorship of the political paper, of which he had had charge, and confined his attention to the Secretary. In April, 1840, he was licensed to preach, and was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church in Willington, Sept. 30 of the same year. He now gave up his editorial work, and devoted himself to his Church, of which he remained pastor for five years, when, in consequence of ill-health, he resigned. In a year or two his health was so far restored that he was able to resume his ministerial work, and in April, 1847, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Church at Deep River, where he continued for several years. He afterwards acted as pastor of the Church in West Hartford for some time, and returned, at length, to his former position as editor of the Christian Secretary, for a season, performing the duties of pastor of the Church at Bloomfield. His death occurred at Hartford, Jan. 4, 1876. See the Cushman Genealogy, p. 408; Turnbull, in the Christian Secretary, Jan. 12, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Cushman, Isaac Jackson, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ohio. He graduated from the Miami University, Oxford, O., in 1858, and entered the Theological Seminary at Xenia; was licensed to preach by the Chillicothe Presbytery in 1859, and in 1860 was ordained by the Cincinnati Presbytery pastor at Murlock, where he remained till his death, Aug. 26, 1881, at the age of forty-nine. (W. P. S.)

Cushman, Isaac Some, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Gloucester, Me., in 1823. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1844; subsequently from the Medical School of the same college; and for three years practiced medicine in Saco. In 1851 he entered Concord Biblical Institute, and in 1853 joined the New England Conference. During the civil war he was chaplain of the Thirty-third Massachusetts Regiment, and afterwards surgeon of the First Massachusetts Cavalry. In 1864 he re-entered the pastorate in the Maine Conference; and in 1867 was transferred to the New England Conference, in which he continued until his sudden death, Sept. 6, 1870. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 87.

Cushman, Job, a Congregational minister, was born at Kingston, Mass., Jan. 17, 1797. He studied at the Kingston Grammar School; graduated from Brown University in 1819; studied theology with Calvin Park, D.D., and was ordained in Springfield, N. H., July 6, 1825, where he remained pastor three years. During 1828 and 1829 he was acting pastor in Bristol; the next two years in Sullivan; 1832 in Westford, Conn.; from 1833 to 1835 in North Wrentham (now Norfolk), Mass.; until 1839 pastor in Prescott; from 1841 to 1843 acting pastor in Tolland; from 1852 to 1854, in Palmyra, Pewaukee, and Watertown, Wis.; from 1856 to 1859 in Truro and North Truro, Mass.; until 1861 in Marlborough, Vt.; 1862 in Plymouth, Mass. From 1863 to 1867 he resided in Plymouth without charge, and thereafter in Grinnell, Ia. He died Aug. 5, 1878. He published, Address on Washington's Birthday (1835);—The Law of God:—The Living and the Dead:—Revivals of Religion Desirable:—The Blessedness of Living in the Present Age:—A Complaint; Appeal to Churches of the Old Colony (1871). See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 40.

Cushman, Ralph, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1792. He graduated from Williams College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; was ordained Nov. 16, 1821; travelled as a home missionary in Kentucky from that time to 1824; and then settled at Pittsford, N. Y., until 1826, and at Manlius until 1830, when he acted for a year as an agent for the American Home Missionary Society; and removing to Ohio the same year, died at Wooster, Aug. 27, 1831. See Presbyterianism in Central N. Y. p. 504; Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 41.

Cushman, Richards, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1819. He graduated from Brown University in 1844, and studied one year thereafter in Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained in 1847 a missionary for the Foreign Evangelical Society to Hayti, where he remained until his death, June 7, 1849. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 175.

Cushman, Robert Woodward, D.D., a Baptist minister, son of Job Cushman, a lineal descendant of Robert Cushman, of the Pilgrim Fathers, was born at Woolwich, Me., April 10, 1800. For some time he was engaged in the watchmaking and jewelry business. Having become a Christian, and fitted for college, he entered Columbian College, Washington, D. C., and graduated in 1826. By his own efforts he paid his way while procuring an education, yet took a high rank as a scholar. He was ordained, August, 1826, pastor of the Baptist Church in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and a little more than a year afterwards removed to Philadelphia. In 1828 he established "a young ladies' institute" of a high order, still constantly employed as a preacher, and for a time was the editor of the Christian Gazette. In the various organizations for religious work, established by his denomination, he took an active interest. He was one of the early and warm friends of the American Baptist Publication Society. After nearly twelve years of labor in Philadelphia, he was called to the pastorate of the Bowdoin Square Church, in Boston, and was installed July 8, 1841. In the winter of 1847-48 he went to Washington, to take charge of the E Street Baptist Church in that city during the temporary absence of its pastor, Rev. G. W. Samson. He remained in Washington, and established a ladies' school, which he conducted for five years, and then returned to Boston, to become the principal of the "Mount Vernon Ladies' School." In 1863 he retired from active life on account of impaired health, and spent his closing years in Wakefield, Mass., where he died, April 7, 1868. (J. C. S.)

Cushman, Rufus Spaulding, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Fairhaven, Vt., Aug. 31, 1815. He studied at Castleton Seminary; graduated from Middlebury College in 1837; was a teacher in Pickens County, Ala., in 1838 and 1839, and in Lowndes County, Miss., in 1840. He became a member of Lane Theological Seminary in 1841, and graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1843; was ordained at Orwell, Vt., Dec. 21 of the same year; dismissed May 7, 1862; May 28 following was installed over the Church at Manchester, and died May 18, 1877. See Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 265.

Cushny, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1774; became schoolmaster of Foveran; was licensed to preach in 1782; presented to the living of Orne in 1786, and ordained; and died Feb. 1, 1839, aged eighty-five years.

Two of his sons were ministers—Dr. Alexander, at Rayne; Robert, at Bellie. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 597.

Cushny, Alexander (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, took his first degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1805; commenced teaching in his youth; was presented to the living at Strachan in 1814; ordained in 1815; transferred to Rayne in 1820; elected synod clerk in 1825; deposed in 1842 by the assembly, with others, for holding communion with the deposed ministers at Strathbogie, but the sentence was reversed in five months. His knowledge of business, intrepidity, and straightforward conduct were of great service in defeating the plans of the non-intrusion party in the synod. He had a son, John, minister of Speymouth. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 542, 600.

Cushny, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1826; was licensed to preach in 1831; presented to the living at Luch in 1836, and ordained assistant and successor; transferred to Bellie in 1843, and continued in 1860. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 582.

Cusighe, SIMONE DA, an old painter of the Venetian school, flourished at Cusighe, a place near the city of Belluno, from 1382 to 1409. There is a good altarpiece executed by him in his native place. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cusp (Lat. a spear-point), the projecting points forming the featherings or foliations in Gothic tracery, arches, panels, etc.; they came into use during the latter part of the Early English style, at which period they were sometimes worked with a small leaf, usually a trefoil, on the end. When first introduced, the cusps sprang from the flat under-surface or soffit of the arch, entirely independent of the mouldings, and this method was sometimes followed in Decorated work; but they very soon began to be formed from the inner moulding next the soffit (usually either a splay or a hollow), and this continued to be the general practice until the expiration of Gothic architecture. Some of the richest examples may be found in Lincoln Cathedral. See PANEL.

In the Decorated and Perpendicular styles they were frequently ornamented at the ends, either with heads, leaves, or flowers, and occasionally with animals.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v. See FOILS.

Custodes Archivorum (keepers of the records) were the same as the Ceimeliarchs (q. v.).

Custodes Ecclesiarum (keepers of the church) were, in ancient ecclesiastical use, either those otherwise called Osians, one of the inferior orders in the early Church, or, more probably, perhaps, the same officers who are sometimes distinguished as "elders of the Church," and whose duties corresponded in certain points with those of the modern CHURCHWARDEN (q. v.).

Custodes Locorum Sanctorum (keepers of the holy places of Palestine), so called because of their relation to our Lord's earthly history: e. g. Bethlehem, Mount Golgotha, the Holy Sepulchre, Mount Olivet. Such an office was probably occasioned by the custom which arose among Christians in early times of visiting these places for purposes of piety and devotion; and that the function of these "keepers" was accounted a religious service appears from their having been exempted, by a statute of Theodosius, in the same manner as ecclesiastics generally, from personal tribute, out of regard to this their special employment.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

Custos (warden) is specially the treasurer or chief sacristan in a foreign cathedral. See CUSTOS ARCÆ.

There were anciently also various others thus designated: the custos ordinis, one of the great monastic officers, the third and fourth priors, who acted as the rounds; the custos feretri, the shrine-keeper; the custos operis or fabrice, the canon in charge of repairs of the building, in secular cathedrals; the four custodes at Exeter, attendants in the sacristy, bell-ringers, and marshalsmen in processions; and the custos puerorum at Salisbury, a canon who had the supervision of the choristers.—Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v.

Custos Arcæ (keeper of the chest) was a name given to the archdeacon, as having charge of the treasury of the Church, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people. In this capacity Cæcilian was accused by the Donatists of having prohibited the deacons from carrying any provision to the martyrs in prison. The fourth Council of Carthage directs the bishop not to concern himself personally in the care and government of widows, orphans, and strangers, but to commit the duty to his archpresbyter or archdeacon.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

Cusworth, JOSEPH, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Rotherham, Yorkshire. He was converted in Sheffield in 1804; in 1807 was received into the ministry; from 1843 was governor of Kingswood School, and to him is due the erection of the noble building at Lansdown, Bath; and for twenty-seven years was one of the treasurers of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund. He died March 19, 1857, in the seventy-first year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Cuthbald was a monk and at length abbot of Medeshamstede (afterwards Peterborough) in 680, and a man of great piety and wisdom. See also CUDUALD.

Cuthberht was a presbyter of Lichfield, A. D. 803.

Cuthbert, archbishop of CANTERBURY, was born in Mercia, of noble parents, and was high in favor with the king. In 736 he was appointed to the see of Hereford, and in 741 was translated to the see of Canterbury, and proceeded to Rome soon after. He seems to have agreed with Boniface, that the centre of unity must be the see of Rome, and was ambitious of establishing this principle in the Church of England. He obtained the permission of the king to convene a synod, which in 747 met at Clovesho, and there he carried many of his points; but the proposal to bring the Anglican Church under subjugation to the see of Rome, although noticed, was very quietly evaded. We hear very little of the provincial labors of Cuthbert after this council. He died in 758. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 217 sq.

Cuthbert was also the name of two early English abbots:

1. Of Malmesbury, in the latter part of the 8th century.
2. Of Jarrow and Wearmouth, in the same century. He was a disciple of Bede, and several of his Letters are extant. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cuthbert, Hayhurst, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Yorkshire about 1632, and was among the first in that county who embraced the principles of the Quakers. Soon after reaching his majority he became an accredited minister. More than once during the next few years he was subjected to great hardship on account of his religious opinions, being several times thrown into prison. In 1682 he ac-accompanied William Penn to America, and is said to have been "an instrument, in the divine hand, of comfort and consolation to his brethren under their new circumstances." He died at his residence in Bucks County, Pa., in January, 1683. See Bowden, Hist. of the Friends in America, ii, 106. (J. C. S.)

Cuthbert, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1707; called to the living at Culross in 1708, and ordained. He died Oct. 1, 1715. He published, The Counter-Querries Querried (1712):—A Letter on the Danger of Considering the Influence of the Spirit as a Rule of Duty. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 586.

Cuthbert, James (2), a promising young missionary of the British Wesleyans, embarked for West Africa in November, 1864, and died at Lagos, on his way to Abeokuta, Feb. 22, 1865. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1865, p. 31.

Cuthbertson, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1817; became assistant to Rev. Dr. Somerville of Jedburgh; was presented by the king to the living of Edrom in 1823, and ordained. He died June 4, 1849, aged fifty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 436.

Cuthbertson, John, an Associate Reformed minister, was born in Scotland in 1720. He studied for the ministry under the Rev. John McMillan, the father and founder of the Reformed Presbytery of Scotland; emigrated to America in 1752, and for more than twenty years was the only Reformed Presbyterian minister in this country, having charge of the small Reformed Presbyterian societies scattered over the thirteen colonies. He entered cordially into the union in 1762, and, after this, his field of labor was restricted to his own immediate charge, Octorara, Pa., where he died, March 10, 1791. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, iv, 7.

Cuthbertson, Robert, LL.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at Paisley, Nov. 15, 1805. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and at the Divinity Hall of the United Secession Church; was licensed to preach in 1830, and ordained pastor of the Chalmers Street Church, Dunfermline, in 1833. He resigned in 1843; joined the Congregationalists in 1845, and became pastor at Cleckheaton in 1852; retired to Leeds in 1869, and continued to reside there until his death, Dec. 17, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 274.

Cuthburg (Cudburg, Cudburh, Cuthbritha, or Cuthburga), sister of Ina, king of Wessex, was the foundress and first abbess of Wimburn, cir. A.D. 705. She had been the wife of Alfred, king of Northumberland, and a nun at Barking. She is commemorated Aug. 31.

Cuthbyht. See CUTHBERT.

Cuthfrith was the twelfth bishop of Lichfield, about A.D. 765-769.

Cuthill, ALEXANDER, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1809; called to the second charge at Ayr in 1814, and ordained. He died Feb. 17, 1852, leaving, Public Sins Aggravated by the Enjoyment of Great Public Blessings (1843):—Discourses on Practical Religion (Ayr, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo):—An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 95.

Cuthman (Cutmen, or Cutmannus), Saint, commemorated Feb. 8, was an English monk at Stenninga or Steyning, in Essex, in the 9th or 10th century. The Bollandists relate many curious legends of him.

Cuthred is the name of several early English ecclesiastics:

1. An abbot, probably of Mercia, in the middle of the 8th century.
2. An abbot of Hereford, A.D. 803.
3. A presbyter, probably of Kent, A.D. 808. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cuthwin (Cuthuwinus) is the name (1) of the first bishop of Leicester, appointed in 679; also (2) of the eighth bishop of Dunwich, about the middle of the 8th century. See also CUTHBERT.

Cutler, Abel, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated from Williams College in 1807, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1810; was acting as home missionary in 1815, and may have been so previously; was ordained Oct. 24, 1816, as pastor at Yarmouth, remaining until 1833; was not afterwards settled, nor in regular service, and died at Northampton, Feb. 27, 1859. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 17.

Cutler, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Guildhall, Vt., in 1791. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1819; became pastor of the Church in Windham, N. H., April, 1828, and died in 1844. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 414.

Cutler, Elbridge Gerry, a Congregational minister, was born in Maine. He studied theology one year in Andover Theological Seminary as a member of the class of 1839; was a student in Harvard College; graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1839; was stated supply at Phippsburg, Me., in 1840 and 1841; was ordained Jan. 15, 1842; and was pastor at Belfast from that year until his death at Reading, Pa., April 28, 1846. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 140.

Cutler, Lyman, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1827. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1847, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1850; was installed Jan. 22, 1851, at Pepperell; and was pastor of Eliot Church, Newton, from 1854 until his death, April 28, 1855. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 183.

Cutler, Rufus Putnam, a Congregational minister, was born at Hamilton, Mass., July 11, 1815. He graduated from Yale College in 1840, and from the Divinity School of Harvard University in 1844; in 1846 became pastor of the Second Unitarian Congregational Society of Portland, Me.; in 1854, of the First Unitarian Church in San Francisco, Cal.; and in 1859 returned to New England. He preached for a few months at Staten Island; in 1869 took charge of a church in Charleston, S. C.; in October, 1872, sailed for Europe, and on his return voyage, in August, 1873, he was struck with partial paralysis. He died in Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 9, 1877. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1878.

Cutler, Stephen H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Montpelier, Vt., Nov. 1, 1802. He was converted at eighteen; in 1827 was licensed to preach, and admitted into the New Hampshire Conference, wherein he labored to the close of his life, May 22, 1834. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 288.

Cutsuida (or Cudsuida) was abbess of Worcester, probably at the end of the 7th century.

Cuttell, HENRY MARTYN, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was born at Sheffield, Yorkshire, April 27, 1839, where his father was a godly local preacher. He was converted under the ministry of the Rev. James Caughey, an American evangelist; for a short time was a local preacher; in 1861 began to travel as a minister in the Free Methodist Church; and died suddenly, Sept. 4, 1868. See Minutes of the Twelfth Annual Assembly.

Cutter, EDWARD FRANCIS, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Portland, Me., Jan. 20, 1810. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1828, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1831; was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Warren, Me., May 8, 1833; dismissed May 8, 1846; Sept. 23 of the latter year was installed pastor at Belfast, and resigned in October, 1855, but was not regularly dismissed until a year afterwards. During 1856 and 1857 he was editor of the Christian Era. The next two years he was acting pastor at Beardstown, Ill., and then, from 1859 to 1863, resided in Belfast, Me., without charge. At Rockland he was acting pastor from 1863 to 1871, and at Andover during 1873. Excepting one year in California, he resided, after this, without charge, in Belfast. At two periods he was recording secretary of the General Conference of Maine, viz. 1844-48 and 1851; from 1868 to 1880, secretary of the Maine Congregational Charitable Society; from 1842 to 1857, trustee of the Maine Missionary Society; from 1873, an overseer of Bowdoin College. His death occurred in Charleston, S. C., March 27, 1880. Mr. Cutter wrote largely for religious periodicals, and besides various sermons and essays, he published, Pastoral Conversations (1846):—Day of Judgment and Day of Salvation:—Household Instruction. See Cong. Year-Book, 1881, p. 20.

Cutting, Leonard, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Great Yarmouth, England, in 1724. When seventeen years of age he was admitted to Pembroke College, Cambridge University, and received his degree of A.B. in 1747. He came to Virginia, and became overseer of a plantation, and subsequently of a large farm in New Jersey. He was appointed tutor in the college at New York in 1756, and professor of the Greek and Latin languages and of moral philosophy. From November, 1757, to March, 1758, during the absence of president Johnson, Mr. Cutting had charge of the institution, and again in 1759. Having prepared for the ministry in the meantime, he resigned his professorship in October, 1763, and went to England for ordination. He was appointed missionary to Piscataqua (now Stelton) and New Brunswick, N. J., by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1766 he became rector of St. George's Church, Hempstead, L. I., conducting a classical school at the same time. His next pastorate was at Snow Hill, Md., in 1784, whence, in 1785, he removed to Christ Church, in Newbern, N. C., and thence, after eight years, to New York city. In September, 1792, he was a member of the General Convention, and was secretary of the House of Bishops. He died in New York, Jan. 25, 1794. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 223.

Cutting, Sewell Sylvester, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Windsor, Vt., Jan. 19, 1813. He united with the Church in 1827, and commenced the study of law at the age of sixteen, but subsequently decided to prepare for the ministry. He was fitted for college at South Reading, now Wakefield, Mass.; spent two years in Waterville College, now Colby University, and two years at the University of Vermont, where he graduated with the highest honors of his class in 1835. He was ordained March 31, 1836, as pastor of the Church in West Boylston, Mass., and not long after was called to the Church in Southbridge, where he remained from 1837 to 1845. He next took editorial charge of The Baptist Advocate, in New York city, afterwards called the New York Recorder. For a short time he was corresponding secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society, and for a year or two was engaged in editorial work in connection with the Watchman and Recorder of Boston and the Christian Review. In 1853 he once more became editor of the New York Recorder, which, as consolidated with the Baptist Register, became subsequently The Examiner. In 1855 he became professor of rhetoric and of history in the University of Rochester; in 1868, secretary of the American Baptist Educational Commission; in 1879, secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society. After serving one year, he went abroad, and did not enter again upon any public position. His death took place Feb. 7, 1882. Among the best known of the publications of Dr. Cutting are his Struggles and Triumphs of Religious Liberty, and his Historical Vindications of the Baptists (Bost. 1858). See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 305. (J.C.S.)

was born in 1784. He was converted at sixteen; pursued a course of theological study under Dr. Ryland, at the Bristol College, and was ordained in 1808 as pastor of the Church at Arnsby, Leicestershire. In 1818 he removed to Ridgmont, Bedfordshire, and died there, Dec. 16, 1829. See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, 1830, p. 409. (J. C. S.)

Cutulf was abbot of Evesham about A.D. 780.

Cutzupitæ (August. Ep. 53; De Unit. Eccl. 6) is probably a corruption for Cutupritæ, i. q. Cotopitæ or Gotipitæ, a name given to the heretics called CIRCUMCELLIONES (q. v.).

Cuvier, CHARLES CHRÉTIEN LÉOPOLD, a French Protestant theologian, was born Oct. 24, 1798. He studied at Montbéliard and Strasburg; in 1821 was appointed professor of history at the royal college of Strasburg, in 1824 professor of history at the university there, and occupied this latter position for nearly forty years. In 1859 he was elected dean of the faculty, but in 1860 resigned his professorship on account of broken health. On his retirement he was decorated with the cross of the legion of honor, and appointed honorary dean. The remainder of his life he spent in writing and improving the religious state of the Church. He died April 17, 1881, at Montbéliard. He published, Exposition de la Doctrine Évangélique (Paris and Strasburg, 1834):—Esquisse sur les Écrivains Sacrés des Hébreux (1843):—Le Petit Catéchisme de Luther (1846):—Précis de l'Histoire des Missions Chrétiennes (eod.):—La Venue du Sauveur (eod.):—Les Souffrances et le Triomphe du Sauveur (eod.):—Conseils et Consolations de l'Expérience; Cours d'Études Historiques (1860-80). He also edited Recueil de Psaumes et Cantiques, and a new edition of La Liturgie de la Confession d'Augsburg. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i. 254; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Cuyck, HENRY VAN, a Dutch theologian and scholar, was born in 1546 at Kuilenburg. For fourteen years he taught philosophy at Louvain. After having been vicar-general of the archbishop of Malines, he became bishop of Ruremond in 1596, and won the reputation of being a prelate both pious and instructive. He died Oct. 7, 1609. His principal works are, Orationes Panegyricæ (Antwerp, 1575):—an edition of the works of Cassianus (ibid. 1578):—Speculum Concubinariorum Sacerdotum, Monachorum, Clericorum (Cologne, 1599; Louvain, 1601):—Epistola Paræneticæ. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cuykendall, E. NELSON, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1826. He was converted in 1842; licensed to preach in 1847; in 1848 entered the Oneida Conference; in 1857 became superannuated, and died Sept. 4 the same year. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 89; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Cwenburh. See CUENBURH.

Cwiffen, a Welsh saint of the 7th century, commemorated June 3, was founder of Llangwycfen, in Denbighshire, and patron of Tudweilig, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 304).

Cybar (or Cibar; Lat. Eparchius), a French anchorite, at first entered the monastery of Sedaciæ, in Perigord, but afterwards secluded himself in a cell near Angoulême, where he was patronized by Aptoniæ II, the bishop of Angoulême, who ordained him priest. As he became popular, disciples flocked to him for instruction, and a monastery sprung up. He died July 1, 581, having occupied his cell for thirty-nine years. He is commemorated July 1. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cybi [pronounced Kubby] (Lat. Chebius, or Kebius), a Welsh saint, was a younger cousin of St. David. He was present at the synod of Brefi, and his memory, near Llanddewi Brefi, the place where it was held, is preserved in the name of the Church of Llangybi. The churches of Llangybi, near Caerleon, and Llangybi, in Carnarvonshire, were founded by him. He is especially distinguished as founder of a society at Caergybi or Holyhead, in Anglesey. As presiding over this he was styled, according to the practice of the time, a bishop, though he never had authority over a diocese. The day of commemoration is variously given as Nov. 6 and Nov. 8.

Cyclus ANN. See CALENDAR.

Cyclus PASCHALIS. See EASTER.

Cyfeilach, bishop of Glamorgan, was killed A.D. 756.

Cyfw (or Cwynllyw), a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Llangyfw, near Caerleon (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 233).

Cyhelyn was ninth metropolitan of Caerleon, according to the Iolo MSS. of E. Williams (Stubbs, Regist., p. 154).

Cyllinnus, a Gallic bishop, is addressed in conjunction with bishop Proculus by Augustine "and the other fathers of Africa." The letter begs them to receive back Leporius, who had been banished for Pelagian opinions, but had not changed his mind. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cyma (Gr.), an undulated moulding, of which there are two kinds: cyma recta, which is hollow in the upper part, and round in the lower; and cyma reversa, called also the ogee, which is hollow in the lower part and round in the upper. The term cyma, without an adjective, is always considered to mean a cyma recta. It is usually the upper member of Grecian and Roman entablatures, excepting in the Tuscan and Doric orders, Cyma Reversa, or Ogee. Temple of Antoninus and Faustina, Rome.

Cyma Recta. Theatre of Marcellus, Rome.

and in classical architecture is very rarely used in any but a horizontal position, except over pediments. In the Norman style this moulding is not very often met with, but in Gothic architecture it is frequent, especially in doorways, windows, archways, etc., but the proportions are generally very different from those given to it by the ancients, and it is called an ogee. An example of a quirked cyma is given under Ogee.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v. See COLUMN.

Cymatium. This is not easy to define, but it may be called a capping moulding to certain parts and subdivisions of the orders in classic architecture: the projecting mouldings on the upper part of the architrave (except in the Doric order, where it is denominated tenia), the corresponding moulding over the frieze, and the small moulding between the corona and cyma of the cornice, are each called by this name; the small moulding, also, which runs round the upper part of the modillions of a cornice, is their cymatium; and the upper moulding of the abacus of the Roman Doric capital is likewise so called; the upper mouldings which serve as a cornice to pedestals have occasionally the same name.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v.

Cymatius was bishop of Gabala, or perhaps Paltus, in Syria Prima, A.D. 341–362. It is supposed that he is one of the bishops who assisted Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, in his sudden consecration of Paulinus, presbyter of Antioch, chief of the Eustathian party. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cymbalum. This word is occasionally used for a bell, or some other sonorous instrument used instead of a bell. Thus Gregory the Great (Dialogue, i, 9) speaks of a cymbalum; and Durandus (Rationale, i, 4, § 2) of monks being called to the refectory by the sound of a cymbalum which hung in the cloister. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v. See CYMBAL.

Cyn- See CUN-; KIN-; KYN-

Cynan was sixth metropolitan of Caerleon, according to Iolo MSS. of E. Williams (Stubbs, Regist. p. 154).

Cynbryd, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of Llanddulas, in Denbighshire, was slain by the Saxons at Bwlch Cynbryd. He is commemorated March 19 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 144).

Cynddilig, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, is commemorated on Nov. 1 in the parish of Llanrhystud, in Cardiganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 281).

Cyndeyrn, son of Arthog ab Ceredig, was a Welsh saint of the 6th century, and patron of Llangyndeyrn, formerly subject to Llandysfaelog, in Carmarthenshire. He is commemorated on July 25 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 211).

Cyne- See CYN-

Cyneberht (Cyniberct, Cuniberct, or Kinbert; Lat. Chumbrechus) is the name of two early British bishops:

1. The fourth bishop of the Lindisfari, in the see of Sidaucerst. His exact date is not known, but is between 706 and 733. It was from him that Bede received his information on the ecclesiastical history of Lindsey.

2. The twelfth bishop of Winchester, was present at the legatine synod of 787. Between 799 and 801 he went to Rome with the archbishop, and as his successor appears in 803. He probably remained or died abroad.

Cyneburgh (or Cyneburga). See CYNIBURGA.

Cynedrid (Cynedryd, Cynedrytha, or Cynedrittha). See CYNETHRITH.

Cynegius was prefect of the Prætorians at Rome, A.D. 384–390. In A.D. 384 the emperor Theodosius sent him a rescript at the request of Marcellinus and Faustinus, two presbyters of the Luciferian faction, enjoining that the Luciferians should have the same religious liberty as the Catholics, and highly praising some of their representatives. The seventh and eighth letters of Gregory of Nyssa are addressed to this Cynegius, in behalf of Synesius and Alexander, two accused persons.

Cynegyalus. See CENGILLE.

Cyneheard (or Kinehard) was the eighth bishop of Winchester, in the ancient lists. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle he was appointed in 754, and his name is found appended to charters from 755 to 766. His death was probably prior to 788, the date given by some MSS. of Florence. Two letters of Cyneheard to Sullus are preserved among the letters of Boniface (Mon. Moguntina, ed. Jaffé, No. 110, 121).

Cyneheardus was a presbyter who attested a donation by Dunnuald to the church of St. Peter and St. Paul (afterwards St. Augustine, at Canterbury).

Cyneswitha (Cynesuith, Cynesuith, Kynesuith, Kynesuith, Kyneswith, or Kineswitha), an English saint, was a daughter of Penda, king of Mercia, and his queen Cynwise or Cyneswith. Her sister Cyniburga and three of their five brothers, Etheled, Merewald, and Mercelinus, were also reckoned saints. She had been betrothed to Offa, king of the East Angles, but gave him up to become a nun in her sister's convent, "Kineburgae Castrum" or "Castre." Both the sisters were present at the hallowing of Medeshamstede (afterwards called Peterborough), in the reign of their brother Wulfhere, and their names are attached to his charters. They were both buried in their own convent, and in the 11th century their remains were removed to Peterborough.

Cynethrith was an English abbess of some religious house belonging to bishop Wilfrid. In A.D. 709 she received the silk robe on which his dead body had been laid, and through which a miracle is said to have been wrought.

Cyneualc (or Cynehualc). See COINWALCH.

Cyneulfus. See CYNEWULF.

Cyneulf (Cynewulf, Cynwulf, Cymwlf, Chenewlf, or Kimwulf; Lat. Cyneulfus, Cyneulfus, Conuulfus, Cunulfus, Conuulfus, Cineulfus, or Kineulfus) was consecrated bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 740. In 750 he fell under the displeasure of Eadberht, king of Northumbria, for giving shelter to prince Offa, who had taken sanctuary at Lindisfarne. The monastery was besieged, and Cyneulf imprisoned at Bamborough, the charge of his diocese having been delegated to Friothbert, bishop of Hexham. He was released, and in A.D. 780, worn out with years and labor, made Higbald his deputy in the bishopric, with the assent of the congregation. He spent the remainder of his days in retirement, and died 783.

Cynfab, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Capel Cynfab, formerly in the parish of Llanfair ar y Bryn, in Carmarthenshire. He is commemorated on Nov. 15 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307).

Cynfarch Oer, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was a chieftain in North Britain. He is the reputed founder of Llangynfarch, in Maelor, Flintshire, a church destroyed by the Saxons in the battle of Bangor, A.D. 643 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 168).

Cynfarwy, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llechgyfarwy Church, in Anglesey. He is commemorated Nov. 7 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307).

Cynfelyn ab Bleiddyd, a Welsh saint of Bangor Deniol, in the 6th century, was founder of Llangynfelyn, in Cardiganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 260).

Cynfran, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was founder of Llysfaen, in Rhos, Denbighshire, and patron of the well there named Ffynnon Cynfran (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 144).

Cynfyw (or Cynyw), a Welsh saint of the 6th century, is reputed founder of the church of Llangynyw, in Montgomeryshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 233).

Cyngar (or Cungar) is the name of a number of early Welsh saints, whom it is difficult to identify. An account of them is given in Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 183, 211, 232.

Cyngen, son of Cadell and prince of Powys, in the 5th century, was reckoned among the Welsh saints for the patronage he afforded them, and for his liberal endowments to the Church. A church at Shrewsbury was dedicated to him.

Cynhafal, a Welsh saint of the 7th century, founded Llangynhafal, in Denbighshire. He is commemorated Oct. 5 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 295).

Cynhaiarn, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Ynys Cynhaiarn, a chapel under Crucaith, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 275).

Cynibaldus, an English abbot, attested two charters of Cuthred, king of Wessex, A.D. 749. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cyniberct (Cyneberht, or Kinbert; Lat. Cunberthus). See also CYNEBERHT.

1. Abbot of Hrentford or Redbridge. He baptized, A.D. 686, the two sons of Arvald, king of the Isle of Wight, before they were put to death by Caedwalla (Bede, H. E. iv, 16).

2. A deacon of Cuthbert. He was archbishop of Canterbury, and is mentioned in a letter from Boniface to his master (Boniface, Epp. ed. Giles, i 139).

Cynibill, brother of bishops Cedda and Ceadda, and of the presbyter Caelin, was a presbyter to Cedda. Bede gives his participation in the consecration of a site for the monastery of Lastingham (H. E. iii, 1).

Cyniburga (Kineburga, or Kinneburga), a Welsh saint, born in the latter part of the 7th century, was a daughter of Penda, the pagan king of Mercia, and sister of Cyneswitha (q. v.). She married Alfrid, king of Northumbria, but left him "pro amore Dei," and entered the monastery which her brothers Wulfhere and Etheled, kings of Mercia, constructed, and which was called after her "Kineburgae Castrum" or "Castre." The two sisters were both present at the consecration of Medeshamstede, in the reign of their brother Wulfhere, and signed the charter; and it is said that in the 11th century Aelfsi, abbot of this monastery (then called Peterborough), removed their bodies from Castre, where they died, to Peterborough. The account of these sisters resembles that of Cuenburga and Cuthburga, sisters of Ina, king of Wessex. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v. See CUENBURGA.

Cynidr, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was the possible founder of Llangynidr and Aberyscir, two churches in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 148, 149).

Cynifrid (or Cynifrith), abbot of Gilling, County of York, in Gaetlingum, was brother of Ceolfred, abbot of Jarrow and Wearmouth. He died in the pestilence of A.D. 664.

Cynimund (or Cynemund) was a monk of Lindisfarne, and afterwards of Jarrow, in the time of Bede, who describes him as "fidelissimus mihi nostrae ecclesiae presbyter."

Cynin, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was founder of Llangynin, near St. Clears, in Carmarthenshire, and said to have been a bishop (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 144, 145).

Cynllo, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was founder or patron of three churches in north Radnorshire, Nantmel, Llangynllo, and Llanbister (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 12, 133).

Cynmur, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was one of the companions of St. Teilo after his return from Armorica (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 253).

Cynog (or Cynawg), son of Brychan, was a Welsh saint in the 5th century, of eminent sanctity. He was patron of several churches in Brecknockshire, among which are Desynog, Merthyr Cynog, and Llangynog (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 138, 139).

Cynog (Cynoc, Cinauc, Cinnauc, Kenauc, or Kinochus) was bishop of Llanbadarn, and after-dria, which prohibited the reading of the works of Origen. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.

Cyr. See CYRICUS.

Cyra. See CIAR.

Cyriāca was a martyr, A.D. 282, and is commemorated July 7.

Cyriacus, the name of a number of saints, martyrs, and others. See also CHRYSE; CYRICUS.

1. A martyr who, with his brother Theodulus, was put to death in the time of Hadrian. They are commemorated May 2.

2. A deacon of Rome. He is said to have suffered martyrdom there early in the 4th century, under Maximin. His commemoration is given variously March 16, Aug. 8, and July 15; the first, probably, being the festival of his martyrdom, the second, of the removal of his bones by pope Marcellus, the last, of a church dedicated to his name.

3. A disciple of Marcellus of Ancyra.

4. A saint, commemorated in the menology of Basil as a man of Jerusalem, martyred with his mother by Julian the Apostate, his right hand being first cut off because his writings had made so many converts.

5. Bishop of Adana, in Cilicia. He was present at the Council of Constantinople in 381, and, by the permission of Diodorus of Tarsus, his metropolitan, remained behind on its separation to instruct Nectarius, who had been unexpectedly raised from the rank of a layman to the archiepiscopal see of Constantinople. He was one of the three bishops commissioned by the council to convey their synodal letter to Damasus and the other bishops of the West.

6. See CYRICUS 1.

7. A presbyter of Antioch, addressed along with Catus and Valerius and Diophantes by Chrysostom (Ep. 22, 62, 66, 107, 130, 222), and alone by his exiled fellow-presbyter Constantius in a letter wrongly ascribed to Chrysostom (Ep. 241).

8. A deacon who, together with Paul, accompanied the deputation of bishops who conveyed to Rome Chrysostom's letter to Innocent, in 404 (Pallad. p. 11). He was unable to join his namesake, bishop Cyriacus, and his companions, in Rome in 405, his health not permitting him to take a long voyage (Ep. 148).

9. A bishop, apparently resident at Constantinople. He was a friend and correspondent of Chrysostom. From a letter to Olympias (Ep. ad Olymp. 12) it is evident that he had sufficient influence to change the place of Chrysostom's exile. Two letters of Chrysostom to Cyriacus are extant.

10. A bishop of Synnada, in Phrygia, friend and fellow-sufferer of Chrysostom, who, together with Eulysius, bishop of Apamea, embarked with him when expelled from Constantinople, in June, 404, and accompanied him on the first stages of his journey. The whole party was arrested at Nicæa on suspicion of complicity in the conflagration at Constantinople, and thrown into chains. After a few days, Cyriacus and Eulysius were separated from Chrysostom and brought back and imprisoned at Chalcedon (Pallad. p. 38; Sozom. viii, 22). While they were in prison Chrysostom wrote them a consolatory and encouraging letter (Chrysost. Ep. 147). Being acquitted of the charge, Cyriacus was sent back to Constantinople, but was driven from the city by the law enforcing communion with Arsacius, Theophilus, and Porphyry. He fled to Rome, where he arrived towards the beginning of 405. He laid the statement of his own and Chrysostom's troubles before Innocent, his oral account being confirmed by the letters brought a few days afterwards by Eulysius (Pallad. p. 11). He accompanied the unfortunate western deputation to Constantinople in 406, and shared in the ill-treatment to which they were subjected (Chrysost. Ep. 156; Pallad. p. 13). He and his eastern colleagues were seized and put on board a vessel, and it was reported that they had been drowned. But they were purpos-ly reserved by their enemies for insult and ill-usage. They were conveyed to places of exile in the most remote and desolate parts of the empire. Cyriacus was imprisoned in the Persian fortress of Palmyra, eighty miles beyond Emesa.

11. Bishop (Quiragos or Shakag) of Daik, in Persarmenia, about A.D. 390-411 (Faustus Byzantinus, vi, 11, in Langlois, Coll. Hist. Arm. i, 309).

12. A sub-deacon of the Church of Macedonia, A.D. 414.

13. A bishop in Thessaly in the time of pope Boniface I. In a letter to Rufus, bishop of Thessalonica, Boniface tells him that he has separated from his communion Cyriacus, among other bishops, unless they obtain pardon through Rufus.

14. Bishop of Lodi (A.D. 451, 452). Bearer of the synodal letter of the Council of Milan in A.D. 451 to pope Leo the Great.

15. One of the two deacons appointed to summon the bishops to the sessions of the Council of Chalcedon.

16. Bishop of Tyana. He supported the demand of Julian and Severus for the condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, and the Tome of Leo, but in 518 turned completely round and signed the "relatio" to John, the patriarch of Constantinople, drawn up at the synod that met in that city, which asked for the restoration of the names of Leo of Rome, and Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople to the diptychs, and the condemnation of Severus and the other impugnors of the decrees of Chalcedon. In the Latin acts he appears as "Dominicus" (Labbe, Concil. iv, 1586; v, 167; Le Quien, i, 400).

17. Abbot of St. Andrew's at Rome, employed by Gregory the Great about A.D. 593 in the conversion of the Barbaricini in Sardinia.

18. Martyr at Tomi, commemorated June 20.

19. The anchorite (A.D. 448-557), commemorated Sept. 29.

Cyriacus of CARTHAGE, who lived in the 11th century, in the time of Gregory VII, was one of the last Christian bishops of North Africa. He was highly esteemed by Gregory, who also recommended to him Sevandus, archbishop of Hippo Regius. See Jaffé, Regesta Pontif. ad ann. 1076, June; Gregorii VII, Registr. iii, 19 sq.; Wagenmann, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Cyricius (Quiricus, or Syricus) was bishop of Barcino (Barcelona) in Spain, about 662. He wrote two letters to Ildefonsus of Toledo, in the first of which he thanks him, in language almost blasphemous in the extravagance of its praise, for having sent him his work on the Virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In the second, he entreats him to devote his time to the elucidation of obscure passages of Holy Scripture.

Cyricus (Cyr, or Curig; Lat. Cericus or Quiricus), is also the name of three early Christian martyrs.

1. A martyr of Tarsus, in Cilicia, about 304. There is little doubt that this is the martyr Cyriacus, who, with his mother Julitta, suffered in the Diocletian persecution. St. Cyricus was venerated in the east of Scotland at an early period. He is to be distinguished from the Pictish king Cyric, Grig, or Gregorius, who had his chief residence at Dunottar, in the 9th century. He is commemorated June 16.

2. A martyr who suffered by drowning in the Hellespont, commemorated Jan. 3.

3. A martyr at Antioch, commemorated June 16.

Cyril (Lat. Cyrillus) is the name of several persons in the early Church, besides those mentioned in vol. ii:

1. A bishop of Antioch, who succeeded Timæus A.D. 283, and held the see to A.D. 304, when he was succeeded by Tyrannus. Eusebius speaks of him as his contemporary. During his episcopate Dorotheus attained celebrity as an expounder of Scripture (Euseb. II. E. lib. vii, c. 32; Chronicon ad ann. 4 Probi). According to an obscure tradition he suffered martyrdom at the commencement of Diocletian's persecution, and is commemorated in the Roman martyrology July 22.

2. An intruding bishop of Jerusalem who, followed by Baronius and Touttée, was thrust into the see of his great namesake during his deposition, in succession to Herennius. The two Cyrils are identified by some.

3. A presbyter or bishop of Palestine, to whom Jerome had delivered a written confession of his faith. Jerome refers to this when applied to for proof of his orthodoxy.

4. A martyr of Heliopolis, in Syria, a deacon who suffered for the faith in the time of Julian, having previously displayed great zeal in the destruction of idols, in the reign of Constantine. He is commemorated March 20.

5. A bishop in Armenia, reconciled by St. Basil to the Church at Satala in 372.

6. Deacon to St. Hilary of Arles, by whom he was wonderfully cured, after having had his foot bruised by the fall of a large stone.

7. Bishop of Adana, in Cilicia Prima. He was one of the Antiochene party at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. He signed the remonstrance against the opening of the council by Cyril of Alexandria, before the arrival of John of Antioch and his companions, as well as the sentence of deposition passed by them on Cyril and his adherents. He also took part in the synod of Tarsus, A.D. 434.

8. Bishop of Cœla, in Thrace, in the 5th century. In conjunction with Euprepus, bishop of Byza, he opposed at the Council of Ephesus (431) the custom of one bishop holding two or three sees, then prevalent in Europe. The council authorized the custom, but afterwards special bishops were given to several towns.

9. Fourteenth bishop of Treves. He rebuilt the cell of St. Eucharius, near Treves, which lay burned and deserted. There he placed the bodies of the first three bishops of Treves, and his own remains were deposited with them after his death, which occurred about 458. He is commemorated May 19.

10. Bishop of Gaza, one of the prelates who signed the synodal letter of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople, condemnatory of Severus of Antioch and his followers, A.D. 518.

11. Of Seythopolis (Bethshan), so called from his birthplace, a hagiologist, flourished cir. 555. His father, John, was famous for his religious life. Cyril commenced an ascetic career at the age of sixteen. On leaving his monastery to visit Jerusalem and the other holy places, his mother charged him to put himself under the instruction of John the Silentiary, by whom he was commended to the care of Leontius, the abbot of the monastery of St. Euthymius, who admitted him as a monk in 542. Thence Cyril passed to the Laura of St. Saba, where he commenced his sacred biographies with the lives of St. Euthymius and St. Saba, deriving his information from the elder monks who had seen and known those holy men. He also wrote the life of St. John the Silentiary, and other biographies, affording a valuable picture of the inner life of the Eastern Church in the 6th century. They have been unfortunately largely interpolated by Metaphrastes.

12. A bishop and martyr, apparently in Egypt, commemorated July 9.

13. A martyr at Philadelphia, in Asia Minor, commemorated Aug. 1.

Cyrilla was a martyr under Claudius, and daughter of Decius. She is commemorated Oct. 28.

Cyrltonas, a Syriac hymn-writer, lived about the end of the 4th century. His name, as well as his hymns, have only become known of late. A German translation of his hymns, with introduction and notes, was published by Bickell in 1872, at Kempten. See

Streber, in Wetzter u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cyrius (or Quirinus) is the name of several early ecclesiasts and martyrs. See CYRICUS.

1. Bishop of Chalcedon. He was an Egyptian by birth, and a relative of Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria. In 401 he accompanied Chrysostom as a friend in his visitation of Ephesus and the Asiatic churches; but for some unexplained reason he became from this time his most virulent enemy, accusing him of pride, tyranny, and heresy. He was prevented from taking part in the opening of the proceedings against that father, at Constantinople, in 403, by a bishop stepping upon his foot, producing a painful wound, which inflamed and gangrened, eventually producing his death. He was present, however, at the synod of the Oak, and never relaxed his persecution of Chrysostom, being one of the four bishops who, after his recall, took his condemnation on their own heads. His death, in 405, after twice resorting to amputation and enduring great suffering, was regarded by the friends of the persecuted father as a mark of the vengeance of Heaven.

2. A German Benedictine, also called Aribo. He became abbot of St. Dionysius, at Schlehdorf, and in 760 the fourth bishop of Freising, in Bavaria. He died in 783. Cyrius wrote the life of St. Corbinianus, the first bishop of Freising.

3. A martyr at Rome under Claudius. He is commemorated March 25.

4. A martyr at Rome under Diocletian, commemorated April 26.

5. A martyr at Milan under Nero, commemorated June 12.

Cyrlion (1), bishop of Doliche, one of the subscribers to the Semi-Arian Council of Seleucia. (2) Presbyter and martyr, commemorated Feb. 14.

Cyrrus is the name of several early bishops:

1. Of Bercea, succeeded Eustathius as bishop of that city in 325. He was persecuted, on account of his orthodoxy, by the Arian party, and deposed by Constantine.

2. Bishop of Tyre, was present at the Council of Ephesus in 431. He was a leading member of the party of John of Antioch and the Oriental bishops, against Cyril of Alexandria, and was chosen as one of the deputation to wait on Theodosius II to lay a complaint of the illegality of his proceedings, but being indisposed, Macarius of Laodicea took his place. He was deposed by Cyril in the name of the council.

3. Bishop of Aphrodisias, and metropolitan of Cairo. He was born of Christian parents, and was a monk when elevated to the bishopric. He was conspicuous at the Council of Ephesus, in 431, for his vacillation, signing one day the act for the deposition of Nestorius, and on the next an appeal to the emperors against the legality of the acts of the council. Although still greater weakness of character was shown when, at the "Robber's Synod" in 449, he signed the act of condemnation of Flavian and Eusebius, yet he stood so high that in 456 he was specially exempted from the operation of a general law by the emperor, on account of his great merits.

4. Bishop of Phasis, in Colchis, and afterwards patriarch of Alexandria, 630-641. Although the plans of Heraclius for the union of the monophysite party with the Church were at first unacceptable to him, he afterwards gave them his hearty support, and was rewarded by elevation to the patriarchate of Alexandria. He now succeeded in effecting a temporary union of the Egyptian monophysites, known as Theodosians, with the Catholic body. But the agreement being such that both parties claimed a victory, it could not be lasting. Although counselled by pope Honorius I to give less attention to theological refinements, and more to true godliness, Cyrus called a council at Alexandria, which adopted the Ektthesis published by Heraclius in 639. This met with no better success than the former agreement, and in the midst of these distractions the Saracens invaded Egypt under Amron, in June, 638. Heraclius appointed Cyrus præfect of Egypt, and gave him the conduct of the war. Cyrus prevailed on Amron to withdraw his forces by the promise of an annual tribute, and the hand of the emperor's daughter Eudocia. Indignant at these terms, Heraclius summoned the patriarch to Constantinople. His life would not have been spared but for the siege of Alexandria by Amron. He was sent back to negotiate, but arrived too late. The city fell after fourteen months' siege, Dec. 22, 640, and Cyrus died some time in 641.

5. Forty-third patriarch of Constantinople, 705-711. He was formerly a recluse at Amastria, and had predicted to Justinian II his restoration to the imperial dignity. He was deposed by the monothelite emperor Barlaam, on his accession to the throne in 711, and confined in the monastery of Chora, which he had founded.

6. A martyr in 292. He was a wonder-worker, but not mercenary. His death is commemorated Jan. 31, and his translation June 28.

Cyrus-Florus. See PAULUS SILENTIARIUS.

Cyzicus, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Cyzicenum), held A.D. 876, according to Manai, being the meeting of Semi-Arians mentioned by Basil in his letter to Patrophilus, and spoken of as a recent occurrence. "What else they did there I know not," says he; "but thus much I hear, that having been reticent of the term Homousium, they now give utterance to the term Homoiousion, and join Eunomius in publishing blasphemies against the Holy Ghost.

Cyzicus, THE MARTYRS OF, are commemorated April 29 (al. 28).

Czechowitzky, MARTIN, a Socinian teacher and preacher, who died at Lublin in 1608, is the author of Synopsis Justificationis Nostræ per Christum:—De Auctoritate Sacræ Scripturæ:—De Pædobaptistarum Origine:—Dialogi xiii de Variis Religionis Articulis. He also translated the New Test. into Polish, which he published, with notes. See Sandii Bibl. Antitrinit.; Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 184. (B. P.)

D.

Dabalba, an idol of the inhabitants of Panama. This goddess was of mortal extraction, and, having led a virtuous life on earth, was deified after death, and called by those idolaters the mother of God. They sacrificed slaves to her, and worshipped her by fasting three or four days together, and by acts of devotion, such as sighs, groans, and ecstasies.

Dabbasheth. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 252) thinks this is "the modern Duweibeh," "between Joknean (Keimûn) and the sea, along the south boundary of Carmel," thus making the line of Zebulun include the crest of Carmel, and doubtless referring to Khurbet ed-Duweibeh, which the Ordnance Map lays down at one and one half miles north-west from Tell-Keimûn, and which the Memoirs (i, 311) describe as "heaps of stones, well cut and of good size, apparently Byzantine work;" but Trelawney Saunders (Map of the Old Test.) adopts the suggestion of Jebdâ, as in vol. ii, p. 638, described in the Memoirs (i, 274) as "a small mud hamlet in the plain, said only to contain eighty souls."

Dabbs, RICHARD, a Baptist minister, was born in Charlotte County, Va. He was pastor first at Ash Camp, afterwards in Petersburg; in 1820, in Lynchburg; subsequently, in Nashville, Tenn. He died May 21, 1825. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 306. (J. C. S.)

Daberath. The Memoirs (i, 363) accompanying the Ordnance Map of Western Palestine contain the following additional notice of this place: "Deburich—a small village built of stone, with inhabited caves; contains about two hundred Moslems, and is surrounded by gardens of figs and olives. It is situated on the slope of the hill. Water is obtained from cisterns in the village." "It has several Protestant families, the fruits of the English Church mission" (Tristram, Bible Places, p. 235).

Daberna (Taberna, or Ferna), GIUSEPPE, a Sicilian theologian, was born at Cernatara in 1599. He was a Capuchin friar, and died in 1677, leaving, Dissertazione della Scienza per Bene Finire (Messina, 1652):—Harmonia della Bibbia (ibid. 1656):—Ceremonie per Celebrare la Messa (Palermo, 1669):—Il Vocabulario Teosico:—also some religious works in Italian. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dabheog, of Lough Derg, an Irish or Welsh saint, commemorated Jan. 1.

Dabillon, ANDRÉ, a French theologian, and for a time a Jesuit, became grand-vicar of Caumartin, bishop of Amiens, then rector of Magné, Saintonge, and died there about 1664, leaving, La Divinité Défendue:—Le Concile de la Grace, etc. A collection of his works was printed at Paris, 1645. They were attributed to Barcos, nephew of John Duvergier of Hauranne, abbot of St. Cyran, in the Histoire Ecclésiastique of Dupin. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dabis (or Debis), a Japanese deity, of which a large image of brass stood in the road from Ōsaka to Sorungo, which was consulted every year by a spotless virgin.

Dabius (David, otherwise called Dobi, Biteus, or Mobiou), an Irish priest and saint, preached with great success in his own country and in Alba, and was patron saint of Domnach Cluana, now Donachloney, in the county of Down, and of Kippen, in Scotland, where a famous church was dedicated under his patronage, by the name of Moeacan. We still have Kippendavie besides Dunblane. To him, probably, more than to St. David or Dewi of Wales, are the Celtic dedications to St. David to be assigned. He is commemorated July 22.

Dablon, CLAUDE, a French Jesuit missionary in Canada, New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin, was born in 1618. He began a mission at Onondaga in 1655, and in 1668 established another at Sault Ste. Marie and one among the Foxes. In 1670 he became superior of the Canada missions. He died in Quebec, Sept. 20, 1697. He wrote the Relation de la Nouvelle France, 1671-79 (printed partly at the time and partly later; reprinted, N. Y. 1810).

Dabney, JOHN B., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his ministry in 1862 by officiating in Campbell County, Va., serving in Moore Parish, where subsequently he became rector, and remained in that position until his death, April 23, 1868. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Dabol is one of the snakes of Africa worshipped by the Widahs; it is attended by maidens as its priestesses, who, with the snake, receive great respect.

Dabonna is often given in the lists of nephews and nieces of St. Patrick, but much doubt rests on all his kindred. See DURRICA.

Dabrecog (or Da-Breccoc), of Thom-dreman, is an Irish saint, commemorated on May 9; probably the same given by some on this day as Dubricin or Dabricin.

Dabud. See DAVID, 1.

Dace, JOHN, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Wednesbury in 1754. He was converted young; in 1806 offered himself as a missionary to the West Indies; and died at St. Bartholomew, Sept. 3, 1821. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1822.

Dachiarog, "the saint of Airigul," is cited as a prophet. He may have been the Ulster saint Ciaroc, Ciarog, or Mochuaroc, who, with Breccan, was one of "the two heroes of purity who love Christ faithfully."

Dachonna is a very common name in the list of saints, either as Conna and Commun, or with the prefixes of veneration Da or Do and Mo. It was the baptismal name of St. Machar (q. v.).

The most famous saint of this name is commemorated May 15. He was bishop of Connor, and of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall. "St. Dachonna the pious, bishop of Condere," died in 726.

Dachsel, GEORG CHRISTOPH, a German Hebraist and theologian, a native of Alt-Leisnig, pursued his studies at Leipzig, took his degrees, and became minister at Lechnitz in 1712, and at Geringswalde in 1729, where his death occurred in 1742. He wrote, De Uctione Eliaei (Leipzig, 1708):—Biblia Hebraica Accentuata (ibid. 1729). See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dacianus (1), a persecuting officer in Spain, in 303 or 304, under Diocletian and Maximian. He was noted for his severity in carrying out their orders, especially against bishops, presbyters, and all ordained ministers. (2) One of the forty-nine martyrs of Carthage in 304, in the persecution by Diocletian under the proconsul Anulinus. (3) Metropolitan of Byzacene, in Africa, in the 6th century. A rescript was addressed to him by Justinian I in 541.

Dacius, Saint, bishop of Milan, was called to that see in 527. He exhorted the inhabitants of that city to defend themselves against the Goths, and on its capture took refuge at Corinth. He afterwards went to Constantinople, where the emperor, Justinian, who had published a constitution prejudicial to the clergy, wished him to sign it, but the prelate stoutly refused. He died February, 552. A MS. history, found in the library of Milan, is falsely attributed to Dacius. St. Dacius is commemorated Jan. 14. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dacriānus is the name of a supposed Benedictine abbot. He is the reputed author of Speculum Monachorum and Spiritualis Viæ Documenta, ascribed to the 8th century. The name was probably feigned by Ludovicus Blosius, an abbot of the 16th century.

Dactyli Idæi, in Greek mythology, were dæmons, to whom was accredited, in Asia Minor, especially near the Trojan mountain Ida, the first discovery of metallurgy, and who received divine worship. Their origin and real signification were not known even in the most flourishing period of Grecian and Roman art. It is only surmised that they received their name from their dexterity of finger (δάκτυλος), and from the mountain Ida. Their number is variously reckoned at from ten to one hundred.

Dactyliomancy (Gr. δάκτυλος, a ring, and μαντρία, divination), a species of augury practiced among the ancient Greeks and Romans, performed by suspending a ring from a fine thread over a round table, on the edge of which were marked the letters of the alphabet. When the vibration of the ring had ceased, the letters over which the ring happened to hang, when joined together, gave the answer to the inquirer. See DIVINATION.

Dacūnus is the name of a saint who was one of the anchorites said to have come with St. Petrock to Bodmin, one of the most sacred sites in Cornwall, in the 6th century.

Dadas, with Quintilian, was a disciple of Maximus the reader, at Dorostolus of Macedonia. They were martyred under Maximian, and are commemorated April 28.

Daddi, Bernardo, an Italian painter, was born at Arezzo, and flourished in the middle of the 14th century. He studied under Spinello Aretino, and was elected a member of the company of painters at Florence in 1355. He was celebrated in his day, and some of his works are still preserved in the churches of that city. He died there in 1380.

Daddi, Cosimo, an Italian painter, was born at Florence, where he flourished from about 1600 to 1630. He has several pictures in the monastery of San Lino, in that city, representing scenes from the Life of the Virgin. In the church of San Michaele there is still an altar-piece representing the patron saint of that church defeating the apostate angels. Daddi died in 1630.

Dadæa, in one of the Gnostic systems, is the archon of the fourth heaven.

Dadgah, in Persian mythology, is the place of justice, a small temple of fire of the Guebres. There is no fire-chapel in it, with a separate altar, but the fire burns on the ground, in distinction from the larger temple Derimber, which can only be built on selected sites, and must have a fire-chapel with an altar.

Dado. (1) Bishop of Amiens, is placed after Deodatus, about the end of the 7th century. (2) First abbot of Rodez. He lived in the 8th century, and built with his own hands a cell at a place called Conchæ. His first disciple was Medrakus, who succeeded him as abbot and obtained the "privilegium" from Louis the Pious. Dado then retired to a more remote place called Grandevabrum. See AUDONUS.

Dadswell, JAMES, an English Congregational minister, was born at Woolwich, Sept. 5, 1823. He embraced religion in his eighteenth year, and in 1856 was ordained at Caversham Hill, near Reading, where he labored until his death, July 19, 1865. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 244.

Dadu Pant'ha, one of the Vaishnava (q. v.) sects in Hindostan. They originated with Dadu, a cotton-cleaner by profession, who is supposed to have flourished about A.D. 1600. Having been admonished by a voice from heaven to devote himself to a religious life, he retired to Baharana mountain for that purpose, and after some time disappeared, leaving no traces of his whereabouts. His followers believed him to have been absorbed into the deity. The members of this sect are divided into three classes: 1. The Virakts, religious characters who go bareheaded, and have but one garment and one water-pot. 2. The Nagas, who carry arms, and are ready to use them for hire. 3. The Bister Dharis, who follow the ordinary occupations of life. The sect is said to be very numerous in Marwar and Ajmere. Their chief place of worship is at Narva. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Dadūchi, the torch-bearers in the Eleusinian Mysteries, whose duty was to offer prayers and sing hymns to Ceres and Proserpine. They passed the lighted torch from hand to hand, in commemoration of Ceres searching for her daughter Proserpine by the light of a torch which she had kindled at the fires of Ætna.

Dædæ Tængri, in Thibetan mythology, was a famous race of spirits, existing previous to the visible world, but who became limited through the creation of the world, without their being subject to the laws of death. As there were many who had reached this limit, but still did not die, dissatisfied with their doubtful destiny, they left their thrones and flitted about in the heavens until they came to the kingdom of Assyrian spirits.

The latter were continually in disunity, and the arrival of the Dáid Tängri strengthened one party to such an extent that a war resulted which lasted many millions of years.

Daegheln is believed to have been abbot of Barlone. He signed the act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803.

Daelman, KAREL GHISLAIN, a Belgian theologian, was born at Mons in 1870. He became successively doctor, doctor-regent, and professor of theology at Louvain, rector of the university, president of the college of Adrian, and canon of St. Peter, in the same city; then canon of St. Gertrude, at Nivelles. He died at Louvain, Dec. 21, 1931, leaving, Thèses sur le Système de la Grâce (Louvain, 1906):—De Actibus Humanis:—Théologie Scolastico-Morale (1738; republished several times); also some Oraisons Latines. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dæmonology of the later Jews. This subject is inextricably involved with their angelology, although, strictly speaking, angels are good spirits and dæmons bad ones. The views of the later Jews are thus summed up by a recent writer (Supernatural Religion, i, 128 sq.):

"In the apocryphal book of Tobit, the angel Raphael prescribes, as an infallible means of driving out the amorous demon Asmodeus, fumigation with the heart and liver of a fish; and the angel describes himself as one of the seven holy ones that present the prayers of saints to God. The book of Enoch relates the fall of the angels through love for the daughters of men, and gives the names of twenty-one of them and their leaders: Jeguin was he who seduced the holy angels; Ashbeel gave them evil counsel and corrupted them; Gadreel seduced Eve, and also taught the children of men the manufacture and use of murderous and military weapons; Penemue taught them many mysteries, also the art of writing; Kaodeja taught them all the wicked practices of spirits and dæmons, including magic and exorcism. The offspring of the fallen angels and the daughters of men were giants whose height was three thousand cubits, and they are the dæmons still working evil on the earth. Azazel taught men various arts, such as making bracelets and ornaments; Uriel is the angel of thunder and earthquakes; Raphael of the spirits of men; Raquel executes vengeance on the world and the stars; Michael is set over the spirits: Satanahel over the misdeeds of men; Gabriel over serpents, Paradise, and the cherubim. All the elements of nature are presided over by special spiritual beings. Philo Judeus and the Talmud are full of similar notions; an angel of the sun and moon is described in the Ascension Isaiah."

Daes, JAMES, a Scotch clergyman, who "came out from Linlithgow," officiated in Anstruther in January, 1585; in June confessed he had not entered the Reformed Kirk in proper order; in August accepted a call to commence a new kirk in Ersilton in March, 1586; officiated at Anstruther in 1588; was a member of the assemblies of 1595 and 1602; presented to the living by the king in 1611; called before the Court of High Commission in 1620; resigned before Jan. 4, 1633, and died before June 20, 1643. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 124, 523.

Dafrosa was martyred with her husband, Fabian, under Julian, at Rome. She is commemorated Jan. 4.

Dagaena. See DAIGH.

Dagamundus (or Dagamodus) was ninth abbot of the monastery of St. Claudius, on Mount Jura. His rule began in the last of the 6th, and covered the first quarter of the 7th century.

Dagāmus was an Irish bishop and confessor, who flourished at the close of the 6th and the beginning of the 7th century. He was a strict maintainer of traditional rites, giving way with great difficulty to the reasoning of Augustine, and refused to eat even in the same house with the Roman bishops. His commemoration is variously given as March 22 and May 29.

Dagan, bishop of Inbher Daoile, now Ennereilly, in the barony of Arklow, County Wicklow, was the son of Colman, of the race of Labhradh Lorc. His three brothers were saints, and he was progenitor of the men of Leinster. He was educated at Liathmore, under St. Mochoemoc or Pulcherius, and after visiting Rome became abbot of Inbher Daoile. He was a leader in the Paschal controversy, and although mentioned as intractable, is said to have been of a peculiarly mild disposition. He is perhaps the same as Dagamus (q. v.). He was born between 565 and 570, and died Sept. 13, 641. Both March 12 and Sept. 13 are given as his festival.

Dagg, JOHN L., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Middleburg, Loudon Co., Va., Feb. 13, 1794. He was converted in 1809, baptized in 1816, ordained in 1817; for several years preached to churches in his native state, and in 1825 became pastor of the Fifth Baptist Church in Philadelphia. He removed to Tuscaloosa, Ala., in 1836, and for eight years was principal of the Alabama Female Athenæum. In 1844 he was elected president of Mercer University, Ga., where he also gave instruction in theology. He resigned his office in 1856, and died June 11, 1884, at Haynesville, Ala. He published, Manual of Theology (1857):—Treatise on Church Order (1858):—Elements of Moral Science (1859):—Evidences of Christianity (1868), and several minor works, some of them of a controversial character. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 306. (J. C. S.)

Daggal. See DAJAL.

Daggett, Levi, Jr., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Troy, N. H., in 1820. He was converted in 1841, and after a few months' preaching united with the Providence Conference. He died April 18, 1857. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1858, p. 39.

Daggett, Oliver Ellsworth, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 14, 1810. He graduated from Yale College in 1828; and subsequently studied in the Law School and the Divinity School. He was pastor of the Second Church in Hartford, from April 12, 1837, to June 23, 1843; in Canandaigua, N. Y., from January, 1845, to October, 1867; for three years of Yale College Church and Livingston professor of divinity in the college; and from February, 1871, to September, 1877, pastor of the Second Church in New London, Conn.; and subsequently resided in Hartford without charge. He died Sept. 1, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 21.

Dagla was wife of a steward of Huneric, king of the Vandals. Under the persecution of Genseric, she several times confessed her faith. In A. D. 483, under Huneric, she was flogged with whips and staves till she was exhausted, and then exiled to a barren desert, whither she went with cheerfulness. They afterwards offered to send her to a less frightful place, but she preferred to remain where she was.

Dagin, FRANCESCO (called il Capella), an Italian painter, was born at Venice in 1714, and studied under Giovanni Battista Piazzetta. He was elected a member of the Academy at Venice. One of his best works is St. George and the Dragon, in the parochial church of San Bonate, in Bergamo. He died in 1784.

Dagnus. See DECIUS.

Dago, eleventh bishop of Orleans and successor of St. Florencius, lived about the end of the 5th or beginning of the 6th century.

Dāgoba (Sanskrit, dā, dātu, or dhātu, an osseous relic, and geba, or garbha, the womb) is a conical structure surmounting relics among the Buddhists. These buildings are sometimes of immense height, of circular form, and composed of stone or brick, faced with stone or stucco. They are built upon a platform, which again rests upon a natural or artificial elevation, and is usually reached by a flight of steps. Of the relics preserved in them, the most conspicuous objects are generally vessels of stone or metal. They commonly contain a silver box or casket, and within that, or sometimes by itself, a casket of gold. Within these vessels, or sometimes in the cell in which they are placed, are found small pearls, gold buttons, gold ornaments and rings, beads, pieces of white and colored glass and crystal, pieces of clay or stone with impressions of figures, bits of bone and teeth of animals, pieces of cloth, and bits of bark. The dagobas are held in the utmost respect by the Buddhists, on account of the relics in them. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.; Wilson, Ariana Antiqua; Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 217 sq.

Dagobertus (or Radabertus) was the twentieth archbishop of Tarentaise, and lived about the end of the 8th century.

Dagonel, PIERRE, a French theologian, was born on the island of Lifu, in the Pacific Ocean, in 1585. He entered the Jesuit order Aug. 2, 1605, taught philosophy for four years, and became prefect of the College of Dijon. He died at Pont-a-Mousson, Dec. 7, 1650, leaving Traité des Indulgences (Nancy, 1626):—Le Chemin du Ciel (ibid. 1627):—Les Dévotés Pensées (Paris, 1631):—Doutihee (ibid. ed.) :—L'Échelle des Saints (ibid. 1638):—Le Miroir des Riches (ibid. 1641):—Les Devoirs du Chrétien (Lyons, 1643 and 1647). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daguerre, JEAN, a French theologian, was born at La Ressource, at the foot of the Pyrenees, in 1708. He established and directed, for fifty-two years, a seminary there, founded a convent of nuns at Hasparren, and died in 1788, leaving Abbrégé des Principes de Morale (Paris, 1773, 1819, 1823). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daguet, PIERRE ANTOINE ALEXANDRE, a French theologian, was born at Baumes-les-Dames (Franch-Comté), Dec. 1, 1707. He belonged to the Jesuit order, and when it was dissolved, withdrew to Besançon, where he died in 1775, leaving Exercices Chrêtiens des Gens de Guerre, etc. (Lyons, 1749):—Considérations Chrêtiennes pour Chaque Jour du Mois (ibid. 1758):—Exercices du Chrétien (ibid. 1759):—La Consolation du Chrétien (ibid.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dagum, in Laman religion, is the official dress of the priests among the Mongolians. It is a large cloak or mantle, made of yellow silk, striped with red, and with a collar, also of red.

Dagur (or Dag, i. e. day), according to the Norse mythology, is the son of Dellingir (twilight), the third husband of Not (night), the daughter of Niörf (darkness), a giant who had his habitation in Jotunheim. Dagur and Not were adopted by Alfadur, who gave them each two stallions and two wagons, with which to journey around the earth once a day. Not rides with her steed Rhimfaxi (dark mane) in advance. The earth is wet every morning from the foam (dew) running from the steed. Dagur's steed is called Skinfaxi (bright mane); from his shining mane everything becomes light.

Dahl, JOHANN CHRISTIAN WILHELM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 1, 1771, at Rostock. In 1778 he began his studies at his native place, and after having completed them at Jena and Göttingen, returned as lecturer to Rostock in 1797. In 1802 he was made professor of Greek literature, and in 1804 professor of theology; in 1807 he took his degree as doctor of theology, presenting for his thesis, De æthereis Epistolarum Petrinæ Posterioris atque Judæ. He died April 15, 1810. He published, Amos, neu übersetzt und erläutert (Göttingen, 1795):—Observationes Philologicae atque Criticæ ad quædam Prophetarum Minorum Loca (Neu-Strelitz, 1798):—Chrestomathia Philomiana (Hamburg, 1800-1802, 2 vols.):—Lehrbuch der Homiletik

(Leipsic, 1811). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 91, 223, 226, 798; ii, 60, 97; Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 304 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 194. (B. P.)

Dahler, JEAN GEORGE, a Franco-German Protestant theologian, was born at Strasburg, Dec. 7, 1760, and died while professor of theology and Old Testament exegesis there, June 29, 1832. He wrote, Animadversiones in Versionem Græcam Proverborum Salom. ex Veneta S. Marci Bibliotheca Nuper Editam (Strasburg, 1786):—De Librorum Paralipomenum Auctoritate atque Fide (ibid. 1819):—Die Denk- und Sittensprüche Salomos (ibid. 1810):—Jérémie Traduit sur le Texte Original, Accompagné de Notes (ibid. 1825-1830, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 52, 79, 212, 219, 859; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 194; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Dahman, JOHN JACOB WILLIAM, a German Reformed minister, was born at Elberfeld, Rhenish Prussia, June 29, 1801. He became a member of the German Reformed Church in Elberfeld in 1845; came to New York in 1848, and in 1851 was licensed to preach. He was pastor at Lancaster, Erie Co., N. Y., in 1852, and in 1853 at Arnheim, Brown Co., O. In 1858 he removed East, and was for a time pastor of a German Presbyterian congregation at Jamaica, L. I. He served the Reformed Church at Melrose, N. Y., from 1861 to 1863, when he took charge of the congregation in Glassborough, N. J., for six years, and then removed to Bridesburg, Pa., where he labored several years. His health failing, he divided his remaining days between Collegeville, Montgomery Co., and Philadelphia, where he died, Aug. 1, 1874. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 112.

Dahman, in Persian mythology, is a pure and holy genius, whose favor cannot be secured by sacrifices, but only by prayers and good deeds. The Persians made thirty prayers to this spirit for their relations, and, in consequence, sixty sins unto death were forgiven the dead. Dahman is the most noble benefactor of the inhabitants of heaven, as also of the human souls going there. His first work is to take the soul and bring it into the presence of God, after which it is entirely safe.

Dahme, GEORG CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 8, 1789, at Jeinsen, a village in the province of Hanover. After being for some time court chaplain at the city of Hanover, he was appointed in 1792 general superintendent at Celle, and died while member of consistory and dean of Bardowick, June 20, 1803. He published, Predigten (Brunswick, 1775):—Sieben kleine exegetische Aufsätze (Göttingen, 1791). See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner des 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts, p. 24 sq. (B. P.)

Dähne, AUGUST FERDINAND, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Leipsic, Oct. 26, 1807. He commenced his academical lectures at Halle in 1831, was in 1835 professor extraordinarius there, and died Nov. 30, 1878, leaving, De Præscientia Divina cum Libertate Humana Concordia (Leipsic, 1830):—De Græcæ Clementis Alexandrini (ibid. 1831):—Geschichtliche Darstellung der jüdisch-alexandrinischen Religions-Philosophie (Halle, 1834, 2 vols.):—Entwicklung des Paulinischen Lehrbegriffs (ibid. 1835):—Die Christuspartei in der apostolischen Kirche zu Corinth (ibid. 1841). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 257; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 194; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 295, 418, 522, 888. (B. P.)

Dahomey, RELIGION OF. Dahomey forms a kingdom of considerable extent in the interior of Western Africa, behind the Slave Coast. The centre of its religious and political system is a superstitious veneration for the person of their monarch, whom the natives regard as almost a divinity. It is even accounted criminal to believe that the king eats, drinks, and sleeps like ordinary mortals. It is needless to say that his orders are implicitly obeyed, however unreasonable or tyrannical they may be.

Fetich (q. v.) worship prevails here, as in all other parts of Western Africa, the leopard being their sacred animal. The public sacrifice to this animal consists of a bullock; but private sacrifices of fowls, and even goats, are common, and are offered with great ceremony. When a man dies his principal wives and some of his favorites are offered in sacrifice on his tomb. The priesthood is taken from the higher classes, even some of the royal wives and children being found in the sacred order. To reveal the sacred mysteries and incantations, the knowledge of which is limited to the priestly office, is visited with certain death. See Forbes, Dahomey and the Dahomans; Wilson, Western Africa.

Daiboth, a Japanese idol of great popularity, is of monstrous height, sits in the middle of his pagoda on a table altar raised but a little from the ground, and with his hand, which is as long as the body of an ordinary man, touches the roof. He has the breasts and face of a woman, and black, woolly, crispy locks; and is encircled on all sides with gilded rays, on which are placed a great number of images representing the inferior idols of the Japanese.

Daiching, in Lamian mythology, is the god of war among the Mongolians, Thibetians, and Mantchoorians. He is represented in full uniform, surrounded by trophies, and his figure is used to decorate the army-banners, also carried as a badge. All success in war is ascribed to him, and it is believed that his presence is a preventive against all harm.

Daign (or Dega; Lat. Dagens), an Irish bishop of the 6th century, was son of Cairrell, of the race of Eoghan. He was a pupil of St. Finnian of Clonard, and, after he became a priest, gave the vaticum to St. Moctha of Louth. He was a skilful artificer, and was said to pass his days in reading, and carving iron and copper, and his nights in transcribing manuscripts. The construction of three hundred bells and three hundred croziers of bishops and abbots, with the transcription of three hundred copies of the gospels, is attributed to him. He died A.D. 587. His chief festival was Aug. 18, although Feb. 19 is given as a minor festival.

Daikoku, in Japanese mythology, is one of the four deities of wealth. He is the giver of happiness and prosperity, for with the hammer which he holds he can change everything he touches, and get anything he desires. He sits on a keg of rice, and beside him is a bag in which he preserves his treasures, and out of which he dispenses to his worshippers whatever they need.

Dall, THOMAS, a Scotch clergyman, entered as exhorter in 1568; signed the articles drawn up by the synod in 1572; was reader from 1574 to 1576, and died Feb. 19, 1586. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 382.

Dallé, PIERRE, a clergyman of the French Reformed Church, was born in 1649, and removed to America in the latter part of the 17th century. He had ministered in the early Huguenot settlements in Massachusetts for some time, when the Reformed Dutch Church in New York engaged him, in 1683, to preach to the French Reformed Church in that city, as colleague of Henricus Selyna. After 1792, he devoted himself to itinerant missionary work among the Huguenots, preaching occasionally at New Paltz, in Ulster Co., N. Y., for several years; also at New Rochelle, Westchester Co., and on Staten Island. In 1696 he became the minister of the French Reformed Church in Boston, where he died, May 20, 1715. See Col. Hist. of N. Y. iii, 651, and Mass. ii, 52; DeWitt, Hist. Discourse, p. 26; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 228. (W. J. R. T.)

Dally, WILLIAM M., D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Conhocton, O., in 1812. He spent his childhood on a farm in Franklin County, Ind.; learned all he could at the accessible schools by the time he was fifteen; then began teaching; was converted; commenced preaching the next year, and in 1831 entered the Indiana Conference. In 1836 he was stationed at Bloomington, and graduated at Indiana State University. In 1838 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference, and stationed at St. Louis. Soon after he was elected a professor in St. Charles College. In 1840 he returned to Indiana, broken in health, and suffering from hemorrhage of the lungs. In 1843 he re-entered the active ranks as pastor at Madison, Ind.; in 1844 and 1845 was chaplain in the United States Congress; then again entered the regular work; was elected president of Indiana State University in 1853; and in 1862 appointed hospital chaplain at St. Louis, which position he held until 1865, when he went South as special mail-agent. In 1869 he connected himself with the Louisiana Conference, and served the Church as presiding elder till his decease, in January, 1877. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1878, p. 6.

Daily Celebration of the Holy Communion is mentioned in Acts ii, 42-46; and by Tertullian, Cyprian, Irenæus, Ambrose, Gregory, and Stephen of Autun, and is provided for in the Church of England.

Daily Prayer. See DAILY SERVICE.

Daily Preface is the preface used on all ferial days in the Church of England immediately before the Sanctus, in the service of the holy communion.

Dai-Nitz No-Rai, in Japanese mythology, is the great form of the sun, a god of the air and light, he from whom all light, even that of the sun and stars, comes. He is represented seated on a cow. See AMANO WATTA.

Dains-leif, in Norse mythology, is the sword of king Högni, the father of the sorceress Hildur. The sword had been made by dwarfs, and had the attribute that, once unsheathed, it must shed blood, and that the wounds made by it were incurable. The war, which originated between Högni and Hedin, from the seizure of Hildur, will continue, by the force of this sword and Hildur's strategy, to the end of the world.

Daira, in Greek mythology, "the omniscient," a divine being in the Eleusinian Mysteries, mother of Eleusia, by Mercury, is declared one sometimes with Venus, sometimes with Ceres, also with Juno and Proserpina.

Dairchell (or Daircholla), an Irish bishop of Glendalough, was the son of Curetai. He died in 678, and is commemorated May 3.

Daire (or Daria) is the name of several saints given in the Irish calendars, but sufficient cannot be found to give them a well-defined individuality or place in history.

Dairi, the spiritual head or supreme pontiff of the Shinto (q. v.) religion of Japan. At one time he combined in his own person the offices of secular and ecclesiastical ruler of the country. Towards the end of the 16th century, however, the temporal power was taken from him, leaving him only the spiritual. His position is one of great dignity, and he attempts to maintain it with suitable display. The descendants of the royal family all belong to his court, and have now become so numerous that they are obliged to labor at the most humble occupations to maintain their outward dignity. The person of the Dairi is regarded as very sacred, even as above all mortal imperfection. When he dies, the next heir (of whatever age or sex) succeeds to the office thus made vacant. At such a time he is said to renovate his soul, that is, to be renewed in the form of his successor. The Dairi confers all titles of honor, and canonizes the saints.

Dais is (1) tabernacle work, canopies; (2) the raised platform for the principal table in the hall, hence called the high table; (3) the canopy over a president's chair. The stall-like seat of the archbishop of Canterbury remains at Mayfield, and forms the centre of the table.

Dajak Version of the Scriptures. The Dajak is spoken in Borneo. A translation of the New Test. was commenced by missionaries of the Rhenish mission in 1843, and completed in 1846. It was printed under the superintendence of Mr. A. Hardiland, at the Cape of Good Hope. This version is written in a dialect of the Dajak called Poelopetak, which prevails almost over the whole south side of Borneo. A new and revised edition was published in 1859. (B. P.)

Dajal, the name which Mohammed gave to the antichrist or false Christ, whose appearance he regarded as one of the ten signs which should precede the resurrection. The prophet thus describes him: "Verily he is of low stature, although bulky; and has splay feet, and is blind, with his flesh even on one side of his face, without the mark of an eye, and his other eye is neither full nor sunk into his head. Then, if you should have a doubt about Dajal, know that your cherisher (God) is not blind." He describes him as coming with deceptions, and displaying miraculous power. He succeeds for a certain time, until the advent of Christ shall put an end to him and his followers.

Dakhani Version of the Scriptures. The Dakhani is a dialect of Hindostanee current in the Madras presidency, and is used by the Mohammedans. The first parts of Scripture, Genesis and the four gospels, were published about the year 1862, to which were added, in 1868, the other parts of the New Test. (B. P.)

Dakin, Ann, wife of John Dakin, was a minister of the Society of Friends, and died in Charlotte, Vt., March 28, 1861, aged fifty-nine years. She became a member when about twenty-two years of age, and for many years was an acceptable minister. In 1850, however, she withdrew from the society, but towards the close of her life reunited with the Friends. See Amer. Annual Monitor, 1862, p. 42.

Dakin, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Castleton, Derbyshire. He commenced his ministry in 1811, worked hard, and died suddenly at Thirsk, Jan. 8, 1818, aged thirty-one years.

Dakina, William (1), one of the translators of King James's Bible, was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, where he became a junior fellow Oct. 8, 1593, and senior fellow the following March. In 1601 he was made Greek lecturer of that college, and in 1604 was chosen professor of divinity in Gresham College. He died in February, 1607. He was one of two who translated the epistles of St. Paul and the canonical epistles, but did not live to see the work completed. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Dakina, William (2), D.D., an English clergyman, published a translation of the History of Catherine, Empress of Russia (1798, 2 vols.), and several single Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Dakota Version of the Scriptures. Till the year 1839 no edition of any portion of the Scripture was printed for the Dakota or Sioux Indians. But in 1879 the entire Bible, the work of the Revs. Th. S. Williamson and S. R. Riggs, was given to the Dakota people. Forty years these two missionaries spent in their work, each laboring separately, but having the translation carefully read and freely criticised by the other. (B. P.)

Dakpa-zamo, in Lamanian mythology, is one of the most frightful divisions of hell. It belongs to the eight regions into which hell (Gnielva) is divided; and in this place the damned are tortured by fire until the pain kills them, but immediately they awake to new life and new tortures.

Daksha, in Hindû mythology, is a powerful uncreated spirit, sprung from Brahma's thumb, and therefore one of the ten rulers of all beings. He had no son, but fifty daughters by his wife Prasudi, the daughter of Suayambhu. These daughters were given away in marriage that they might bear him sons. Twenty-seven of the same were given to Chiandra, the god of the moon; thirteen to Kaayapa, Brahma's grandson; seven to Dharma, the god of justice and benevolence; of the remaining three, Akni received one, Werotren another, and the last and most beautiful, Shakti, was given to Siva. The ten rulers, of whom Daksha was one, gave a great feast once, to which all the gods were invited. When Daksha entered the gods all arose out of respect to him, save Siva, who remained seated. Daksha then insulted him, without Siva saying anything. Some time thereafter Daksha invited all the gods to another festival, but overlooked Siva and his wife Shakti. Although Siva sought to persuade her not to go, Shakti went to the festival, and was treated with insult. She then said she would lay aside the body she received from Daksha, and take on another. This took place, and she was born as Parvati; but Siva, in anger over his loss, tore a hair from his head, out of which there came a giant, who cut off Daksha's head, set his house on fire, and burned his head up with it. The gods prayed Siva's forgiveness, which was granted. But as Daksha's head did not exist, he placed a goat's head in its stead.

Dakshinas, or right-hand form of worship among the Hindûs, that is, when the worship of any goddess is performed in a public manner, and agreeably to the Vedas or Puranas. The only ceremony which can be supposed to form an exception to the general character of this mode is the Bali, an offering of blood, in which rite a number of animals, usually kids, are annually decapitated. In some cases life is offered without shedding blood, when the more barbarous practice is adopted of pummeling the poor animal to death with the fists; at other times blood only is offered, without injury to life. Such practices are not considered orthodox.

Daladâ, the left canine tooth of Buddha, the most celebrated relic in the possession of his followers. To preserve this, the only portion which remains of the body of the holy sage, a temple has been erected, in which it is deposited, being placed in a small chamber, enshrined in six cases, the largest of them being upwards of five feet in height, and formed of silver, on the model of a dagoba (q. v.). The same shape is preserved in the five inner ones, two of them being inlaid with rubies and other precious stones. The relic itself "is a piece of discolored ivory or bone, slightly curved, nearly two inches in length, and one in diameter at the base; and from thence to the other extremity, which is rounded and blunt, it considerably decreases in size." The history of this venerable relic is given by Hardy, in Eastern Monachism, p. 224 sq.

Dalai-Lama, the great high-priest of the inhabitants of Tartary and Thibet. See LAMAISM.

Dalberg, Adolphus, prince-abbot of Fulda, founded, in 1784, in this celebrated abbey, a Catholic university. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dalberg, Wolfgang de, chamberlain of Worms, was raised to the dignity of archbishop and of elector of Mentz. He died in 1601. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dalbey, Joki, a Methodist Protestant minister, was born in Ohio, June 1, 1810. He was converted in early life; in 1828 licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal Church; in 1839 joined the Methodist Protestant Church, and thereafter labored successively on various circuits in Ohio and Pennsylvania. In 1841 he was elected president of the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1843 to the presidency of the Muskingum Conference; in 1846 was transferred to the Ohio Conference, but in 1851 removed to St. Charles County, Mo., and settled on a farm. He next entered the Illinois Conference, and in 1860 joined the North Iowa Conference, in which he labored until his death, Nov. 22, 1869. See Bassett, History of the Meth. Protestant Church, p. 373.

Dalbhadh (Lat. Dalmacius), an Irish saint of Cuilcollaige, lived about the first half of the 7th century. He was of the race of Oilill Flaunbeg, a disciple of St. Abban and a friend of St. Caiman. He was a strict performer of penance, and it is said that "he never touched his hand to his side as long as he lived." He is commemorated Oct. 23.

Dalbin, JEAN, a French theologian, was born at Toulouse about 1530, and was appointed archdeacon of the cathedral of that city. He wrote several religious and controversial works, the principal of which are, Discours, etc. (Paris, 1566; Avignon, 1567):—Le Sacrement de l'Auêl (Paris, 1566):—Opusculs Spirituels (ibid. 1567):—La Marque de l'Église (ibid. 1568). See Hoelter, Nouv. Biog. Générale, & v.

Dalby, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Sutton-Bonington, Nottinghamshire, June 10, 1783. He united with the Methodist society at the age of seventeen, entered the ministry in 1807, became a supernumerary at the end of forty-four years, took up his abode at Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, and labored until his death, March 12, 1860. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Dalby, William Lee, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Northampton County, Va., July 6, 1825. He was licensed to preach in 1848; joined the Virginia Conference in 1852; and labored until his death, Feb. 7, 1866. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 7.

Dalcho, FREDERICK, M.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in London, England, in 1770, of Prussian parents. He received a classical and medical education in Baltimore, Md., and obtained a physician's commission in the American army. In 1799 he resigned and removed to Charleston, S. C. About 1807 he became editor of the Charleston Courier; but in 1811 was appointed lay-reader in St. Paul's Parish, Colleton; in 1814 was ordained deacon of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and became pastor of the same parish; June 12, 1818, he was admitted to the priesthood; and Feb. 23, 1819, elected assistant minister of St. Michael's Church in Charleston. He died there, Nov. 24, 1836. His principal publication is, Historical Account of the P. E. Church in South Carolina. He also wrote, The Divinity of our Saviour:—The Evidence from Prophecy, etc.; and was the projector, and for a long time the principal conductor, of the Gospel Messenger. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 560.

Dale, Abner, a German Reformed minister, was born near Boalsburg, Centre Co., Pa., Nov. 17, 1829. He graduated from Marshall College in 1852, and from the theological seminary at Mercersburg in 1856. Soon after he was ordained pastor at Fairview, Butler Co.; and from 1860 to 1866 he served successively Rimersburg and Mercer Mission. His health failing, he was without a charge for several years, but finally accepted a call again to Fairview, and labored there until his death, Jan. 16, 1875. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 189.

Dale, Hervey Smith, a Baptist minister, was born at Danvers, Mass., in 1812. He graduated from Brown University in 1834, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1841; was ordained the same year, and settled at Newport, O., until 1851; was pastor at Lebanon for several years, from 1852; in 1856 became agent for the Western Baptist Educational Society; and died in Cincinnati in 1857. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Soc. 1876, p. 19.

Dale, I. A., a Baptist minister, was born in De Kalb County, Tenn., in 1825. He united with the Church in 1849; the same year was licensed to preach; ordained in June, 1853; labored in the southern part of Illinois; and died at Sandoval, Jan. 18, 1875. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversaries, 1875, p. 7. (J. C. S.)

Dale, James Wilkinson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Odessa, Del., Oct. 16, 1812. He received his preparatory education in Philadelphia under Mr. Cleanthus Felt; graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1831, and began the study of law in Philadelphia. In the fall of 1832 he entered Andover Theological Seminary; joined the middle class in Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1833; the next year returned to the seminary at Andover, and graduated in 1835. He was licensed by Andover Association, April 16, visited the churches of Long Island, and those of eastern Massachusetts the year following, presenting the missionary cause, and was ordained at Dracut, Aug. 29, 1837, as an appointee of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; but the financial condition of the society preventing it from sending him abroad, he studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, graduating April 6, 1838, and supplying at the same time the Fifth and the Fifteenth Presbyterian churches in that city. He was an agent of the Pennsylvania Bible Society, and labored for it throughout the state for the next seven years; was pastor of Ridley and Middletown churches, Delaware County, from May 17, 1846, to April 8, 1858; at Media, in the same county, from Oct. 26, 1866, to Aug. 3, 1871; and at Wayne from Sept. 28, 1871, to Oct. 23, 1876. He died at Media, April 19, 1881. Dr. Dale published many works, the chief of which are a masterly series on Baptism (Phila. 1867–1874, 4 vols. 8vo), in opposition to the views of Baptists. Prof. A. C. Kendrick reviewed the volume entitled Classic Baptism, in the Baptist Quarterly, April, 1869; Prof. Broadus his Patristic and Christic Baptism, in the same Review, 1875, p. 245; and Dr. Whittitt gave a general reply to Dr. Dale's works in the Baptist Quarterly, April, 1877. See also the scholarly and valuable book by David B. Ford, entitled, Studies on the Baptismal Question, including a Review of Dr. Dale (Bost. 1879, 8vo).

Dale, Jeremiah, a Baptist minister, was born in Danvers, Mass., in 1787. He was converted at the age of eighteen; in 1816 removed to Zanesville, O.; in 1823 was ordained, and performed much itinerant service, both in Ohio and Virginia; in the spring of 1831 returned to Danvers, where he died, Sept. 4 of that year. Dale, Jonathan, an English Congregational minister, was born at Goostrey, Cheshire, Aug. 11, 1827. He joined the Wesleys; studied at Richmond College; was preacher for nearly four years at Leicester; then united with the Independents; and in 1855 became pastor at Hallaton and Slawston, in Leicestershire. In 1859 he removed to Heanor; and in 1867 became pastor of the united churches of Repton and Barrow, where he remained until his death, May 29, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 322.

Dale, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the Delaware Conference, and after many years of active service died at Middletown, Del., Nov. 16, 1873, aged seventy-three. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 77.

Dale, Thomas, an English divine and poet, was born in London in 1797. He was educated at Cambridge, ordained in 1823, and after several successive appointments as curate and lecturer, was professor of English literature in London University from 1828 to 1830. In 1835 he became vicar of St. Bride, Fleet Street; in 1836 professor of English literature in King's College, London; resigned in 1839; in 1843 was made canon of St. Paul's; and in 1870 dean of Rochester. He died May 14 of the same year, leaving several volumes of Sermons and Poems.

Dalen, CORNELIS VAN, a Flemish engraver, was born at Antwerp about 1640, and was called the Younger to distinguish him from his father. He was a pupil of Cornelis Visscher, and executed a number of pictures after his style, among which are, The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Virgin with the Infant Jesus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Dalfinus, bishop or archbishop of Lyons, flourished in the middle of the 7th century. It is said that when Wilfrid made his visit to Rome, he was hospitably entertained by Dalfinus, who became warmly attached to him and wished to make him his heir. On his return in 658 he tarried at Lyons three years, during which time Dalfinus, with eight other bishops, was put to death by Baldhild, widow of Clovis II, king of the Franks. She was afterwards a canonized saint, and the story is inconsistent with her character.

Dalgairns, JOHN BERNARD, an English priest of the Oratory, was born Oct. 21, 1818. He studied at Oxford, became an adherent of Dr. John Henry Newman, shared with him the monastic life in Littlemore, near Oxford, assisted him in the edition of Lives of British Saints, became a Roman Catholic in 1843, and received holy orders at Langres, in France. He then went to Rome, and after his return to London he became a member of the Oratory there, and died April 8, 1876. Besides contributions to the Dublin Review and Contemporary Review, he wrote The Sacred Heart and Holy Communion. See Bellesheim, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (R. P.)

Dalgarno, WILLIAM, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1651; officiated at Walls and Flota for two years; was admitted to the living in 1657, and resigned on account of his age in 1699. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 404.

Dalgarno, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1660; became helper to John Jamesone at Tyrie; and was recognised as incumbent in 1692, 1693, and 1694 by William, lord Saltoun. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 643.

Dalgarno, George, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted in March, 1685, to the living at Fyvie, and died in 1717. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 658.

Dalgarno, William, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1646; was ordained minister at Penicuik in November, 1656; collated in October, 1662; transferred to Kirkmahoe in 1663; continued April 27, 1664; transferred to Mauchline in 1665; presented by the king to Dunsyre in 1669; transferred to St. Fergus in 1678; admitted April 18; and died in 1696, aged about seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 222, 305, 587; iii, 404, 639.

Dalglish (or Dalglesche), the family name of numerous Scotch clergymen:

1. ALEXANDER (1), was accepted and sent to preach the gospel to the heathen, but died on the way, between Montserrat and Darien, in November, 1699. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 400.

2. ALEXANDER (2), was licensed to preach in July, 1688; called to the living at Abercorn in June, 1689; ordained Jan. 1 following; called to Dunfermline, April 7, 1697; transferred to Linlithgow, May 3, 1699; and died May 30, 1726. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 161, 165.

3. COLIN, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1670; was called to the living at Parton in 1675, translated to Old Luce in 1684, and became a papist about 1686. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 719, 766.

4. DAVID, graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1599; was an expectant there in 1608; was appointed to the living at Cupar, second charge, in 1614; ordained in 1617; presented to the living at Aberdour in 1636; transferred to the first charge at Cupar in 1642; was injured in a journey to Edinburgh, and died May 7, 1652, aged about seventy-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 461, 464.

5. JOHN (1), graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1662; was licensed to preach in 1667; became chaplain to William, earl of Roxburgh, who presented him, in March, 1672, to the living at Roxburgh, to which he was ordained in March, 1673; was without a cure till 1688, when he was appointed to Queensferry; transferred to Roxburgh in 1690, and to Old Machar in 1696; continued at Roxburgh through infirmity in January, 1698, but transferred to Dundee in 1700, and died after Nov. 1, 1715, aged seventy-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 198, 470, 690; iii, 692.

6. JOHN (2), graduated at Edinburgh University in 1672; was called to the living at Kirkcudbright in 1683; transferred to Strathaven after 1684, and died at Edinburgh in June, 1699, aged about forty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 690; ii, 262.

7. NICOL, regent in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews; was appointed minister to the second charge at St. Cuthbert's in 1581; tried by the privy council in 1584, and convicted of concealing treasonable correspondence, and a scaffold was erected for his execution, but he was pardoned, released, and returned to his charge; transferred in September, 1588, and settled at Pittenweem in 1589; became chaplain to the countess of Forfar. He took an active share in the business of the Church; was a member of the assemblies in 1589, 1590, 1591 (when he was elected moderator), 1592, 1593, 1595, 1597, and died in 1608. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 128; ii, 454, 469.

8. ROBERT (1), son of Alexander, minister at Linlithgow, was licensed to preach in 1719; called to the living of the second charge at Linlithgow in 1720; transferred to the first charge in 1726; presented to the living in January, 1727, and died Aug. 9, 1758, aged sixty-four years. He left two sons, Robert and William, in the ministry. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 162, 163.

9. ROBERT (2), D.D., son of the minister at Ferryport, was born June 5, 1731; graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1750; licensed to preach in 1756; presented by the king as successor to his father at Ferryport-on-Craig, in December, 1759; ordained in May, 1760; resigned his charge in November, 1794, and died April 19, 1803. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 428.

10. WALTER, graduated at Edinburgh University in July, 1661; was licensed to preach, and admitted to the living at Girthon in October, 1665; transferred to Tongland in 1666, and to Westerkirk in 1668; deprived on account of the test in 1682, and died at Inzeholm in February, 1688, aged forty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 637, 713, 724.

11. WILLIAM, son of a skipper of Queensferry, graduated at Glasgow University in June, 1707; became bursar there in 1710; studied theology under Dr. Mark, at Leyden; was licensed to preach in 1717; called to the living at Carmee the same year, and ordained in 1719; transferred to Ferryport-on-Craig in 1739; succeeded to the family estate in Scotsraig, and died there Aug. 6, 1759, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 414, 428.

Dalham, FLORENTIUS (or FLORIAN), an Austrian geometrician, doctor of theology, and librarian at Salzburg, was born July 22, 1713, at Vienna, where he also acted for some time as professor of philosophy, and died Jan. 19, 1795. He is the author of Concilia Salisburgensia Thioceana (Augsburg, 1788, fol.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 663; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daliell, John, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1610; was licensed to preach in 1614; became a schoolmaster at Prestonpans; was presented to the living at Prestonkirk in 1619; continued July, 1669, and died before Nov. 3, 1682. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 378.

Dalliel, Mungo, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at Glasgow University in 1603; was presented to the vicarage of Coltingham by the king; transferred to the living at Cranshaws in 1615; continued, but the charge was vacant in 1652. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 409.

Dalling, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in November, 1739; called to the living of Cleish in February, and ordained in July, 1743; was one of three suspended from sitting in synods or presbyteries or general assemblies, regarding the settlement of Inverkeithing; was released in June, 1765, and died Aug. 11, 1790, aged seventy-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 582.

Dalling, William, a Scotch clergyman, son of the foregoing, was licensed to preach in July, 1786; ordained assistant minister to his father at Cleish, in October, 1788; succeeded in 1790, and died Nov. 18, 1835, in his eightieth year. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 583.

Dalkiel, in later Hebrew demonology, is a fallen spirit, whose office is to wield a fiery switch, with which he drives the lost to the seventh region of hell.

Dall, Henry, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at the University of St. Andrews in July, 1699; was called to the living at Kirkcaldy, second charge, in August, and ordained in November, 1704; transferred to the first charge in October, 1711, and died in February, 1724, aged about forty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 516, 519.

Dall, John, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at the University of St. Andrews in July, 1663; became chaplain to the laird of Duninald; was presented to the living of Kinnaird in September, 1676, and died in 1698, aged about fifty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 829.

Dall, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of seventeen, entered the itinerancy under Wesley in 1772, labored in Great Britain, Ireland, and the Isle of Man with great success, became a supernumerary, and died Oct. 10, 1828, aged eighty-one years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1829.

Dall, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was called to the living at Barrie in September, 1720; ordained the month following, and died Sept. 27, 1775. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 792.

Dall, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1727, called and ordained to the living at Monifeth in 1738, and died May 25, 1762. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 725.

Dallan FORGAILL (properly Bochard, Eigeas, or Righ Eigeas), of Cluain Dallain, an Irish saint of the 6th century, was the son of Colla, of the race of Colla Nais, who was monarch of Ireland, A.D. 823-826. He was born on the borders of Connaught and Ulster, at a place called Masrige and Cathrige Sleacht, afterwards Teallach Eathach. He was early recognised as the royal poet, and the greatest scholar in Ireland. In his day the bards had become very turbulent and annoying to royalty, and because king Aedh refused their requests, they threatened to satirize him in their bardic lays. The king issued a decree of banishment. At a convention of the estates of the nation, which met at Drumceatt (now Daisy Hill, in the county of Londonderry), the question of the bards coming up, St. Columba pleaded successfully for their retention, as a useful body. In gratitude to St. Columba, Dallan composed the Amra Cholumcille, or "Praises of St. Columba," which, though largely glossed, remains to this day. It is written in very old and almost unintelligible Irish. It was long used as a charm, and the reciting of it was believed to be a safeguard in danger, and a sure remedy in blindness, Dallan himself having, it is said, received his sight on the completion of his poem at St. Columba's death. He is also said by Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, 204) to have composed other panegyrics in praise of St. Senan of Iniscathey and St. Connall of Iniscail, which had the same wonderful effects. He is said to have been made chief Ollamb, or special master of education and literature, at the reformation then inaugurated in Ireland. In or about the year 594 Dallan was killed by the pirates on the island of Iniscail (now Inishkeel, in Gweebarra Bay, County Donegal), and was buried in the church of St. Connall of Iniscail, where his memory was long held in great veneration. He is popularly connected with several churches, as with Maighin, a church in Westmeath; Kildallain, now Killadallan or Kildallan, in the diocese of Kilmore, County Cavan; Disert-Dallain; Tullach-Dallain, in the diocese of Raphoe; and Cluain-Dallain, now Clonallan, in the diocese of Dromore, County Down. He is commemorated Jan. 29.

Dallas, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1700, called and ordained to the living at Kinnell in 1703, and died Jan. 20, 1705. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 800.

Dallas, Alexander R. C., an English divine, was admitted as a gentleman commoner at Worcester College, Oxford, in 1820; in 1821 accepted the curacy of Radley; became bishop of Jamaica in 1824; was appointed chaplain to the Rev. Dr. Sumner in 1826; entered upon the ministry at Wiston in 1828, where he continued about forty years, and died Dec. 12, 1869. Mr. Dallas was a powerful advocate of the missionary cause, and a great champion of anti-Catholicism in Ireland. He was the author of, A Voice from Heaven to Ireland:—Practical Sermons on the Lord's Prayer:—Pastoral Superintendence, its Motive, Detail, and Support:—Curates' Offering:—Village Sermons:—Miracles of Christ:—Parables of Christ:—Progress and Prospects of Romanism:—Scriptural View of the Position of the Jews:—Cottager's Guide to the New Testament, and many other valuable works. Dallas, James, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1786; missionary at Stornoway, and schoolmaster there in 1787; schoolmaster at Kincardine in 1791; presented to the living at Contin in 1792, but his ordination delayed for a year on false charges; ordained in August, 1793, and died Sept. 18, 1825, aged seventy-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 294.

Dallas, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Tain before July 4, 1649, and continued Oct. 5, 1658. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 309.

Dallas, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was born at Budzet; admitted to the living of Ardiers before April, 1665; deprived by Act of Parliament in April, 1690; intruded in 1691, and died about 1693. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 244.

Dallaway, James, an English clergyman, was born at Bristol in 1763, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He became rector of South Stoke, in Sussex, in 1799, and vicar of Leatherhead, Surrey, in 1801. He was for some time chaplain and physician to the British embassy at the Porte, and gave much attention to antiquarian pursuits. He died in 1834. His publications include Letters of Bishop Rundell to Mrs. Sandys (1789, 2 vols.):—Constantinople, Ancient and Modern (1797):—Notices of Ancient Church Architecture in the 15th Century (1823), and other works, chiefly of antiquarian interest. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Dallewell, John, an English Baptist missionary, was born in Sunderland, Nov. 14, 1816. For a time he was a Methodist local preacher, but in 1836 united with the Scotch Baptist Church in his native town. In December, 1840, he was publicly set apart for evangelical work in Jamaica, and embarked for the field of his labor in January, 1841, but died there Oct. 11 following. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1842, p. 35. (J. C. S.)

Dallicker (De la Cour), Frederick, a German Reformed minister, was born Feb. 2, 1788. He was licensed in 1757; was pastor at Amwell, N. J., until 1770; Rockaway Valley, Alexandria, and Foxenburgh, until 1782; at Goshenhoppen, Pa., until 1784, and died at Faulkner Swamp, Jan. 5, 1799. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 382.

Dalliston, John, an English Baptist minister, was born in Bury St. Edmunds in 1815. He was early converted, and united with the Church in his native place; was ordained pastor at Sibble Hedingham, in Essex, and was drowned Aug. 30, 1843. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1844, p. 16. (J. C. S.)

Dalmacius. See DALBHACH.

Dalmahoy, James, a Scotch clergyman, was an exhorter at Cambuskenneth in 1567, when the Reformed faith came in; reader there in 1574, with four other places in charge in 1576, and continued in 1580. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 696.

Dalmasio, Lippo Scannabecchi (called Lippo dalle Madonne), an Italian painter, was born in Bologna. He was a pupil of Vitale da Bologna, and as early as 1376 far surpassed all his contemporaries. There is a picture, painted by him, of The Virgin, in the Church of San Petronio, at Bologna. He died about 1410. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Dalmata, Anton, a Croatian theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 16th century, wrote, Bekenntnis des Glaubens die Carol V., etc. (Tübingen, 1562; a translation made in collaboration with Primus, Truber, and Stephen Consul):—Novum Testamentum Croaticæ (Trau, 1562 or 1565). Dalmatia, Council of (Concilium Dalmaticum). Held in 1199, by John, chaplain to pope Innocent III, and Simon, his sub-deacon, both legates of the Roman see. In this council the Church of Dalmatia submitted itself to the authority of Rome. Twelve canons were published.

1. Enjoins that a bishop convicted of taking any fee for ordination shall be deposed forever.
4. Directs that the secrecy of confession shall be kept inviolate under pain of deposition.
8. Condemns those lay persons who present to benefices, and those of the clergy who receive them at the hands of the laymen.
10. Excommunicates husbands who forsake their wives, without waiting for the judgment of the Church.
11. Forbids the ordination of bastards, and of the sons of priests.
12. Forbids the ordination of any one as priest under thirty years of age.

The acts are subscribed by seven bishops, besides the legates and the archbishop Dominicus.—Labbe, Concil. xi. 7; Laudon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Dalmatic. Although this is described as a species of long-sleeved tunic, there are fair grounds for believing that in its original form the dalmatic, as worn by men, was a short-sleeved or sleeveless tunic, equivalent to the coloblon. This is shown by the way in which the two words are used synonymously, as in Epiphanius. Again, in the edict of Diocletian fixing the maximum price of articles throughout the Roman empire, the two words are used as equivalents. We first meet with the dalmatic as a secular dress, of a stately or luxurious character, worn by persons in high position. Thus there would necessarily be something exceptional in the use of it; and then, like other articles of Roman apparel, it became adopted by the Church as a vestment for ecclesiastics. Lampridius charges Commodus with unseemly behavior in that he appeared in the streets in a dalmatic. If at this time it had short sleeves, there would be an obvious unseemliness in a person of rank being seen abroad without an upper garment. Others, who hold that even then the dalmatic was a long-sleeved dress, refer the cause of the censure to the implied effeminacy of the wearer. The edict of Diocletian furnishes us with much interesting information as to the different varieties of this garment in use in the Roman empire at the end of the 3d century, A.D. It was made of various materials, wool, silk, linen; sometimes the ornamental stripe was present, sometimes absent. Dalmatics both for men's and women's use are mentioned. Three different qualities are given for each sex, the price varying both according to the quality and the place of manufacture. In later times the dalmatic was worn by sovereigns at their coronation and on other great occasions. See CORONATION.

The ideas, then, of dignity and stateliness were associated with the dalmatic as a secular dress. The earliest notice of its ecclesiastical use is, if the document be genuine, in the Acta Martyrii of St. Cyprian. Here, where the vesture is evidently that ordinarily used by the bishop (if, indeed, a distinction between the everyday dress of the Christian ministry and that used in divine service had yet arisen), we find first the under linen garment, over this the dalmatic, and finally the birrus or cloak. Pope Sylvester I (A.D. 335) ordered that deacons should for the future wear dalmatics instead of colobla. Whether a new vestment was introduced or the existing one modified, the result was the introduction of a long-sleeved in the place of a short-sleeved tunic. Walafid Strabo (859) says that when the priests began to use chasubles, dalmatics were permitted to the deacons, but "at that time the permission was not given to all to do what now almost all bishops and some priests think they may do; namely, wear a dalmatic under the chasuble." It is noticeable that this ordinance had special reference to deacons, and that the dalmatic was in some special way associated with the local Church of Rome. Thus, when Cæsarius, bishop of Arles, visited Rome, pope Symmachus granted him, as a special distinction, the privilege of wearing the pallium (q. v.), and to his deacons that of dalmatics, after the Roman fashion. Also Gregory the Great, in a letter to Aregius, bishop of Vapincum, accords to him and his archdeacon the sought-for privilege of wearing dalmatics. Indirect evidence pointing to the same result may be gathered from the fact of the absence of any mention of the dalmatic in the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), among the regulations as to the dress of the Christian ministry, showing that this vestment was not one then in use in Spain. The dalmatic thus being a vestment which even in the West had primarily only a local acceptance, we are prepared to find that in the East there is nothing which, strictly speaking, answers to it. The "sticharion," however, is the representative of the general type of white tunic, which, under whatever name we know it, alb, dalmatic, or tunicle, is essentially the same dress.

One or two further remarks may be made in conclusion, as to the ornamental stripes [see CLAVUS] of the dalmatic. As to the color of these, it is stated by Martini that he had met with exclusively black stripes in all ancient pictures of ecclesiastical dalmatics prior to the year 600, as in the well-known Ravenna mosaic (see above), the earliest exception being a mosaic of the date 640, in which the apostles have red stripes on their tunics. The red or purple stripes afterwards became common, and are spoken of as worn back and front; but whether this was the case with the original type of the dress may perhaps be doubted. Further, these ornamental stripes are found on the borders of the sleeves; and on the left side, in later days, was a border of fringe, for which various writers have found appropriate symbolical reasons.

Dalmatin, GEORGE, a Slavonic theologian and Orientalist, lived in the latter half of the 16th century. In 1568 he translated the Bible of Luther into his native language. The printing of this translation was entrusted to John Manlius, who established the first printing-house at Laybach, and was completed at Wittenberg in 1584. After repairing to Dresden, in order to thank the elector of Saxony for having permitted the printer to take charge of this operation, Dalmatin went to perform pastoral duties at St. Kazim, in 1585. Being exiled in 1598 by the Catholics, who called him abusively Caiale (Kobila, "the preacher"), he found an asylum at the house of the baron of Ausperg, who lodged him in a vault placed under the stables of the château, and afterwards called the Trou. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Dalmatius (or Delmatius), the name of early ecclesiastics:

1. A martyr under Maximian, commemorated on Dec. 5.

2. Censor at Antioch, commissioned by Constantine the Great to inquire into a charge brought by the Arians against Athanasius, of having murdered Arsenius. Dalmatius wrote to the archbishop to prepare his defence.

3. Monk and abbot near Constantinople, often called Dalmatus, and commemorated Aug. 3. He exerted a powerful influence at the time of the Council of Ephesus (431), against Chrysostom the chamberlain and the Nestorian party at the court of Theodosius II. His influence arose from his eminent piety, his strength of character, and his fiery zeal. Under Theodosius the Great he had served in the second company of Guards, was married, and had a family. Feeling a call to a monastic life, he left his wife and children, except a son Faustus, and went to receive instruction from the abbot Isaac, who had dwelt in the desert from his infancy. Isaac, at his death, made him Hegumenus, or superior of the monastery, under the patriarch Atticus. Consulted by councils, patriarchs, and emperors, he remained in his cell forty-eight years without quitting it. After the Nestorian party at Ephesus had deposed Cyril and Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, and imprisoned them, news of their distress reached him by secret conveyance. While he prayed he believed that he heard a great voice summoning him forth from his retreat. Accompanied by the monks of all the monasteries, with their abbots at their head, he appeared before the palace. The abbots were admitted with him to the imperial presence. The outcome was that the emperor came to a knowledge of the truth from Dalmatius, as the council acknowledged, and ordered a deputation of each party to appear before him.

4. Bishop of Cyzicum. The archbishop had nominated Proclus, but the people, according to the canons, chose the monk Dalmatius. He was present at Ephesus in 431.

5. Saint, third bishop of Rodez, from 524 to 580. He was present at the Council of Clermont in 525, at the first Council of Arvernium in 535, and at the Council of Orleans in 541. Dalmatius was once condemned to death for the faith, at Brives-la-Gaillarde. St. Anstites interceded for him with the tribune who had condemned him, but his intercession was of no avail, and Dalmatius was actually led out to execution. Anstites then prayed for him, the execution was hindered by some extraordinary atmospheric phenomena, and the condemned man lived to a good old age. He is commemorated Nov. 2.

6. Saint, a French prelate of the Benedictine order, and regular priest of Grasse or Notre Dame of Orbieu. He assisted, in 1068, at the Council of Gerona, in which four canons were passed against those who had repudiated their wives in order to espouse others, against simony, and incestuous marriages, disorders then very common. Dalmatius was elected archbishop of Narbonne in September, 1081, and presided in September, 1086, at the council held in the abbey of St. Étienne of Bagnols. He died at Rieux, Jan. 17, 1097. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dalmätus. See DALMATIUS, 3.

Dalrymple (written also Dalrumpill, etc.), the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. ANDREW, graduated at Glasgow University in 1646; was called to the living of Auchinleck in 1650; deprived by the privy council in 1662; accused of preaching and baptizing irregularly in 1669; fined half his salary for not keeping the Restoration festival in 1673, and died in June, 1676, aged fifty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 96, 139.

S.)

Dalrymple, William Miller, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Feb. 2, 1824. He was converted at the age of nineteen, began preaching in 1862, and in the following year entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored until his death, June 27, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 50.

Dalton, Jacob, an English Independent minister, was educated at Mile End by Dr. Conder, and was ordained in 1766. He was settled first at the Silver Street Church, London; at Christmas, 1769, he removed to Coventry as assistant to Patrick Simpson, and was chosen sole pastor in 1773. He gave way to drinking, and sank into obscurity. In 1772 he published a volume of fifteen Sermons. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 113.

Dalton, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1709 at Dean, Cumberland, and was educated at Lowther, Westmoreland, and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was preacher for some years. In 1750 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary, at Hill. He died at Worcester, July 21, 1763, leaving a volume of Sermons (1757):—Two Epistles (1744, 4to, written in 1735):—and some single Sermons. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Daly, DANIEL, an Irish Dominican, was born in County Kerry in 1595, and as a monk adopted the name of Dominicus a Rosario. He was educated at Tralee and in Flanders; attained considerable reputation for his great learning; was invited to Lisbon to assist in founding a monastery for the Irish Dominicans, and was elected its first superior. In 1655 he was appointed ambassador to Louis XIV of France, by the duke of Braganza, to negotiate a treaty of alliance and affinity between the two courts. He died at Lisbon, June 30, 1662. One book only of his is known, Initium, Incrementum, et Eritus Familie Giraldinorum (Lisbon, 1655, 8vo). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Dalzell, ANDREW, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in July, 1734; presented to the living of Stony-kirk; ordained in September, 1739; and died Nov. 22, 1755. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 772.

Dalzell, NINIAN, a Scotch clergyman, was the first Protestant minister at Dumfries in 1567; removed to Caerlaverock in 1574, with three other places in charge; became a schoolmaster at Dumfries; renounced the Protestant faith; corrupted the youth sent to his care; was deposed by the assembly of 1579; and died April 21, 1587. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 567, 573.

Daman, JOSEPH BROOKS, a Baptist minister, was born at Hanover, Mass., Nov. 13, 1809. Without a college education, he took the full course of study at the Newton Theological Institution (1838-41); and was pastor of churches in West Dedham, Mass., Woonsocket, R. I., East Killingly and Lyme, Conn., and Lake Village, N. H., where he died, in 1865. (J. C. S.)

Damascène, a French preacher at the close of the 18th century, was a Minorite of the Franciscan order, and provincial of the Recolets of Paris. He wrote, Discours sur les Évangiles (Paris, 1698, 1699):—Discours Ecclésiastiques et Monastiques (ibid. 1708). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Damberger, JOSEPH FERDINAND, a German scholar, was born at Passau, March 1, 1795. He studied at different universities, was made a priest in 1818, and joined the Jesuit order in 1837. In 1845 he was made professor of history at Lucerne, and died May 1, 1859, leaving Fürstentum der Europäischen Staatengeschichte, (Regensburg, 1830):—Synchronistische Geschichte der Kirche und Welt im Mittelalter (ibid. 1850-1863, 15 vols., the concluding vols. being edited by Rattigge). See Janner, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Damchuk, in Mongolian mythology, is a green horse, the steed of the god Maidari, the last Burchan, who descended to earth in order to exalt men again to their former duration of life, their virtue, and their beauty. The green horse is a great idol (Dolon Erdeni), which, with six other idols, is placed on the altars of the Mongolian temples.

Dame, FRIEDERICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Holstein, July 22, 1567. He studied at Rostock and Königsberg; was in 1592 rector at Itzehoe; in 1594, deacon at Flensburg; in 1600 pastor, and in 1604 provost there. He died Dec. 18, 1635, leaving Voluntate Dei erga Genus Humanum:—De Resurrectione Mortuorum:—Apodixis de Anima Immortalitate, etc. See Moller, Cimbria Literata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Damhnat was an Irish saint of Sliabh Betha, now Slieve Beagh, in Tyrone. She is commemorated June 13.

Damia, a goddess among the ancients, said to be the wife of Faunus. She was so chaste that she never saw nor heard any other man than her own husband. Her sacrifice, which was always offered in private houses, with windows and doors shut, was called Damium. No man, nor picture of a male, was suffered to be present, nor were women allowed to reveal what passed.

Damian (Damianus, or Damiani, Petrus), HYMNS or. Of these the following have become especially known: Gravi me terrore pulsas, vita dies ultima. "This awful hymn," says Mr. Neale, "is the dies ira of individual life. The realization of the hour of death is shown, not only by this hymn, but by the commendatory prayer, used from his (the author's) time in the Roman Church, which begins, 'To God I commend thee, beloved brother; and to him whose creature thou art I commit thee.'" In the translation of Mr. Neale the first stanza runs thus:

"O what terror in thy forethought,
Ending scene of mortal life!
Heart is sickened, veins are loosened,
Thrills each nerve, with terror rife,
When the anxious heart depleteth
All the anguish of the strife!"

Another translation, given by P. S. Worsley, in Lyra Messianica, runs thus:

"Heavily with dread thou loomest, last day of my earthly life;
Heart and melting veins within me shudder at the mortal strife,
When I would inform my spirit with what horrors thou art rife."

Another hymn is his Cruz mundi benedictio, which Mr. Neale rendered—

"O Cross, whereby the earth is blest,
Certain Redemption, Hope, and Rest,
Once as the Tree of Torture known,
Now the bright gate to Jeou's Throne."

Better known is his Ad perennis vita fontem, "the noblest he has left us," and which, in R. F. Littledale's translation in Lyra Mystica, reads thus:

"For the fount of life eternal is my thirsting spirit fain,
And my prisoned soul would gladly burst her fleshly bars in twain,
While the exile strives and struggles on to win her home again."

Damiani, Felice, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Gubbio, and flourished from 1584 till 1616. He studied under Benedetto Nucci, and painted principally for the churches in his native city. His most esteemed work is the Baptism of St. Augustine, in the church of that saint, at Gubbio, painted in 1594. Another is the Decapitation of St. Paul, in San Recavati, at Castel-Nuovo. About 1596 he decorated two chapels in the Church of the Madonna de Lumi, at San Severino, with scenes from the life of the Virgin and the infancy of Christ. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Damiani, Johann, a Hungarian theologian, was born at Tubegly, June 21, 1710. In 1726 he went to Rome, studied at Fermo under the auspices of pope Benedict XIII., and on March 5, 1735, he entered orders. Returning to Rome, he was welcomed by pope Clement XII., who proposed him for the canonship of Presburg. He occupied various other positions in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and died about 1780. His principal works are: Doctrina vera Christi Ecclesie (Ofen, 1762);—Jeou Religiosis Couctio, etc. (ibid. 1765). This was a treatise concerning means for bringing dissenters into the Roman Church. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Damiani, Wilhelm Friederich, a Hungarian theologian, brother of the foregoing, was born Jan. 18, 1714. After having studied at Fermo he was chosen by Clement XII for primate of the kingdom. He died at Presburg, June 17, 1760, leaving Synopsis vita Missionis Miraculorum et Evangeliorum Martini Lutheri et Joannis Calvini (Ofen, 1761);—Synopsis Doctrinae Martini Lutheri et Joannis Calvini (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Damiānus, the name of several early Christians:

1. A missionary sent by pope Eleutherius to Britain.
2. Bishop of Sidon, was a member of the synod at Antioch in 444, and also of the Council of Chalcedon in 451, when he gave his vote for the deposition of Dioscorus.

3. A companion of St. Regulus. One of the churches of St. Andrews was dedicated to him. He is commemorated June 1.

4. Fifth bishop of Rochester, was consecrated by archbishop Deusdedit about 655.

5. Saint, bishop of Ticinum (now Pavia), where he was born; and, while a presbyter, attended the synod held by Mansuetus, archbishop of Milan, against the Monothelites, in 679. He was deputed by the synod to draw up an exposition of faith to be sent to the emperor, which was received by acclamation in the Council of Constantinople in 680. He succeeded Anastasius the latter year as bishop, and died in 710.

Damini, Pietro, an Italian historical painter, was born at Castel-Franco in 1592, and studied under Giovanni Battista Novelli. There are many of his works in Castel-Franco, Vicenza, Crema, and Padua. In the church of Il Santo, at Padua, is his principal work, The Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John. In the monastery of the Padri Serviti, at Vicenza, are several of his works, representing scenes from the life of St. Filippo. He died at Venice in 1681. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Damiron, Jean Philibert, a French philosopher, was born in 1794, at Belleville. He was professor of philosophy at Paris, and died in 1862, leaving, Cours de Philosophie (Paris, 1842);—Essais sur l'Histoire de la Philosophie en France au Dix-septième Siècle (1846, 2 vols.);—also Au Dix-huitième Siècle (1862, 2 vols.);—and Au Dix-neuvième Siècle (3d ed. 1884). See Franck, Moralistes et Philosophes (Paris, 1872); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses. (B. P.)

Damm, Christian Tobias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Geithain, in Saxony, Jan. 9, 1699. He studied at Halle, where he also for some time acted as teacher at the orphanage. In 1780 he was called to Berlin as con-rector at the Königlische gymnasium, was made in 1742 pro-rector, and finally rector. He died May 27, 1778, having published, Brief des Apostel Jacobi, übersetzt mit Anmerkungen (Berlin, 1747);—Das Neue Testament von neuem übersetzt und mit Anmerkungen begleitet (ibid. 1764, 1765, 3 vols.); a work which caused his deposition from office, because he therein advocated Socinian doctrines;—Vom historischen Glauben (ibid. 1772);—Betrachtungen über die Religion (ibid. 1778). See Meusel, Gelehrtes Deutschland; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 171. (B. P.)

Damm, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Rostock in 1633. In 1663 he was deacon at St. Mary's, in that city; in 1667, pastor of the Altstadt, in Königsberg, and member of consistory, the same year taking his degree as doctor of theology at Greifswalde. He died May 11, 1679. He wrote, De die Omnium Primæ;—De Ritu Baptizandi super Sepulchra;—De Officio Pastoralis Elenchtico ex Joh. xvi. 8. See Arnold, Historie der Königsbergischen Universität; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

was born in 1781. He graduated from Harvard College in 1811; was settled at Lunenburg in 1815, and died in 1843. He published one or two Sermons, and an Address on Temperance, delivered at Amesbury, Mass., in 1829. (J. C. S.)

Dampierre, Antoine Esmonin de, a French ascetic writer, was born at Beaune in January, 1748. He was successively counsellor and president à mortier at the parliament of Burgundy, president of the chamber in the royal court of Dijon, 1811, and member of the general council of the Cote d'Or, 1817. He died Sept. 11, 1824, leaving, Verités Divines pour le Cœur et l'Esprit (Lausanne, 1823):—Historique de la Révolution (Dijon, 1824). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Da Mula. See AMULIO.

Damýsus, in Greek mythology, was the swiftest of the giants, whose body was employed by the centaur Chiron, in order to strengthen that of Achilles.

Dan, Thomas, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Nutfield, Surrey, in 1704, and became a preacher in 1734. The field of his labors was chiefly in England. He died Feb. 23, 1769. See Piety Promoted, ii, 433. (J. C. S.)

Dana (a gift), the term used by Buddhists of Ceylon to denote alms. Alms given to priests are restricted to four articles only—robes, food, a pallet to lie upon, and medicine or sick diet. Almsgiving is the first of virtues among the Buddhists, and superior to the observance of all the precepts. It brings a greatly increased reward in a future birth, including, if the duty be properly discharged, both wealth and attendants.

Dana, Asa J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Pultneyville, Ontario County, N. Y., March 24, 1820. He was converted in his twelfth year; received license to exhort in 1838, to preach in 1839, and the same year united with the Oneida Conference, wherein he labored zealously till his death, Oct. 5, 1857. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 88.

Dana, Charles B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, for many years, of Christ Church, Fairfax Parish, Alexandria, Va., and remained in that office until 1860, when, after residing for a short time without charge in that place, he removed to Port Gibson, Miss., as rector of St. James's Church. In 1866 he went to Natchez, as rector of Trinity Church, of which he was incumbent at the time of his death, Feb. 25, 1873, aged sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 138.

Dana, Gideon, a Congregational minister, was born at Oxford, Mass., Sept. 11, 1805. In 1830 he graduated from Brown University, and in 1836 from Bangor Theological Seminary—although part of his professional studies were pursued at Princeton, N. J. For a time he preached at North Falmouth, Mass.; Jan. 3, 1838, he was ordained pastor at South Amherst, where he remained until 1840. Subsequently, for four years, he labored in Holyoke, and was one year in the service of the American Tract Society. He preached in Harnar, O., from 1845 to 1850; spent several months in the service of the Western Seamen's Friend Society, and then took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church at Delaware. He removed to Strongsville in June, 1852, and in November, 1855, to Oberlin, as agent for the American and Foreign Christian Union. From 1859 to 1861 he served the Church in Bucyrus; in June, 1863, removed to Wauseon, but in 1868 returned to Oberlin, where he died, May 9, 1872. See Cong. Quarterly, 1873, p. 328.

Dana, James, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., in 1735. He graduated from Harvard College in 1753, and remained there as a resident-graduate several years. In 1758 he was ordained pastor at Wallingford, Conn., notwithstanding the opposition of the Consociation on doctrinal grounds, and a church quarrel ensued, which was not healed until about 1772. When the Revolutionary struggle began, Mr. Dana became very popular on account of his decided stand for American liberty. Rev. James Noyes became his colleague in May, 1785. Four years after, Dr. Dana was called to the pastoral charge of the First Church in New Haven, and retired in December, 1805. He died in New Haven, Aug. 18, 1812. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 565.

Dana, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Pomfret, Conn., Nov. 2, 1742. He graduated at Yale College in 1760; was ordained over the South Church in Ipswich, Mass., in 1765, and continued pastor there until his death, Nov. 16, 1827. Dr. Dana published several Sermons and Addresses. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 597; Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 42.

Dana, Simeon, M.D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Lebanon, N. H., December, 1876. After practicing medicine some years, he began preaching in New Hampshire, and divided his time between his own church, that in Holderness, and that in North Holderness. He died Sept. 28, 1853. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1855, p. 89. (J. C. S.)

Dana, William Coomba, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newburyport, Mass., Feb. 13, 1810. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1828; was then employed in teaching, became a student in Andover Theological Seminary, and also in Columbia Seminary; was licensed, and spent a part of a year in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained Feb. 14, 1836, pastor of Central Church, Charleston, S. C.; and died there, Nov. 30, 1890. He published a translation of Fénelon on the Education of Daughters (1831):—A Transatlantic Tour (1845):—The Life of the Rev. Daniel Dana, his father (1860); and compiled a volume of Hymns. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 98.

Danace, a name given to the obolus, or coin which the ancient Greeks were wont to place in the mouth of the dead, to pay Charon for carrying them in his boat across the Styx to Hades.

Danavandri, in Indian mythology, is the god of the healing art, a special incarnation of Vishnu. There are no separate temples built for him (pagodas), but his image, a statue representing an old, bearded man, reading in a book, is erected on Vishnu's altar. He was produced when the gods turned the Mandar mountain into the sea of milk, to prepare amrita. Then he came out from the sea with a vessel which contained this ambrosia.

Danavas, in Hindû mythology, a numerous train of evil spirits, who often caused destructive wars, and were in continual discord with the kingdom of Indra. Twice Vishnu delivered his sovereign from the control of the demons, and Ithumanta also once came to his assistance.

Danax, the reader, of Aulon in Illyria, fled with the sacred vessels from a rustic riot against the Christians to a place by the sea, five miles from the town, but his enemies pursued him, let themselves down to him by ropes, bade him sacrifice to Bacchus, and, as he would not, cut him down with their swords and cast him into the sea, Jan. 16 (year not specified).

Dance, Matthew Mark, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Dinwiddie County, Va., Jan. 29, 1790. He was converted about 1807; spent the next five years in teaching and study; entered the Virginia Conference in 1812, and was appointed to the Bertie Circuit; in 1814 became private secretary to Bishop Asbury; located in 1822, settled in Prince Edward County, and died there, March 8, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 789.

Dance of Death is a series of pictures in which Death, portrayed as a skeleton, is the principal figure, and represents all the animation of a living person, sometimes amusingly ludicrous, and at others mischievous, but always busily employed. It is interesting, as it exhibits the costumes of all ranks and conditions of life at the period. Hans Holbein painted a dance of death in the royal galleries at Whitehall. There was also a fine example in the cloisters of the chantry chapel of St. Anne, called the Parlon Church House, on the north side of St. Paul's, in London, which dated from the reign of Henry V; and others were painted in the cloisters of the Holy Innocents at Paris, at Baile and Lubeck in the 15th century, at Minden in the 14th century; and at Dresden, Leipsic, and Annaberg. In the 14th century it is alluded to in the "Vision of Piers Plowman," and has been said to have been acted as a spiritual masque by clerks. Prior speaks of "imperial death leading up Holbein's dance." Possibly it was a memorial of a fatal plague as well as a moral lesson.

It was known also under the title of the Dance Macabre, either from an imaginary poet of Germany called Macabar, who was said to have written the appropriate distichs placed under each set of figures, or more probably from the hermit saint of Egypt, Macarius, who is still portrayed on pictures in Greek monasteries, as he was frequently introduced. The English name was Dance of Poult's (St. Paul's).

Dancel, JEAN CHARLES RICHARD, a French prelate and theologian, was born in 1761 at Cherbourg. He went to Paris; entered the society called the Robertines; was admitted to the Sorbonne as socius; obtained a chair of philosophy; in 1792 went to England, and there taught mathematics; returned to France in 1801, after the concordat; entered the chapter of Coutances; became grand-vicar, then rector of Valognes and archdeacon in 1805. Oct. 28, 1827, he was consecrated bishop of Bayeux, and distinguished himself by his zeal for the extension of seminaries. He died April 20, 1836, leaving Apologie du Serment Cirique (1790). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dankwerts, HERMANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 4, 1814, at Plate. He studied at Göttingen; was in 1843 pastor at Bienenbüttel; in 1855, superintendent at Börby; in 1860, pastor at Göttingen, and finally superintendent there. He died July 26, 1881. He was an excellent preacher, who led many in the way of righteousness. (B. P.)

Dandam, in Hindû mythology, is a staff with seven ash knots, which the Sanjasi, or Indian saints, carry, and whose knots they must daily moisten with water from the Ganges, whereby they are protected against all influences of evil dæmons.

Dandavatren, in Hindû mythology, is a new birth and the third incarnation of the giant-dæmon Eruniassabien, one of the two Daidyas. He was subdued and slain by Vishnu, according to the Avatara.

Dandesuren, in Hindû mythology, was a holy penitent and favorite of Siva, who commanded the same worship to be paid to this saint as is given to the god himself. Therefore Dandesuren's statue stands in the temple of Siva, side by side with that of the great destroyer.

Dandini, Cesare, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1595, and studied successively with Curradi, Passignano, and Cristofano Allori. He executed many pictures and altar-pieces for the churches and convents at Florence. He died in 1658. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Dandini, Ottaviano, an Italian painter of the middle of the 18th century, was the son of Pietro, by whom he was instructed. There are several of his works in the convents and churches at Florence, highly praised. There are some paintings of sacred subjects by him, in the Church of San Lorenzo; also in the Church of Santa Maddalena, at Pescia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Dandini, Pietro, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1646, and received instruction in the art when but four years of age, from Valerio Spada. He afterwards travelled through Italy, studying the best masters, and at the same time executed a number of paintings for the churches and convents of Florence. One of his most important works was the cupola in the church of Santa Maria Maddalena. In the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore is his picture of St. Francisco. He died in 1712. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Dandis, one of the Vaishnava (q. v.) sects among the Hindûs, and a legitimate representative of the fourth Asrama or mendicant life, into which the Hindû is believed to enter after passing the previous stages of student, householder, and hermit. A Brahmin, however, does not require to pass through the previous stages, but is allowed to enter at once into the fourth order. The Dandi is distinguished by carrying a small dand or wand, with several projections from it, and a piece of cloth dyed with red ochre, in which the Brahminical cord is supposed to be enshrined, attached to it; he shaves his hair and beard, wears only a loin-cloth, and subsists upon food obtained ready dressed from the houses of the Brahmins once a day only, which he deposits in the small clay pot that he always carries with him. They are generally found in cities, collected, like other mendicants, in mithas.

Dandolo, FAUSTINO, a Venetian theologian, was born about 1379. He was successively apostolic protonotary, legate a latere, and governor of Bologna; and died in 1449, leaving Compendium pro Catholicis Fidei Instructione. There has also been attributed to him Tractatus de Beneficiis; Responsa Quædam Juridica. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dandy, JAMES H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland, Sept. 8, 1798. He entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1826, and, by subsequent changes in the conference lines, was a member, first of the New Jersey, and afterwards of the Newark Conference. From 1857 to 1873 he sustained a supernumerary relation, and in the latter year was superannuated. He died in 1882 or 1883. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 84.

Dane, Francis (1), a Congregational minister, was partly educated in England, and completed his theological studies in America. About 1648 he became pastor in Andover, Mass. In March, 1682, the Rev. Thomas Barnard became his assistant. During the witchcraft frenzy in 1692, it is said that intimations of Mr. Dane's implication served somewhat to check the delusion, as it was not believed that so pious a man could be in league with the devil. He died Feb. 17, 1699, aged eighty-one years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 198.

Dane, Francis (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Andover, Mass., May 1, 1782. He was converted in early life, and in 1810 joined the New England Conference, wherein he preached until 1840, when he superannuated. He was afterwards twice honored by being elected to the Massachusetts State Legislature. He died Oct. 16, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 42.

Dane, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1800; was ordained pastor of the Church in Pittston, Me., Feb. 16, 1803, and was dismissed on account of gross immoralities in 1804. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 379.

Danedi, Giovanni Stefano (called Montalto), a Milanese painter, was born at Treviglio in 1608, and studied under Cavaliere Morazzone. He executed many works in the churches and convents of Milan, among them The Martyrdom of St. Justus, in the Church of Santa Maria Pedone. He died at Milau in 1689.

Danedi, Giuseppe, an Italian painter, brother of the foregoing, was born at Treviglio in 1618, and studied under Guido Reni, at Bologna. He went to Turin, and executed some admirable pictures for the churches of that city, among them the fine altar-piece representing The Massacre of the Innocents. He died in 1688.

Danès, Pierre, a French scholar and bishop, was born at Paris in 1497. When quite young, he entered the College of Navarre, where he was appointed first professor of Greek in 1530. In 1545 he was present at the Council of Trent, and his address, which he delivered there in the following year, was printed at the instance of Francis I. When Henry II ascended the throne, he appointed Danès, in 1547, as tutor to the dauphin, afterwards Francis II. In 1548 he was elected to the see of Lavaur, and died at St. Germain des Prés, April 23, 1577. He wrote a number of historical works and addresses. See Abregé de la Vie du Cel. Pierre Danès (Paris, 1781); Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Danès, Pierre Louisa, a Flemish theologian, was born at Cassel, Flanders, in 1684. He taught philosophy at Louvain, was rector of St. James's at Antwerp in 1714, graduate-canon at Ypres in 1717, then president of the episcopal seminary, and penitentiary. In 1732 he returned to Louvain, and succeeded to Daelman in the chair of philosophy. He died at Louvain, May 28, 1736, leaving Institutiones Doctrinæ Christianæ (Louvain, 1713 and 1768); this is an abridgment of an excellent theological work:—Orationes et Homiliae (ibid. 1735):—De Fide, Spe et Charitate (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Danforth, A. H., a Baptist minister, was born in 1818. Immediately upon completing his educational course at Hamilton in 1847, he went as missionary to Assam, India, but after eleven years labor there, ill-health obliged him to return, and he settled with the Baptist Church at Milestown, Pa., where he labored as pastor three years, and where, after serving the Christian Commission some time in the Army of the Potomac, he died Feb. 18, 1864. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1865, p. 633.

Danforth, Francis, a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1794. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1819, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1822; was ordained June 11, 1823; pastor at Greenfield, where he remained until 1831; at Winchester until 1839; of the First Church of Hadley, Mass., until 1842; was without charge until 1844; was at Byron and Medina, N. Y., in 1845; stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Clarence from 1846 to 1852, and thereafter without charge at the same place until his death, Jan. 29, 1854. See Trin. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 50.

Danforth, John, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Samuel Danforth, Sr., was born Nov. 5, 1660. He graduated at Harvard College in 1677; was ordained the seventh minister of the Church in Dorchester, June 28, 1682, and occupied that position until his death, May 26, 1730. He left several published discourses, among them two Sermons on the Earthquake in 1727. (J. C. S.)

Danforth, R. Edmund, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Merrimac, N. H. He was converted in 1854; received license to exhort and to preach in 1855; and in 1856 entered the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H., where he remained two years, meantime joining the New Hampshire Conference, in which he labored till his death, June 28, 1863. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 75.

Danforth, William Burke, a Congregational minister, was born at Barnard, Vt., Feb. 21, 1849. He studied at Royalton Academy, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1871, and from Yale Divinity School in 1874; was ordained pastor of the Church in Gilead, Conn., July 9 of the same year, and died there July 4, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 423.

Dangerfield, Joan, an English martyr, was the wife of the godly William Dangerfield, and on account of her faithfulness to her religion she was taken from her home, with a child only fourteen days old, and cast into prison amid thieves and murderers. She remained there for some weeks, when she was taken to the place of execution and burned, with three other martyrs, in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 251.

Dangerfield, William, an English martyr, was a citizen of Wootton-under-Edge, not far from Bristol. He was suspected by some of his adversaries, and put into prison, where he remained until his legs were almost fretted off with irons. After much suffering he recanted, against the advice of his wife, who was a prisoner at the same time; he had no sooner quitted the jail, than, his conscience upbraiding him, he began to pray for forgiveness, for which he was soon put to the stake and burned, in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 251.

Dani, Eldad ha-. See ELDAH HAD-DANI.

Danicic, Georg, a famous Servian linguist, was born at Neusatz, April 4, 1825. In 1856 he was appointed librarian at Belgrade, in 1859 professor at the lyceum there, and in 1853 professor of Slavic philology at the college. In 1867 he went to Agram, where he was made secretary of the academy. In 1873 he was recalled to Belgrade, but in 1877 he went again to Agram to continue his large Serbo-Croatian dictionary, which was published by the academy. He died Nov. 17, 1882. His chief work lies in his linguistic publications concerning the Servian language, but he also holds an honorable position on account of his excellent translation of the Old Testament into the Servian language. (B. P.)

Daniel (sometimes Danifel) was the name of a number of early bishops and presbyters:

1. Presbyter, said to have been martyred in Persia, Feb. 21, in the thirty-fifth year of Sapor (A.D. 344), with a virgin, whose name in Chaklee meant Rose, after five days' torture and three months' interrogation, according to brief acts given from a Vatican MS. by Assemani (Mart. Orient. p. 103.)

2. One of the abbots of Scetè in Egypt, in the 4th or 5th century. He was a disciple of Paphnutius, and served him in the capacity of deacon at the altar. He is the speaker in the fourth of the Collations of Johannes Cassianus, who had met him during a tour in Egypt.

3. A disciple of the solitary Arsenius, about 445, who performed for him the duties of hospitality to strangers arriving at his cell.

4. Bishop at a council assembled by Cyril at Alexandria about A.D. 430, for the condemnation of Nestorius. He was one of the four bishops selected to carry to Constantinople the letter written by Cyril in the name of this council, together with the letter of pope Celestine in the name of a Roman council on the same subject.

5. A presbyter at Alexandria, sent in A.D. 438 to Acacius, bishop of Meletina, Theodotus of Ancyra, and Firmus of Caesarea, with a credential letter by Cyril of Alexandria, to show them the situation of affairs and the reply he proposed to send to the Oriental bishops at Antioch.

6. Bishop of Charræ (Haran) in Mesopotamia, in the middle of the 5th century. He was the nephew of the celebrated Nestorian, Ibas, bishop of Edessa, who consecrated him. He voted against Athanasius in the council held at Antioch in 444. Charges were preferred against him by a synod held at Berytus, and his disorderly and licentious life being proven, he was anathematized by Dioscorus at the Latrocinium of Ephesus.

7. See DEINOL WYN.

8. A deacon mentioned in the will of St. Perpetuus, archbishop of Tours. He lived about the end of the 5th century.

9. Bishop of Theodosiopolis (or Rhæsina) in Mesopotamia, in the middle of the 6th century. He wrote works against the errors of "the Marcionites, Manichees, Chaldeans, and astrologers."

10. Abbot of the monastery afterwards known as St. Médard's, at Soissons. The monastery was founded by Clotaire I of the Franks about 560, and at its dedication, in 562, Daniel became its first abbot. He is said to have been a disciple of St. Maurus of Glaufeulle, and to have obtained the privilege of immunity from pope John III.

11. Saint and bishop of Cenn-Garadh (now Kintgarth, on the island of Bute, in the Firth of Clyde). He is commemorated Feb. 18.

12. A monk of the 7th century, who wrote at the monastery of Khaitu the Life of John Climacus, abbot of Mount Sinai (605).

13. Bishop of Salach, in Mesopotamia. He lived in the 8th century, and wrote a Commentary on the Pauline.

14. Succeeded Aribertus as fifteenth archbishop of Narbonne. He was one of twelve Gallic bishops present at the Roman council held in the Lateran basilica under pope Stephen IV, A.D. 769, concerning the election of the pope and the cultus of sacred images. The principal event recorded of his episcopate was his holding a synod in the basilica of Sts. Justus and Pastor at Narbonne, on June 27, 788 (Baluze, Petrus de Marca), or 791 (Gall. Christ.), attended by the bishops of the provinces of Narbonne and Tarragona, which were then united, and by those of the neighboring provinces of Arles, Vienne, Aix, and Emase. Three subjects were discussed. (1) The heresy taught by Felix, bishop of Urgel, concerning the adoption of the Son of God, and this was in all probability condemned, though there is no distinct information on that point. (2) The state of the church of Ausona (Vich), the capital of the province of Tarragona, which had formerly lost its episcopal see through the invasion of the Moors, and been ecclesiastically annexed to Narbonne. It was decided that it should remain in this subjection until the pagans were expelled, after which it should have a bishop of its own. (3) A dispute with Winedurus, bishop of Elze, as to jurisdiction over the Pagus Redensis, in the Pyrenees, and this was decided in Daniel's favor. The exact date of his death is not known, although Nebrissus succeeded him.

Daniel, Saint, OF AFRICA, was provincial of the order of Minorites of Calabria. In 1221 he embarked for Africa, at the head of a mission composed of brothers Samuel, Angelus, Donno, Ugolino, Leo, and Nicolas, for the purpose of laboring for the conversion of the Moors. They landed at Ceuta and commenced preaching. The people seized them, and led them to Mohammed the Green, king of Morocco; this prince despoiled them, scourged them, threw them into prison, and finally beheaded them, Oct. 8, 1221. They suffered martyrdom with joy and courage. Some years after, the child-prince of Portugal, son of king Alfonso the Fat, obtained their bodies of the king of Morocco, and presented them to Spain. In 1516, pope Leo X added them to the number of saints. Their festival is celebrated Oct. 13. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daniel DE SAINT JOSEPH (properly Joseph le Gouverneur), a French theologian, was born at St. Malo in 1601. He entered the novitiate of the Carmelites of Rennes at the age of fifteen, and nine years afterwards taught philosophy at Caen, and subsequently theology, with great repute. He became provincial of his order in the province of Toulouse, and died at Guillo, Feb. 5, 1666, leaving Vie de Saint André Corsin (Rennes, 1630):—Manuel de la Confrérie de la Sainte Famille de Jésus (Angers, 1640):—Le Théologien Français sur le Mystère de la Sainte Trinité (1643, 1658):—Panegyriques (1660). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daniel DE SAINT-SEVERE, a French theologian, who lived in 1625, was a Capuchin of the province of Guienne. He taught theology, was possessed of a good memory, and was versed in nearly all the languages. He wrote, De Decensu Christi ad Inferos (Lyons, 1618, in Latin and French):—De Collatione et Disputatione cum Nomansensibus et Septimanis Factionis Calvinianae (Avignon, 1625). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daniel DE LA VIERGE (properly Audenarde), a Belgian theologian, was born at Hamme, near Dendermonde, Flanders, in 1615. He obtained his education at the house of the Carmelites, whom he joined in 1632. He was successively lecturer on theology, master of novices, prior of the convents of Brussels and Malines, and twice provincial. He distinguished himself by his piety and charity, and died Oct. 24, 1678, leaving a large number of works, among which we notice, The Art of Confession (Brussels, 1649, in Flemish):—Demonstration of the True Church (ibid. eod., in Flemish):—Epitome Vitæ Sancti Petri Thomæ, etc. (Antwerp, 1659):—Vita Sancti Eliæ Prophætæ (Frankfort, 1670). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daniel, FESTIVAL OF, a festival celebrated by the Greek Church on Dec. 17, in memory of the prophet Daniel, and the three young Hebrews who were cast into the fiery furnace.

Daniel, Ebenezer, an English Baptist minister, was born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, Oct. 14, 1784. He was converted when a child, and baptized at the age of seventeen. He became a student in Bristol College in 1802; was ordained, in 1808, as pastor at Brixham, Devonshire; in 1812 removed to Luton, Bedfordshire; was designated as a missionary to Ceylon, Feb. 17, 1830; reached his station Aug. 14 following, and labored until his death, June 2, 1844. See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, 1846, p. 137, 201. (J. C. S.)

Daniel, Elizabeth, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Salem, N. J., in 1709, and early in life was called into both the Church and the ministry. She sometimes travelled in sections of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and died Oct. 30, 1760. See Piety Promoted, iv, 416-418. (J. C. S.)

Daniel, Gabriel, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Rouen in 1649. When eighteen years of age he joined the Jesuits. After he had taught for some years in the college at Rouen with great success, his superiors sent him to Paris as librarian of the "domus professus" of his society, where he died in 1728. His most important work is L'Histoire de France (Paris, 1713, also 1755-60, 3 vols.), against which Mezerai wrote his Observations Critiques:—also Recueil de Divers Ouvrages Philosophiques, Théologiques, Apologétiques et Critiques (ibid. 1724, 3 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v. (B. P.)

Daniel, Herbert, an English Congregational minister, was born near Pontypool, March 30, 1801. He was converted at the age of eighteen; received his ministerial training at Pontypool and at Abergavenny; and was ordained pastor at Maesycwmwr in 1832. In 1837 he formed a church in Pontypool, and in 1841 another in Cefnycyrib. He died Oct. 26, 1874. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 320.

Daniel, Hermann Adalbert, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Köthen, Nov. 18, 1812. He studied at Halle; was in 1843 assistant tutor at the school there; in 1844, inspector adjunctus, with the title of professor; and died at Leipzig, Sept. 13, 1871. He published, Commentationis de Tutsiano Apologeti Specimen (Halle, 1835);—Tutsianus als Apologet (ibid. 1837);—Hymnologischer Blütenstrauss (ibid. 1840);—Theologische Controversen (ibid. 1843). But his main works, which have made his name known beyond the limits of his own country, are, Codex Liturgicus Ecclesiæ Universæ (Leipzig, 1847–55, 4 vols.; vol. i, Codex Liturgicus Ecclesiæ Romano-Catholicæ, 1847; vol. ii, Cod. Lit. Ecclesiæ Lutherana, 1848; vol. iii, Cod. Lit. Ecclesiæ Reformatae atque Anglicanæ, 1851; vol. iv, Cod. Lit. Ecclesiæ Orientalis, 1855);—Thesaurus Hymnologicus (Halle, 1841–46, 5 vols.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 258. (B. P.)

Daniel, James Taylor, a minister of the Bible Christians, was born in Devon, England, March 5, 1838. He was converted when twenty years of age; for two years labored with great acceptability and usefulness as a local preacher on the Holsworthly Circuit, and in 1864 entered the itinerant ministry. After thirteen years of successful labor, he died suddenly, May 2, 1877. See Minutes of the Conference, 1877.

Daniel, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1807, of Quaker parents. He was converted in early youth, licensed to preach in 1828, and in 1832 joined the Indiana Conference, in which he rendered effective service until 1852, when he was transferred to the California Conference. He at length became superannuated, and died Oct. 19, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 316.

Daniel, Mark, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted in early life, began to preach in 1794, and died Feb. 21, 1821, aged fifty-five years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1821.

Daniel, Robert, a Bible Christian minister, was born in the parish of St. Austell, Cornwall, England. He was converted in 1824, and entered the ministry in 1833. His health failed in 1838, and he died Dec. 11, 1839.

Daniel, Robert T., a Baptist minister, was born in Middlesex County, Va., June 10, 1773. He removed to North Carolina; in 1802 united with the Church at Holly Springs, Wake Co., and was ordained in 1803. He labored as an itinerant evangelist in different parts of North Carolina, Virginia, Mississippi, and Tennessee; and died in Paris, Tenn., Sept. 14, 1840. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 306. (J. C. S.)

Daniel, Walter (Lat. Guollerus), a Cistercian of England, who died about the year 1170, is the author of, De Conceptione B. Mariæ;—De Virginitate Ejusdem;—Expositio Super—"Missus est Angelus";—De Onere Jumentorum Austri Ecu. xxx, 6, in two books. See l'itæus, De Scriptoribus Angliæ; De Visch, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Ordinis Cisterciensis; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Daniels, Amos, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., in 1787. He was converted in August, 1806, and joined the Methodists, among whom he was a preacher for about eight years; but afterwards united with a Free-will Baptist Church, and was ordained in 1822. He labored much among the feeble churches, and for twenty-five years was the pastor of the Virgil and Dryden Church, N. Y. He died at his residence in Vestal, April 29, 1873. See Morning Star, Dec. 24, 1873. (J. C. S.)

Daniels, Edmund, an English Congregational minister, was born at Waltham, near Canterbury, in 1837. He early united with the Wesleyan Methodists, and, before reaching his sixteenth year, was an acceptable lay preacher. After studying at Didsbury College, he was appointed to Hereford, Cornwall, and Norfolk.

In 1866 he joined the Congregationalists, and labored at Tyldesley, Hollingworth, and Bolton. In 1874 he removed to Felling, near Gateshead, and finally to Byker, where he died, April 26, 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 308.

Daniels, Henry, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Ecclesfield, near Sheffield, in 1802. He was converted in early life; commenced his ministry in 1828; spent thirty-seven years of toil, almost entirely in the counties of Devon and Cornwall; and died at St. Austell, Nov. 8, 1869. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1870, p. 21.

Daniels, John H., a Baptist minister, was born in Caroline County, Va., Jan. 15, 1811. He was converted in 1832, ordained in 1833, and preached in Kentucky about three years; in 1836 settled in Cass County, Ill., and preached for the churches of Princeton, Richland, Sangamon Bottom, and other places; thence removed to Bath, Mason Co., where he preached until his death, May 20, 1881. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversaries, 1881, p. 25. (J. C. S.)

Danish Version of the Scriptures. See SCANDINAVIAN VERSIONS.

Danker, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Bremen, Germany, in 1794. He was converted in 1824; immediately became an earnest exhorter, for which he was severely persecuted; labored some years as a city missionary with marked success; came to America in 1836, and settled in Marietta, O., where for some time he preached with large success for the Lutheran Church. About three years later he united with the Cincinnati Conference, and in it continued faithful and laborious until 1859, when he became superannuated, and retired to Marietta, where he died, March 4, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 166.

Danley, Leroy C., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, entered the Kentucky Conference in 1840; travelled circuits until 1849, when he located; was readmitted in 1855; became supernumerary in 1859, superannuated in 1860, and died July 27, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 861.

Dann, Christian Adam, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Tübingen, Dec. 24, 1758, where he also prepared himself for the ministry. In 1793 he was appointed deacon at Göppingen; in 1794, assistant at Stuttgart; in 1819, pastor at Mössingen; and in 1824 again at Stuttgart, as archdeacon at the Stiftskirche. In 1825 he became pastor at St. Leonhard, and died March 19, 1837. His writings, mostly ascetical brochures, are enumerated in Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 258–260. See also Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 257, 332, 867, 374; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Hofacker, Denkmal der Liebe (Stuttgart, 1837); Albert Knapp, in his Christotopie (1847); M. A. Knapp, Sechs Lebensbilder (1875). Dannah. For this place Lieut. Conder at first strongly advocated the modern Domeh [see DUMAH], two miles north of ed-Dhoheriyeh (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Soc." Jan. 1875, p. 55); but he has since more plausibly suggested (Bible Hand-book, p. 408; Tent-work, ii, 336) Idhnah, which, however, is north-west instead of south-west from Hebron. See JEDNA.

Dannecker, Anton von, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1816 in Rathshausen. In 1841 he was made priest, in 1845 chaplain, and in 1849 pastor at Stuttgart. In 1860 he became a member of the Rottenburg chapter, which he also represented from 1868 to 1876 in the house of representatives at Würtemberg. In 1856 and 1857 he acted as theological counsellor to the Würtemberg ambassador at Rome, and died while capillary and papal prelate at Rottenburg, June 6, 1881. (B. P.)

Dannell, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died while member of consistory and pastor of St. Egidius at Quedlinburg, Feb. 10, 1772, is the author of Kräftige Trostgründe der Religion wider die Schrecken des Todes (Helmstädt, 1749):—Der Gottseher, die Auferstehung, und das Gericht (Quedlinburg, 1760). See Hamberger, Gelehrtes Deutschland; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Dannelly, JAMES, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Columbia County, Ga., Feb. 4, 1786. He was converted at the age of thirty, and in 1818 received license to preach and was admitted into the South Carolina Conference, in which he labored faithfully, with but two years' intermission as superannuate, until 1838, when he again became superannuated. He died April 28, 1855. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 627; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 606.

Dannemayr, MATTHIAS, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 13, 1741, at Oepfingen, in Württemberg. He studied at Freiburg, and was appointed in 1773 professor of church history there. In 1786 he was called to Vienna, but exchanged his position for that of a custos in the university library, on account of feeble health, in 1803. He died July 8, 1805, leaving Introductio in Historiam Ecclesiæ Christianæ Universæ (Friburgi, 1778):—Historia Succincta Controversiarum de Librorum Symbolicorum Auctoritate inter Lutheranos Agitata (ibid. 1780):—*Institutiones Eccles. He studied at Douay, taught in various schools of France, and died Nov. 3, 1746. He edited an improved edition of Duncange's Glossary in 1736; assisted Clemencet in the great work L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, and wrote a Traduction des Psaumes (Paris, 1739, 1740). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Danukobi, in Hindû mythology, is a celebrated pool, or bath, which Vishnu dug for himself and Siva. It lies near Pondicherry, on the peninsula this side of the Ganges, near a large temple of Siva. The spot is sacred for another reason. It was the place where the ape-king Hanuman met Rama, when they both undertook the journey to Ceylon. This bath is visited by innumerable parties of pilgrims; whoever bathes in it is purified from all sin, but he must bring water from the Ganges with him to wash the Lingam of the pagoda, and he is obliged to sleep on the bare earth, without covering, during the entire pilgrimage.

D'Anvers, HENRY, an English Baptist, born of respectable parents, was a colonel in the Parliamentary army in 1646, governor of Stafford, and a magistrate well-beloved of the people, as he refused bribes. He became a Baptist during the Commonwealth, and after the Restoration made over his estates to trustees to save their confiscation by his persecutors. In 1663 he was joint-pastor of a Church in Aldgate. In 1674 the government offered a reward for his apprehension, and he was sent prisoner to the Tower; but his wife procured his release in 1675. He afterwards defended the duke of Monmouth, and for safety fled to Holland, where he died in 1686. In 1674 he published a Treatise on Baptism, which made him many adversaries. Some of his brethren defended him against his antagonists. He also published, A Treatise of the Laying on of Hands, with the History Thereof (1674). In another book, called Theopolis, he fully considers "the Dragon, the Beast, and False Prophet." He was a worthy man, of unspotted life. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 393; Benedict, Hist. of the Baptists; Haynes, Baptist Cyclop., i, 13-16.

Danzer, JAKOB, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born March 4, 1743, at Lengenfeld, in Suabia. He joined the order of the Benedictines at Isny; was in 1784 professor of moral and pastoral theology at Salzburg, but had to resign his position in 1792 on account of his liberal tendencies. In 1795 he was second canon at Buchau, and died there Sept. 4, 1796. He published, Anleitung zur christlichen Moral (Salzburg, 1787-91, 1792, 3 vols.):—Ueber den Geist Jesu und seine Lehre (ibid. 1795, 1797):—Beiträge zur Reformation der christlichen Theologie (Ulm, 1793):—Magazin zur Verbesserung des dogmatischen Lehrbegriffs der Katholiken (1794). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 315 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 316, 702; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Dara, in Lamaism, was the name of two goddesses who sprang from two tears of Jashik, which he let fall over the fearful destiny of the damned. They were personifications of love and sympathy.

Dararians, the name of a heretical Mohammedan sect, derived from their founder Darari. They flourished on the coast of Syria and in the district of Lebanon. Darari was an impostor, who came from Persia to Egypt about A.D. 1000, and endeavored to persuade the people that the caliph Hakem was God. For this blasphemy he was put to death by the indignant people.

Darbelin was an Irish saint, given as one of the four virgin daughters of Mac Iar, living at Cill-nä-nighen, now Killinenny, County Dublin. They were Darinnill, Darbelin, Cael, and Coimigheall. She is commemorated Oct. 26.

Darbile (or Derbhiledh), an Irish saint, was daughter of Cormac, son of Brechhius. She was accepted as patron saint of the descendants of Amhalghaidh, son of Fiachra, in the place of St. Corbmac. She flourished about the middle of the 6th century, and is also known as Darbile and Derivla of Irras. The church in which she lived, died, and was buried is in Muller, barony of Erris, County Mayo. She is commemorated Aug. 3 and Oct. 26.

Darboy, GEORGES, a French ecclesiastic, was born Jan. 16, 1813. He became teacher of philosophy and theology at the Seminary of Langres in 1839, bishop of Nancy in 1859, and archbishop of Paris in 1863. He was a firm opponent of papal infallibility in the Vatican Council, but yielded to the decision of the majority. He was arrested by the Communists April 5, 1871, and when the government troops entered the city he was shot at St. Roquette, May 24 following. Among his most important works are Les Saintes Femmes (1850):

—Les Femmes de la Bible (5th ed. 1859):—La Vie de St. Thomas à Becket (2d ed. 1860). See Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Darby, Deborah, a minister of the Society of Friends, in England, travelled with her fellow-minister, Rebecca Byrd, in the principality of Wales, in 1784. Subsequently, in 1793, both embarked for America, and spent three years there preaching the Gospel. She died in 1810. See The Friend, viii, 357.

Darby, John Nelson, who was born in London, Nov. 18, 1800, and died at Bournemouth, April 28, 1882, is noted as the head of the Darbyites or Plymouth Brethren (q. v.). He is also known on the Continent by his writings, which have been translated into German, and for which see Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 261 sq. (B. P.)

Darby, M. W., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of Grace Church, Montrose, Ia.; at the time of his death, at Port Jervis, N. Y., July 20, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Dare, JAMES, an English minister, originally a Methodist, joined the Congregationalists about 1872, and was appointed to Rutherglen and Wahgunyah, Victoria, where he labored until his death, Jan. 13, 1876. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 353.

Darecca, a reputed Irish saint, is said to have been the sister of St. Patrick. Her father was Calphurnius, a British nobleman, and her mother Conchessa, a sister or niece of St. Martin of Tours. Colgan says that she bore to two husbands, Conis and Restitutus, seventeen sons, who were bishops, and two daughters, who were virgins. In her old age she devoted herself to God, and took charge of the altar vestings, with her sisters Lupita and Tigrida. Later writers have thrown discredit upon the whole story. She is commemorated March 22.

Daret, Jean, a Benedictine monk, was born at Mantes in 1667. His opposition to the bull Unigenitus made him famous in his day, and he composed controversial writings which are now forgotten. He also assisted Mabillon in his great works. He died Jan. 3, 1736. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daret, Pierre, a French engraver, was born in Paris in 1610. The following are some of his principal works: St. John Sitting in the Desert; The Virgin Suckling the Infant; St. Peter Delivered from Prison; The Entombing of Christ; The Holy Family, with an Angel Presenting Fruit to the Infant Jesus; The Dead Christ, with the Marys; The Virgin and Infant.

Darg, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, was minister at Fordyce in 1599; had letters of "dispositure and mortification" from the advocate, Edinburgh, in September, 1629, and died about 1662. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 666.

Darg, Walter, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1628; was the first minister at Deskford after it was separated from Fordyce in 1680; was suspended in 1650, and deposed in 1651 for insufficiency; was accused of marrying persons irregularly in 1666 and 1674. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 674.

Dargavel, John, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1665; was presented to the living at Southdean in August of that year; transferred to Prestonkirk in 1670, and collated thereto in March; accused Sept. 1, 1670, of fornication. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 378, 512.

Daria, wife of Nicander, martyr in Mossia, under Maximus, in the persecution of Galerius, bravely encouraged her husband to martyrdom; and when the judge sneeringly said that she only wanted another husband, she offered to die first. She was sent to prison, but was released before her husband's death, and was present. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Darida, in Hindû mythology, was a powerful demon, who challenged Siva to battle. The latter implored Vishnu's help, who came out of Siva's eye in the form of the eight-headed giantess, Bradrakali, and slew the demon.

Darinnill, an Irish saint of Cill-na-ninohen, was one of the virgin daughters of Mac Iaar. She is commemorated Oct. 26. See DARBELIN.

Darius, a martyr at Nicæa, commemorated Dec. 19.

Darkin, CHARLES, an English Baptist minister, was born about 1800. He was converted at the age of seventeen; joined Dr. Cox's Church, Mare Street, Hackney; entered Stepney College; became pastor at Woodstock, Oxfordshire, in June, 1825; and in 1841 removed to Cirencester, where he died in 1853. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1854, p. 49. (J. C. S.)

Darley, THOMAS, a Methodist Episcopal minister, a native of England, entered the travelling ministry in 1801; located in 1806, but continued his labors with characteristic zeal and fidelity until 1814, when he was readmitted into the Georgia Conference, and therein continued till his death, April 16, 1832. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 215.

Darling, the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. ANDREW (1), graduated at Edinburgh University in 1670; was presented by the king to the living at Stitchel; ordained May 1, 1683; deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen; and deposed for drunkenness in 1692. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 474.

2. ANDREW (2), a native of Galashiels, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1693; was ordained minister at Hoddam, Oct. 13, 1696; transferred to Kinnoul before December, 1697; admitted in January, 1698, and died Aug. 12, 1731, aged fifty-nine years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 620; ii, 648.

3. HUGH, graduated at Edinburgh University in July, 1696; licensed to preach in August, 1699; called to the living at Innerwick in April, and ordained in August, 1700. He died at Edinburgh, Sept. 29, 1701, aged about twenty-five years. He had two brothers in the ministry, Andrew and Robert. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 375.

4. JAMES, son of the minister at Ewes, was called in January, and ordained, in March, 1734, minister at Kinkell; transferred to Kintore in January, 1738, and died March 29, 1742. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 585, 589.

5. PETER, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1695; was licensed to preach in 1697; called and ordained in June, 1698, to the living at Boyndie; and died in 1730, aged about fifty-five years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 671.

6. ROBERT, graduated at Edinburgh University in July, 1685; had a unanimous call to the living at Ewes; was ordained Nov. 20, 1694; called to Gask in 1699, but declined, and died Dec. 1, 1716, aged forty-seven years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 636.

Darling, David, an English Congregational minister, was born in 1785. In 1816 he was sent by the London Missionary Society to Eastern Polynesia; and after laboring for sixteen years in the Society Islands, went to the Marquesas and took part in the translation of the Scriptures into the language of that group. He afterwards removed to Tahiti, where he continued to labor until 1859, when he retired, on account of age and infirmity, to Sydney, and died there, Dec. 6, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 234.

Darlugdach (Dardulacha, Derlughach, or Derlugdach), abbess of Kildare, has a Scotch, Irish, and possible Continental connection. She succeeded her mistress, St. Brigida, in the abbacy of Kildare, about 723, and died a year afterwards. A romantic story is told of her early history by Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii, 22.

Darnalt, JEAN, a French theologian, lived about 1618. He was priest of St. Croix at Bordeaux, and wrote, La Vie de Saint Mommolin (Bordeaux, 1618);—Statuta et Decreta Reformationis Congregat. Bened. etc. (Paris, 1605). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Darney, WILLIAM, an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his itinerancy (according to Hill, Alphab. Arrangem.) in 1742, and was instrumental in raising several societies in the North of England, which for some time were called "William Darney's Societies." For an account of his maltreatment by mobs see West. Meth. Magazine, 1842, p. 619 sq.; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 131. He finally settled in Colne, Lancashire, but preached as he was able, until his death in 1779 or 1780. He published, A Collection of Hymns (Leeds, 1751, 12mo, pp. 296);—The Fundamental Doctrines of Holy Scripture, etc. (Glasgow, 1755, 16mo). See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, 1801, p. 100.

Darney was rather Calvinistic in his creed, fearless of danger, and extensively useful. His doggerel hymns greatly annoyed the good taste of Wesley. One of them was spun out to one hundred and four stanzas. "A hard Scotchman," Everett calls him. See West. Centenary Takings (Lond. 1841, 3d ed.), i, 321; Jackson, Life of Charles Wesley (N. Y.), p. 451-458; Christopher, Epworth Singers and other Poets of Methodism (N. Y. and Lond. 1874), p. 218-215; Wesley, Works (Lond. 3d ed.), xii, 305; xiii, 188, 191.

Daroczi, GEORG, a Transylvanian theologian of the Jesuit order, lived in the first part of the 17th century, and wrote, Ortus et Progressus Collegii Societatis Jesu Claudio-Politan (Clausenburg, 1736). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daronatsi, PAUL, an Armenian abbot, was born in 1043, in the province of Daron. He was noted for his profound knowledge of philosophy and theology. He died in 1123, leaving a letter, which he wrote (1101) in favor of the Monophysites against Theophistes (printed at Constantinople in 1752; Galanus has inserted from it about twenty passages in his Conciliatio):—also a Treatise against the Greek Church:—A Commentary on Daniel. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Darroch, the family name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. DUGALD, graduated at Glasgow University in 1638; was admitted to the living at Kilcalmonell and Kilberry in 1641; had a recommendation in 1646 to the committee of Money; was transferred to Campbeltown in 1649; appointed the same year one of the translators of the Shorter Catechism into Irish; intrusted with the translation of the Brief Sum of Christian Doctrine in 1660, and had to translate the Second Book of Kings into Irish, as part of the whole Bible; was deprived by the privy council in 1662, and died about 1664 or 1665. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 35, 43.

2. JOHN (1), graduated at Glasgow University in 1625; was minister at Jura and Colonsay in 1639; deposed in September, 1646, "for preaching to and gross compliance with rebels," and died before May 9, 1649. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 53.

Darstius, G. H., a German Reformed minister, was settled pastor in Bucks County, Pa., about the year 1731, preaching in both the Dutch and German languages. In 1748 he removed to Holland. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 375.

Darte, FREEMAN, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Salisbury, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1803. He was converted in 1832; joined the Church in 1834; not long after commenced to preach, and was pastor in Erie and Cattaraugus counties. He died suddenly, Jan. 22, 1883. See Morning Star, Feb. 14, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Daruj, in Persian mythology, was a division of the evil demons, brought forth by Ahri-man, as opposed to the creations of light from Ormuzd.

Darvands, in Zendic mythology, are six evil spirits created by Ahri-man, in opposition to the Amshaspands of Ahuramazda. Their names were Akomano, Ander, Samva, Nasatyas, Taric, and Zaric. These were mostly the same as the deities of the Vedas, only changed into demons by the Zenda.

Dasa-bala is a term employed to denote ten attributes or modes of wisdom possessed by Buddha. They are as follows: "1. The wisdom that understands what knowledge is necessary for the right fulfilment of any particular duty in whatsoever situation; 2. That which knows the result or consequences of karma, or moral action; 3. That which knows the way to the attainment of nirvana, or annihilation; 4. That which sees the various sakwalas or systems of worlds; 5. That which knows the thoughts of other beings; 6. That which knows that the organs of sense are not the self; 7. That which knows the purity produced by the exercise of the dhyanas, or abstract meditation; 8. That which knows where any one was born in all his former births; 9. That which knows where any one will be born in all his future births; 10. That which knows how the results proceeding from karma, or moral action, may be overcome" (Hardy, Manual of Buddhism).

Dasa-dandu are ten prohibitions which are enjoined upon the Buddhist monks, to be studied during their novitiate, as follows: "1. The eating of food after mid-day; 2. The seeing of dances or the hearing of music or singing; 3. The use of ornaments or perfumes; 4. The use of a seat or couch more than a cubit high; 5. The receiving of gold, silver, or money; 6. Practicing some deception to prevent another priest from receiving that to which he is entitled; 7. Practicing some deception to injure another priest, or bring him into danger; 8. Practicing some deception in order to cause another priest to be expelled from the community; 9. Speaking evil of another priest; 10. Uttering slanders in order to excite dissension among the priests of the same community. The first five of these crimes may be forgiven, if the priest bring sand and sprinkle it in the court-yard of the wihara; and the second five may be forgiven after temporary expulsion" (Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 28).

Dasa-sil are ten obligations which must be repeated and meditated upon by the Buddhist priest three hours a day during his novitiate. They are as follows: "1. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the taking of life; 2. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the taking of that which has not been given; 3. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids sexual intercourse; 4. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the saying of that which is not true; 5. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the use of intoxicating drinks, that leads to indifference towards religion; 6. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the eating of food after mid-day; 7. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids attendance upon dancing, singing, music, and masks; 8. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the adorning of the body with flowers, and the use of perfumes and unguents; 9. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the use of high or honorable seats or couches; 10. I will observe the precept, or ordinance, that forbids the receiving of gold or silver" (Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 24).

Daser, LUDWIG HERCULES, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Affalterbach, April 4, 1705. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1735 pastor at Schwaigheim, and died in 1765, leaving, De Origine et Auctoritate Punctorum Hebraicorum Dirina (Tübingen, 1728):—De Augustiniana Decalogi Divisione (ibid. 1733):—Vertheidigung der Integrität des Textus Hebraici Veteris Testamenti (Heilbrunn, 1764). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 197; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hofer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Dash, FREDERICK H., an English Congregational minister, was born at Gosport, Hants, Dec. 25, 1854. He entered Hackney College in 1874; in 1879 became pastor at Bungay; was ordained Jan. 27, 1880, and died Oct. 30 following. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 369.

Dashiell, Alfred H., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Maryland, Aug. 2, 1793. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania; was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia; became successively pastor of the Mariners' Church, Philadelphia; of First Church, Jacksonville, Ill.; president of a female academy, Nashville, Tenn.; pastor Presbyterian Church, Franklin; for nineteen years at Shelbyville; and finally resided in Brooklyn, N. Y., until his death, March 18, 1881. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ill.

Dashiell, Benjamin D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Vienna, Md., Sept. 21, 1831. He removed with his parents to Texas in 1837; was licensed to preach in 1852; admitted into the Texas Conference on trial the same year; located in 1867; re-entered the conference in 1869, continuing in the itinerant ranks until 1880; and died Jan. 14, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 120.

Dashiell, George, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Stepney, Somerset Co., Md.; was admitted to orders, and preached in Delaware, in South Nassau Parish, Kent Co., Md., in Chester, and in St. Peter's, Baltimore. In 1816 he set up an independent church, claiming and exercising the authority to ordain others. He died in New York city in April, 1852. He was distinguished for his eloquence. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 313.

Dashiell, Robert Laurensen, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Salisbury, Md., June 25, 1825. He was converted at the age of fifteen; graduated from Dickinson College in 1846, and in 1848 entered the Baltimore Conference. His fields of labor were West River Circuit, Md., and Loudon, Va.; four years at Union and Wesley chapels, in Washington; 1856 and 1857, Eutaw Street, and 1858 and 1859, Charles Street, Baltimore; 1860 and 1861, Central Church, Newark, N. J.; 1862 and 1863, Trinity, Jersey City; 1864 to 1866, St. Paul's, Newark; 1867, First Church, Orange; in nearly all of which he had large and lasting revivals. In 1868 he was elected president of Dickinson College; resigned in 1872, and was made presiding elder of Jersey City district; but, in May of that year, was chosen missionary secretary, which office he continued to hold to the close of his life, March 8, 1880. Dr. Dashiell was a man of extraordinary gifts and graces, and left a rare record of success. His spirit was free and genial, his temperament poetical, his nature radical, his zeal outspoken, his friendship lavish. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 38; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Dastus. (1) A soldier, in the time of Diocletian and Maximian, at Dorostolus, where it was the custom to offer a human sacrifice to Saturn on Nov. 30. He, being selected for the purpose, preferred to die as a Christian, which meant dying by torture. (2) A martyr at Nicomedia, with Zoticus, Gaius, and twelve soldiers. He is commemorated Oct. 21.

Dasnami Dandis (ten-named Dandis), among the Hindûs, are the primitive members of the order of Dandis (q. v.), who refer their origin to Saukara Acharya (q. v.). There were ten classes of mendicants descended from this remarkable man, only three of whom have so far retained their purity as to entitle them to be called Saukara's Dandis. They are numerous, especially in and about Benares; and to these the chief Vedanti writers belong. The remaining members of the Dasnami class, who have degenerated from the original purity of practice which distinguished the primitive Dandis, are still religious characters, only they have given up the use of clothes, money, and ornaments; they prepare their own food, and admit members from any order of Hindûs, whereas the original Dandis admit only Brahmins.

Dass, Ishuree, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Futtehpore, India, in 1826. He was educated in the mission-school there, and, on a visit to America, entered Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., but was compelled to return to his native land without graduating. He continued his studies with the English missionaries, and, in 1865, was licensed by Furruckabad Presbytery, and stationed at Futtehpore, where he died, May 2, 1867. He wrote a prize essay on Female Education in India. See Wilson, Hist. Presb. Almanac, 1868, p. 83.

Dassel, CHRISTIAN CONRAD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Harkesbützel, March 16, 1768. In 1794 he was teacher at Hanover, in 1796 preacher at Schloss-Ricklingen, in 1800 at Hohenbostel, and in 1806 first preacher at Stadthagen, where he died, in 1826. He wrote: Ueber den Verfall des öffentlichen Religionscultus in theologischer Hinsicht (Neustadt, 1818); — Der hannoversche Landeskatechismus als Lese- und Erbauungsbuch (Hanover, 1800); — Commentar über den hannoverschen Landeskatechismus (Göttingen, 1811). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 496; ii, 219; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 264. (B. P.)

Dassier, LAZARK, a French preacher, lived about 1685. He was of the order of St. Dominic, and published a number of Sermons, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dassov, Nicolaus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, Dec. 11, 1639. At Greifswald, where he took the degree of doctor of theology, he was also professor, senior of the theological faculty, member of consistory, and pastor of St. Mary's. He died Aug. 8, 1706, leaving: De Prima Nicolaitarum Hæresi; — De Vento Pentecostali; — De Glorificatione Christi. See Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Dassov, Theodor, a German theologian, brother of Nicolaus, was born at Hamburg. He studied at Giessen and Wittenberg; was in 1678 professor extraordinarius of Oriental languages, and in 1689 professor ordinarius at the latter place, where he also took his degree as doctor of theology, in 1699. He accepted a call to Kiel, and died Jan. 6, 1721, while general superintendent of Holstein and provost of Rendsburg. He wrote: Aris Unque Sect. Inque Sacrific. Oblat. (Wittenberg, 1697); — De Emphasi Sacramum Vocum ex Vet. Hist. Hebr. Repet. (Kiel, 1714); — De Jure Finium ex Pandect. Talmudic. (Wittenberg, 1735); — De Ritibus Mesuæ (ibid. 1714); Dissidium Pontif. Rom. et Hebr. (ibid. 1735); — Imagines Hebræorum Rerum, quæ Nostra Ætate Circumferunt (ibid. 1735); — *Rabbinismi, Philol. s. Dathevatsi, GREGORY, an Armenian theologian, who lived in the middle of the 14th century, was monk in a monastery at Dathev. After having studied under the celebrated John Orodnetzi, he taught theology and philosophy. He died in 1410, leaving about twenty works, of which the best known is a Book of Questions, printed at Constantinople, and held to be heretical.

There was also another Gregory Dathervatsi, who was martyred in the 17th century by the Kurds; and this one, according to the opinion of Sérpos, is commemorated in the Armenian liturgy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, q. v.

Dati, Leonardo (1), an Italian theologian, was born at Florence about 1360. He entered the order of the Dominicans, and became celebrated for learning and piety. He was sent, in the year 1400, to the Council of Constance. After having accomplished diplomatic missions to the king of Bohemia, in 1409, and the emperor Sigismund, in 1413, he was elected general of his order in 1414; and died in April, 1425, leaving several theological works, the only ones of which that have been printed are, Sermones de Petitionibus (Lyons, 1518, 8vo):—Sermones de Flagellis Peccatorum (ibid. eod. 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dati, Leonardo (2), an Italian theologian, was born at Florence in 1408. He was canon at Florence, and afterwards secretary to popes Calixtus III, Pius II, Paul II, and Sixtus IV. He was appointed, in 1467, bishop of Massa, and died at Rome in 1472, leaving in MS. many works in prose and verse. Mehus published thirty-three of his Letters (Florence, 1742, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Datius, bishop of Milan, was consecrated about 527. He brought ruin upon his countrymen by the part he took in instigating the revolt of Liguria from Vitiges, the Gothic king of Italy. When Milan was sacked by the Goths he fled to Constantinople. In 547 he united with pope Vigilius in opposing Justinian's condemnatory edict of the three articles, by refusing to sign it; and the two controversialists took refuge in the church of St. Peter, at Constantinople, in 551, from which the imperial troops vainly endeavored to drag the pope by force. A second refuge was taken in the church of St. Euphemia, at Chalcedon, where the pope, afraid to leave his asylum, appointed Datius one of his representatives in the approaching discussions. Datius died about 555. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Dativa was a female martyr in Byzacium, Africa, in 484; commemorated Dec. 6, with seven others.

Dativus is the name of several early Christians of eminence:

1. Bishop of Badæ, in Numidia, a frontier post towards the Gætuli, was the author of several epistles.

2. Seventh bishop of Limoges, succeeded Adelphius in the latter part of the 3d century. He was deposed at the end of nineteen years, during the persecution of Diocletian.

3. A celebrated senator, was martyred under Diocletian, at Carthage, in 304. He and forty-eight others were surprised while worshipping at Abitina, and, after severe torture, died—some from starvation. He is commemorated on Feb. 11. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Datta (or Dattatreya), an incarnation of a portion of Vishnu, and therefore venerated by the Vaishnavas (q. v.). He was also eminent for his practice of the Yoga, and hence is held in high estimation by the Yogis (q. v.).—Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Daubenton, Guillaume, a French Jesuit, born at Auxerre in 1648, went to Spain as confessor to Philip V; was sent back in 1706, but returned in 1716. He died in 1723, leaving Oraisons Funébres and a Vie de Saint François Régis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daubentonne (or Dabentonne), JEANNE (called also Pieroine Daubenton), a French female fanatic, born in Paris, was burned there, July 5, 1872, for setting herself up as a prophetess at the head of the Turlupins or "Brothers of the Company of Poverty." See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

D'Aubigné. See MERLE.

Dauble, G., a Baptist missionary, was born in Switzerland about 1820. Under the auspices of the Basle Missionary Society, he was laboring in Dacca, Bengal, when he became a Baptist, and was baptized at Tezpur, on the Brahmaputra, Assam, Feb. 4, 1850; and appointed a missionary at Nowgong, on the other side of the river. He died March 21, 1853. See The Missionary Jubilee, p. 245. (J. C. S.)

Daubus, Charles, a French Protestant ecclesiastic and philosopher, born at Auxerre, was for some time minister at Nérac. Among several productions, he wrote, L'Échelle de Jacob (St. Foy, 1626, 8vo):—L'Ébionisme des Moines (12mo):—Bellarmin Réformé (1631, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daûd, an Arabic philosopher, son of Nassir, belonged to the tribe of the Thaî, died A.D. 770. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daudé, Pierre (1), a French Protestant theologian, was born at Marvejols (Lozère), Sept. 26, 1654. He studied theology at Puy-laurens, and went in 1680 to England, where he completed his studies; was active for some time in the evangelical ministry, and for twenty-eight years was clerk of the exchequer. He died in London, Jan. 29, 1733, leaving several transitory pieces (Amsterdam, 1730). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daudé, Pierre (2), a French Protestant divine, nephew of the foregoing, was born at Marvejols (Lozère) in 1681, and died in England, May 11, 1754, leaving the following works, which were published anonymously, Vie de Michel de Cerrantes, Trad. de L'Espagnol de Mayans y Siscar (Amsterdam, 1740, 2 vols.):—Traité de la Foi, Traduit du Latin de Burnet (ibid. 1729). According to Barbier and Burnet, he co-operated in the publication of the Bibliothèque Historique, 1733-47. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Dauderstadt, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Naumburg in 1580. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1605 co-rector at Zeitz, in 1608 rector, in 1612 at Saleck, and in 1617 pastor at Skeuditz. In 1625 he went to Freiburg, and died in 1654. He wrote, Apodixis Messia:—Pussio Secundum Quattuor Evangelistas:—Meditat. Septem Verborum Christi in Cruce:—Anti-Christus Orientalis. See Schamelius, Naumburgum Literatum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Daughaday, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., in 1777. He was converted young; in 1798 entered the Baltimore Conference; travelled in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania until 1802, when he located; but re-entered the effective ranks in 1805, and labored to the close of his life, Oct. 12, 1810. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1811, p. 192.

Daugherty, James, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Park, near Lairmount, County Londonderry, Ireland, April 9, 1796. He came to America in 1819, and went to South Hero, Vt. After preparatory studies with the Rev. Asa Lyon, and in St. Albans' Academy, he graduated from the University of Vermont in 1830, studying theology with Rev. O. S. Hoyt, of Hinesburg, and also with W. Smith, D.D., of St. Albans. He was ordained as an evangelist, Jan. 18, 1832, and for some time labored for the Colonial Missionary Society; was also a teacher at Frost Village and Shefford, Canada; was installed at Milton, Vt., Sept. 28, 1836, and dismissed July 5, 1848. He next was agent for the Foreign Evangelical Society one year; then acting pastor at Fairfax, Vt., from 1849 to 1851. Nov. 12, 1857, he was installed at Johnson; dismissed March 12, 1867, and remained there without charge until his death, June 10, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Daughtry, Josiah B., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, joined the Tennessee Conference in 1816; became superannuated in 1845; entered the Mississippi Conference in 1850; again became superannuated in 1853; and died late in that year or early in 1854. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1854, p. 529.

Daullé, JEAN, an eminent French engraver, was born at Abbeville in 1707, and settled in Paris, where he was admitted a member of the Academy in 1742. He died there, April 23, 1763. The following are some of his principal plates: The Magdalen; Diogenes with his Lantern. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Daumer, GEORG FRIEDRICH, a Roman Catholic convert of Germany, was born at Nüremberg, March 5, 1800. He commenced studying theology at Erlangen, where he belonged to the so-called pietists. The lectures of Schelling made him give up theology, which he exchanged at Leipsic for philology. In 1822 he was appointed teacher at the Latin school, and in 1827 at the gymnasium of his native place. In 1833 he resigned his position, joined in 1858 the Roman Catholic Church, and died Dec. 14, 1875, at Würzburg. He published, Urgeschichte des Menschenglaubens (Nürnberg, 1827):—Philosophie, Religion und Alterthum (1833):—Ueber die Entstehung ägyptischen Eigenthums beim Auszug der Israeliten aus Egypten (ibid.):—Polemische Blätter, betreffend Christenthum, Bibelglauben und Theologie (ibid. 1834):—Züge zu einer neuen Philosophie der Religion und Religionsgeschichte (ibid. 1835):—Anthropologismus und Kriticismus der Gegenwart (ibid. 1844):—Die Stimme der Wahrheit in den religiösen und confessionellen Kämpfen der Gegenwart (ibid. 1845):—Sabbath, Moloch und Tabu (ibid. 1839):—Der Feuer- und Molochdienst der alten Hebräer (Braunschweig, 1842):—Die Geheimnisse des christlichen Alterthums (Hamburg, 1847, 2 vols.):—Die Religion des neuen Weltalters (ibid. 1850, 3 vols.):—Meine Conversion Ein Stück Seiner und Zeitgeschichte (Mayence, 1859). Dauu, GEORGE, a Scotch clergyman, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1772; was schoolmaster at Alves; licensed to preach in 1778; appointed to the living at Insh in 1790, and died May 21, 1821, aged seventy years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 582.

Dauney, FRANCIS (1), a Scotch clergyman, graduated at Mariachal College, Aberdeen; was licensed to preach in June, 1742; called to the living at Lumphann; ordained in June, 1743; transferred to Banchory-Ternan in June, 1758; and died April 2, 1800, aged eighty-one years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 523, 526, 537.

Dauney, FRANCIS (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in May, 1709; called to the living at Keithball and Kinkell in 1710; transferred to Kemnay in 1719, and died Nov. 7, 1745. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 585, 588.

Daurès, LOUIS, a French theologian, was born at Milhas (Rouergue) in 1655. He became a Dominican, went to Paris, and founded there the community of penitence called St. Valère, in the suburb of St. Germain, with the object of gathering together young girls who had been led into debauchery. He died there, May 10, 1728, leaving L'Eglise Protestante Détruite par Elle Même (Paris, 1689, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

D'Aurolt, ANTHONY. See AVEROLT, ANTHONY.

Dausas was a martyr in Persia in 361. He was one of the captives carried away by Sapor II when he took Bezanle or Phœnicia. Heliodorus, the bishop, being taken ill, consecrated Dausas, and gave him charge over all the captives who had escaped the rack. When they assembled to worship, it was reported to the king that they met to curse him, and the Christians, to the number of three hundred, were collected, and commanded to embrace fire-worship or die. Dausas encouraged his flock, telling them that they would be delivered from bondage and restored to their country. Two hundred and sixty-five of them were slain, twenty-five apostatized, and the fate of the other ten is unknown. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Dausque (or Dausquey; Lat. Dausquius), a French scholar, was born at St. Omer, Dec. 5, 1566. He joined the Jesuits, but left them in 1610, and became canon of Tournay. He died about 1636, leaving, among other works, Basilius, Seleuciensis Episcopi, Homilia (Heidelberg, 1604; transl. from the Greek, with notes):—Scutum Duplex, etc. (Douay, 1610):—Sancti Pauli Sanctitudo (Paris, 1627):—Sancti Josephi Sanctificatio extra Uterum (Lyons, 1671). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Daut, JOHANN MAXIMILIAN, a journeyman shoemaker of Frankfort-on-the-Main, was one of those enthusiasts who appeared after the beginning of the 18th century, and proclaimed the coming judgment of God. At the divine behest, as he said, he wrote, in 1710, his Helle Donnerposaune, in which he cries the woe especially over Frankfort and the Roman empire. Only a small number will be saved for the marriage-feast of the Lamb, after Turks, Jews, and heathen have been converted. Against the Lutheran clergy he was especially severe. Expelled from Frankfort, he went to Leyden, where he soon had a conflict with Ueberfeldt, against whom he wrote, calling his adherents "Judas brethren." He was afterwards, however, again on good terms with Ueberfeldt. In and about Ulm he succeeded with his notions, in consequence of which the magistrate issued an edict against these meddling preachers, and prohibited the reading of Daut's writings, to which also belonged his Geistliche Betrachtungen, published in 1711. John Frick, a pastor and professor of theology, who was appointed to bring him back from his errors, succeeded in his mission, and again reconciled him with the Church. See Walch, Rel. Streitigkeiten in der lutherischen Kirche, ii, 794; v, 1051; Pfaff, Introductio in Hist. Theol. ii, 372; Burger, Exercitatio de Sutoribus Funaticis (Leipsic, 1730); Fuhrmann, Handbuch der Rel. und Kirchengeschichte, s. v.; Hagenbach, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Davcina, an early Chaldean goddess, the wife of Hea, and the mother of Marduk. She has been supposed to represent the earth in a female form, as Hea was the god of the waters. Her analogue was the Phœnician goddess Bohu.

Davenport, Addington, a clergyman of the Church of England, graduated from Harvard College in 1719, and went to England for ordination. For a while he was pastor of the Church in Scituate, Mass.; he became assistant rector of King's Chapel, Boston, April 15, 1737; and in May, 1740, rector of Trinity Church in the same city. He died there, Sept. 8, 1746. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 122.

Davenport, Benjamin, an English Baptist minister, was born at Bourneheath, Bromsgrove, in 1826. He was converted at seventeen; joined the Baptist Church at Holy Cross, and began to preach at Catshill and Stony Stratford. He settled as pastor at Brington, Northamptonshire, in 1854, and died July 30, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858, p. 49.

Davenport, Ebenezer, a Congregational minister, graduated from Princeton College, was settled over the First Church at Greenwich, Conn., in 1767, and remained there until his death in 1773.

Davenport, James, an eccentric Presbyterian minister, was born at Stamford, Conn., in 1716. He graduated from Yale College at the age of twenty-two. In 1738 the Philadelphia Presbytery gave Maidenhead and Hopewell leave to call him, but he preferred to settle at Southold, L. I., and was ordained by a council, Oct. 26, 1738. He was not an eloquent speaker, and in preaching exhausted himself, exhibiting strange contortions of face, and a strange, singing tone, which was imitated by many Baptists of the South. Whitefield, who met him in 1740, styles him "one of the ministers whom God had sent out, a sweet, zealous soul." Davenport had considerable success in Southold, and was the means of a great revival in Baskingridge, N. J., where he preached for a season. He visited Connecticut in 1741. At Stonington, one hundred persons were converted by his first sermon. Twenty of the Niantic Indians were converted under his preaching at East Lyme, and many of the Mohegan tribe, also. At New Haven he came into conflict with the pastor. He was afterwards arrested at Ripton for disorderly proceedings and carried to Hartford, where he sang all night in prison. The grand jury presented him as a defamer of the ministry; he was treated as insane, and carried to his home. In March, 1743, he went to New London and organized a separate church, his followers making a bonfire of religious books and fine clothing. After a severe illness, his mind underwent a change; he bewailed his errors, and in July, 1744, made ample retraction. In 1746 he became a member of the New Brunswick Presbytery. Having recovered his health, he spent two months, in 1750, in Virginia, and also labored with some success at Cape May, N. J. He was called to Maidenhead and Hopewell, and was installed Oct. 27, 1754. As moderator of the synod of New York he preached the opening sermon, which was printed with the title The Faithful Minister Encouraged. He remained pastor for three years, but his labors were not greatly blessed. Many of the extravagances charged against him were untrue, coming from scoffers and worldly men. Davenport died in 1757, and was buried in the New-Light graveyard, near Pennington, N. J. (W. P. S.)

Davenport, John, a Presbyterian minister, was ordained by the Presbytery of Suffolk, June 4, 1775, and served the congregation in Southold, L. I., for two years. On Aug. 12, 1795, he was settled at Deerfield, N. J., but resigned in 1805. He died July 13, 1821. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Davenport, Robert Dunlevy, a Baptist missionary, was born in Williamsburg, Va., March 25, 1809. He studied at the Virginia Baptist Seminary; was ordained at Richmond in August, 1835; received his appointment as a missionary to labor among the Siamese in September following, and arrived in Bangkok in July, 1836. Being a practical printer, he took with him a press, types in Chinese and Siamese, and a lithographic press, and was the means of doing great good, by the publication of religious literature for the people for whose spiritual welfare he was laboring. At the end of about nine years' service he returned to America on account of his health, and died at Alexandria, La., Nov. 24, 1848. (J. C. S.)

Davenport, Silas D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, in 1857, in Wadesborough, N. C., whence he removed to Corpus Christi, Texas, in 1861, and subsequently, in 1865, performed missionary work at Waco. In 1866 he was rector of Trinity Church, in Marshall, whence he removed to Dallas in 1868, as rector of St. Matthew's Church, and there remained until his death, Jan. 1, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Daveyro, PANTALEON, a Portuguese monk, who lived at the end of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century. He made a journey to Jerusalem, of which he published an account, under the title, Itinerario de Terra Sancta (Lisbon, 1593). Diego Tavares published of it a much more enlarged edition (ibid. 1683). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David. Among the Egyptians, an archimandrite, or any head of a monastery, of whatever rank, was called David; so that, when a monastic head gave letters of commendation to any one, he subscribed himself as "David illius loci" (Gratian, De Formatis, quoted by Ducange).

David, a frequent name in early Christian history. See also DABIVS.

1. One of the four luminaries of the Barbeliot system. See DADKA.

2. A bishop of the 5th century. About 440 he carried a letter from Leo the Great to the bishop of Mauritania, and is praised by the pope.

3. A deacon, and treasurer of the Church of Edessa, was one of the witnesses produced by the presbyters against Ibas before Photius of Tyre. His testimony was rejected by the judges.

4. This is a common form of the Irish Dabi, Mohi, etc. The most famous of the name was David, called sometimes "Legate of all Ireland," who succeeded St. Dubhthach as bishop of Armagh in 548. He died in 550.

5. A martyr, together with three boys, is commemorated June 25.

6. Of Thessalonica, is commemorated June 26.

7. King of Ethiopia, commemorated Sept. 7.

8. King of the Jews, commemorated variously: Sept. 30 (Cal. Armen.); Dec. 19 (Cal. Ethiop.); Dec. 29 (Mart. Rom. Vet.).

9. Commemorated with Constantine, Oct. 2.

David, a Scotch prelate, was chamberlain to the king, and was consecrated bishop of St. Andrews on St. Vincent's day, Jan. 22, 1233, by William, Gilbert, and Clement, bishops of Glasgow, Caithness, and Dunblane. In 1242 he held a provincial council at Perth; and in 1249 performed the ceremony of anointing king Alexander III., at Scone. He died at Northampton in 1258. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 16.

David, another Scotch prelate, was bishop of Argyle in 1330 and 1350. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 287.

David, a Carmelite of the 15th century, was born in Cherbury, Shropshire. Leland says he was Theologia copritione clarus. Going over to Ireland he was made bishop of Dromore (1427-29). He wrote some books, but they are not mentioned by Bale (De Scripturis Brit.) nor by sir James Ware (De Scripturis Hibernicis), so they were few or obscure. Returning to England, he died, and was buried in the Carmelite monastery at Ludlow in 1420. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 64.

David ALMASSER, a Jew of Moravia, who lived about the end of the 12th century, professed to be the Messiah. He pretended to make himself invisible at pleasure; and the ignorant Jews submitted to his call and followed him in masses. The governor (who was alarmed by the agitation) promised him pardon if he would surrender himself to his hands. David did so with confidence, and was put in prison. He escaped, however, and the Jews, being threatened with severe fines, delivered up David, who this time no more escaped either the eye or the hand of the executioner. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David ALRUI (Alroy or el-Roi, i. e. "the seeing;" also called Menahem ben-Solomon) is known in Jewish history as one of the false Messiahs who arose from time to time. About the year 1160 he appeared among the Persian Jews, and proclaimed himself as sent from God to free the Jews from the Mohammedans and to bring them back to Jerusalem. David brought trouble upon his countrymen, and his timely death—his father-in-law had invited David to a supper, and while in a state of drunkenness the latter was beheaded—stopped the persecution of the sultan against the Jews. Disraeli has taken this historical event as the plot of his Alroy. See Lent, De Judaorum Pseudomessias (2d ed. Herborn, 1687), p. 52 sq.; Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, vi, 291 sq.; Rohling, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

David RUBENI (also called David Leimlein), a fanatical Jew, lived at the end of the 15th and in the first part of the 16th century. It was said that he frequently remained without food for sixty days; professed to come from the east of Tartary; and announced the advent of the Messiah for the year 1500. Accordingly, in 1499, he pretended to have received a divine command to lead the Jews back to the land of their fathers; and when some were preparing to go to the Holy Land, David was under the necessity of declaring that God was displeased with their aims, and had therefore retarded the accomplishment of his promise. Pope Clement VII, who favored the Israelites, honored David with much distinction. David went to Lisbon, and there succeeded in bringing back to Judaism Solomon Molcho, who had become a Christian, and who occupied the position of secretary to the king of Portugal. Solomon was both an orator and a scribe, and thus afforded great help to David. The two together happened to be present at Mantua when Charles V passed through the city. Solomon was so imprudent as to ask the emperor for an audience, hoping to convert him to Judaism; but the only result was that he was compelled to mount the funeral pile. David was seized at the same time, and sent to Spain, where he died a few days afterwards. His death did not undeceive the Jews, who believed for a long time that he returned every week to visit his wife, who was in Italy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David, Charles, a French engraver, was born in Paris about 1600. The following are some of his best prints: Christ Shown to the People by Pilate; The Virgin and Infant, with Angels; The Virgin, with St. Bernard. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

David, Claude, a French Benedictine of the society of St. Maur, was born at Dijon in 1644, and died Nov. 6, 1705. He composed several works on the subject of ecclesiastical scholarship, one only of which has been printed: Dissertation sur Saint Denis l'Aréopagite. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David, François Anne, a French engraver and editor, was born in Paris in 1741; was a pupil of Le Bas; and died in his native city, April 2, 1824. The following are some of his principal religious works: Adam and Eve in Paradise; David with the Head of Goliath. He also published many volumes, including an illustrated Bible. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

David, Jacques, a French poet and theologian, who was born at Annecy, and lived about 1536, was judge at Velay, and left Historia Dedicacionis Ecclesie Podii Amicenis in Vallaria, etc. (Avignon, 1516); three royal songs, four ballads, and ten roundels, in praise of the Virgin Mary, with an orison (Lyons, 1536). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David, Jean (1), a Belgian theologian, was born at Courtrai in 1546. He was pastor of St. Martin's, at Courtrai; joined the Jesuits in 1581; was successively rector of the colleges of Courtrai, Brussels, and Ghent, and died at Antwerp, Aug. 9, 1613. His numerous ascetic works are written in Latin and Flemish, including Veridicus Christianus (Antwerp, 1601);—Extinctorium Fumosa Facis Hollandiæ (ibid. 1602);—Alceurius Romanus Ecclesia (ibid.);—Arcanum Hæreticum (ibid.);—Labyrinthum Hæreticorum (ibid. 1605);—Occasionis Arrepta ac Neglecta Typus (ibid. eod.);—Paradisus Sponsi ac Sponsæ (ibid. 1607);—and many others. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David, Jean (2), a French canon, was born at Carcassonne, and flourished about 1672. He was commendatory of the abbey of the Bons-Hommes, near Angers, and was sent to Rome on a mission by Louis XIV, where he died. His principal works are, Du Jugement Canonique des Evêques (Paris, 1671);—Réponse aux Remarques de M. de Launoy (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

David, Jerome, a French engraver, brother of Charles, was born at Paris in 1608. The following is a list of some of his principal works: Adam and Eve Driven from Paradise; The Assumption of the Virgin; St. Francis of Paula. He etched forty-two plates from the designs of Moutau, of churches, tombs, and altars at Rome. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

David, John Baptist, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born near Nantes, France, in 1760. He was made a priest of St. Sulpice in 1784; came to America with Flaget and Badin in 1792 as missionary in Maryland; in Kentucky in 1811 sq.; was bishop of Maudslaw in partibus and coadjutor of Bardstown in 1819; and died June 12, 1841. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 70, 125.

David, Lodovico Antonio, an Italian painter, was born at Lugano in 1648, and studied under Cavaliere Cairo and Ercole Procaccini at Milan. He became a painter of eminence, and executed many works for the churches and convents at Milan and Venice. In the Church of San Silvestro, in Venice, is a Nativity by this artist, which is especially commended. He died about 1730. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

David, Nicolas Joseph, a French theologian, was born near Bayeux. He was professor in the college of Montaigu and canon of St. Marcel, and died at Paris, Aug. 5, 1784, leaving Réfutation du Système d'un Philosophe Curélien (Paris, 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Davidge, JAMES, an English Baptist minister, was born at Motcomb, Dorsetshire, Oct. 14, 1803, of Wesleyan parents, and was blind from his birth. At the age of fifteen he was placed in the blind asylum at Bristol to learn the trade of basket-making. Returning to his native village, he awakened much interest as "The Blind Preacher." Being also a musician and poet, he composed his own hymns and tunes, after singing which, his preaching was especially attractive to his hearers. Having become a Baptist, he was ordained at Iwerne Minster, July 25, 1833, where he continued till his death, Jan. 6, 1872. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1873, p. 255. (J. C. S.)

Davidi, FRANCISCUS, a German Socinian, was born in Transylvania about 1510. At first a zealous Romanist, he became a Protestant, and defended the Lutheran doctrines against the Zwinglians. He soon joined the latter, and finally became a Socinian, through the influence of Georg Blandrata, who also succeeded in causing the removal of the Lutheran court-preacher, Dionysius Aleisius, and putting Davidi in his place. Davidi's influence over prince Sigismund was so great that he was appointed superintendent of Transylvania. When the synod at Torda was held, in 1568, Davidi openly declared that Jesus Christ was nothing but a man, without any claim to adoration. Being accused of intrigues against the state, he was condemned to imprisonment in the fortress at Detva, where he died, June 6, 1579. Some of his published writings are found in the Bibli- otheca Fratrum Polonorum. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

DAVIDA, ARTHUR LUMLEY, a Jewish writer, was born in London in 1811, and died July 17, 1832. Before he was twenty, he delivered a lecture in the presence of the "Society for the Cultivation of Hebrew Literature," on The Philosophy of the Jews, replete with deep learning and profound research, and published in 1833. He also wrote a Grammar of the Turkish Language, with a Preliminary Discourse on the Language and Literature of Eastern Nations (London, 1832), a work which called forth the most unqualified praise from the most competent judges of the subject. See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 202. (B. P.)

19. JAMES, graduated at the University of St. Andrews in March, 1580; was presented to the vicarage of Wigton in 1590, and Kirkmadrone in 1596; transferred to Whitburn about 1599; continued in 1606, and adhered with forty-one others to the protestation against the introduction of episcopacy. He died before April 17, 1617. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 729, 746.

20. JOHN (1), was appointed the second Protestant minister at Hamilton in 1567, and had charge, also, of Dawserff, Dalryell, Cambusnethan, and Blantyre, in 1574; was a member of the assembly in 1581; appointed by the secret council, in March, 1589, one of the commissioners for the maintenance and defence of true religion, and continued in 1596. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 257.

21. JOHN (2), graduated at the University of St. Andrews; was settled at Liberton in 1579, and was a commissioner of the General Assembly of 1581. He wrote a poetical tract against the regent, James, earl of Morton, in 1579, and wept when the earl forgave him; was appointed by the General Assembly of 1582 to pronounce sentence of excommunication against the archbishop of Glasgow, and was "nothing affrayed," but was threatened with a violent death, so was guarded to the kirk for ten Sundays. In 1583 he boldly admonished the king "to forbear his often swearing," and the same year had to advise him "to beware of innovations in the court." He fled to England in April, 1584, to escape the rage of his enemies. He refused in 1588 to be again settled at Liberton, but was appointed to St. Giles's parish church, Edinburgh, in 1589; was moderator of the synod and of the General Assembly that year; appointed to the second charge, Holyrood house, in 1590; was a member of the assembly, 1591; preached in the New Kirk, Edinburgh, 1592, was transferred to Prestonpans in 1595; presented to the vicarage in 1597; appointed by the assembly a visitor of five presbyteries; and died before Sept. 5, 1604, aged about fifty-six years. He built the kirk and manse at his own expense; and left all his property to support the school which he founded, "for teaching Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and instructing the youth in virtue and learning." He published, Dialogue Betwixt a Clerk and a Courtier (1573);—Ane Breif Commendation of Vpbrichtnes (4to, ed.);—*D. Davies, Evan (1), an English Congregational minister, was born at Hengwm, Cardiganshire, in 1805.

He was carefully trained as a Calvinistic Methodist; experienced conversion in early manhood in London, whither he had gone to engage in business; joined the Congregationalists; studied at Neuaddlwyd Academy, and at the Western Academy; and settled as minister first at Great Torrington, North Devon, for a short time; was sent by the London Missionary Society, after ordination, in 1835, to Penang, China, where he devoted himself incessantly to the study of the Chinese language, established a Christian school for native children, and preached to the English soldiers stationed there. Mr. Davies returned to England in 1840, travelled as missionary agent until 1844, when he accepted the oversight of the Congregational Church in Richmond, Surrey. In 1857 he removed to Heywood, Lancashire, remained there two years, then went to Dalston, and finally to Hornsey, where he died, June 18, 1864. Mr. Davies was the author of the following works: China and her Spiritual Claims:—Memoirs of the Rev. Samuel Dyer:—An Appeal to the Reason and Good Conscience of Catholics:—Lectures on the Sabbath; and editor of the following works: Letters of the late Rev. Samuel Dyer to his Children; Lectures on Christian Theology, by the late Rev. Dr. Payne; and The Works of the late Rev. Dr. Edward Williams of Rotherham. His notes on Original Sin and Baptism, which appear in his edition of Dr. Williams's works, evince great power as a thinker. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 234.

Davies, Evan (2), a Welsh Wesleyan minister, was born at Cellan, near Lampeter, in November, 1819. He was converted in 1839, entered the ministry in 1846, and died at Llangollen, Jan. 11, 1877. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1877, p. 27.

Davies, Francis Barton, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Savannah, Ga. He was converted in early life; began his ministry in the Holston Conference, but afterwards gave up preaching for a time, on account of failing health; in 1866 again entered the itinerant ranks in the North Georgia Conference, in which he labored until his death, at Decatur, April 25, 1881, in the forty-seventh year of his age. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 332.

Davies, George, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent out by the British Conference in 1863 to West Africa, where, after a few months of earnest and useful labor, his health failed. Returning to his native land, he was appointed in 1865 to the South Bristol Circuit; but died at Cardiff, Aug. 3, 1866, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 89.

Davies, George Palmer, an English Congregational minister, was born at Narberth, Pembrokeshire, April 30, 1826. He was educated at Carmarthen and Homerton colleges, and at the age of twenty-four entered upon the pastorate of the Church at Wandsworth, where he remained three years. Retiring to recuperate his failing health, he sojourned in Bonn and subsequently in Berlin, pursuing his theological studies. He refused the chair of theology at Carmarthen College, and accepted the agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society in south Germany. For several years he lived in Frankfurt; but in 1869, having been called to superintend the entire work of the Bible Society in Germany and Switzerland, he removed to Berlin, where he continued to reside until his death, April 23, 1881. He wrote, Erinnerungsblätter von Freundesland (Berlin, 1881). See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 292.

Davies, Henry (1), a Welsh Baptist minister, was born at Llangloffan, Pembrokeshire, in 1783. He began to preach at the age of nineteen or twenty; studied two years at Abergavenny College; and in 1811 was chosen co-pastor in his native town, where he remained until his death, Aug. 23, 1862. For twenty-eight years he was secretary of the association in his shire. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1863, p. 113. (J. C. S.)

Davies, Henry (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Barnstable, Oct. 23, 1799. He was converted at sixteen; was appointed to the West Indies in 1821; returned to England in 1824; was henceforth engaged in the home work; became a supernumerary in 1835; re-entered the itinerancy in 1859; retired in 1865; and died in Cambridge, Jan. 19, 1870. The following year he was ordained, and soon after sent as a missionary to the Cherokees in North Carolina. After their removal by the government, he went to South Carolina, and for twenty years preached among the mountains, and was a missionary among the colored people on the coast. He died June 29, 1880. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 317. (J. C. S.)

Dawson, William (1), an eminent Wesleyan lay-preacher, was born at Garforth, Yorkshire, March 30, 1773, and died suddenly at Colne, June 5, 1841. He was at first a member of the Established Church; became a local preacher in 1801; and, making his home at Barnbow, near Leeds, went up and down the kingdom, preaching, raising collections, speaking at missionary meetings, followed sometimes from town to town by colliers and yeomen; having congregations so large that he was compelled to preach in the open air. One who heard him says, "The effect of his sermons on the immense and eager audiences I never saw before nor expect to see again. Not a man, woman, nor child could resist him; and there was so much Scripture in his representations, and all said in honor of Christ, that the speaker, with the sacred, magic wand, was hid in the glory of his divine Redeemer" (Wakeley, Heroes of Methodism, p. 360). Dr. George Smith considers him "the most eminent lay-preacher that has ever appeared in Methodism;" and Adam Clarke exclaimed, "What an astonishing mind he has." He "possessed a strong, highly original, noble and generous mind, with an equally catholic spirit, and his whole character was as transparent as the light, and warm as the sun's own ray; and although not an educated man in the strictest sense of the term, much less refined, yet he possessed, along with earnest, manly sense, and a vigorous intellect, striking originality and a rich power of conception, which, although not free from occasional eccentricity, bespoke the man of true genius." Dawson published an address on the death of Rev. William Bramwell, short memoirs, speeches on passing events; and a volume of his private letters—tender, faithful, forcible, graceful—a "spiritual treasury," was edited by Everett, and issued in London in 1842. See Everett, Memoirs of William Dawson (Lond. 1842, pp. 547); West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 299 sq.; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 179-184, 271, 275; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, iii, 452-454 (see Index); Minutes of the British Conference, 1841, p. 137.

Dawson, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, nephew of the foregoing, was born at Ancaster, near York, Oct. 19, 1807. He was converted at the age of sixteen; entered the ministry in 1830; was appointed to his last circuit (Holmfirth) in 1858, and died Aug. 19 of the same year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859.

Dawson, William (3), an English Congregational minister, son of Rev. James Dawson, was born in Vizagapatam, a sea-port of Orissa, India, Jan. 16, 1816. He was converted early; studied at Madras, and began his ministry in 1838, as an assistant missionary, first at Caddapah, and afterwards at Tripassora. In 1845 he was ordained pastor at Chicacole, and in 1851 removed to Vizianagram, where he labored until ill-health caused his resignation in 1874. In 1875 he embarked, with many friends, for England; but on May 5 died and was buried at sea. Mr. Dawson compiled a Telugu Hymn-book, and several tracts. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 327.

Dawson, William James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Portsea, Feb. 19, 1816. He joined the Church in 1831; was received into the ministry in 1838; became a supernumerary at Freemantle in 1872; and died April 5, 1880. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1880, p. 28.

Day, Andrew, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Gibson County, Ind., July 22, 1816. He was converted in 1836; joined the Mississippi Conference in 1838, in which he labored forty-two years; and died at the residence of his son, in Lexington, Miss., May 8, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 173.

Day, George (1), a Roman Catholic prelate of the 16th century, was born in Shropshire, and was successively scholar, fellow, and provost of King's College, Cambridge, which office he retained with the bishopric of Chichester, to which he was consecrated in 1543. He was a most pertinacious Romanist, for which he was deprived of his benefice under Edward VI, and restored by queen Mary. He died in 1556. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 59.

Day, George (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Wincanton in 1788. He was pastor first of an Independent church in his native town; subsequently of a Baptist church in the same place; and died March 10, 1858. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1861, p. 98. (J. C. S.)

Day, George Tiffany, D.D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Concord (now Day), Saratoga Co., N. Y., Dec. 8, 1822. While a lad, he went into a cotton factory at Hebronville, Mass. At the age of twelve he lived for a time with an elder brother, and subsequently at Lonsdale, R. I. He was converted in the winter of 1839-40, and was baptized by Rev. Martin Cheney, of Olneyville, with whose church he united. Two years afterwards he became a student in the Smithville Seminary, and subsequently went to the theological school of his denomination at Whitestown, N. Y. Dec. 1, 1846, he commenced preaching in Grafton, Mass., and was ordained at Olneyville, May 20, 1847. In the spring of 1851 he became principal of Geauga Seminary, in Ohio, at the same time taking charge of the church there, until, in July, 1852, he removed as pastor to Olneyville, R. I., also serving as one of the editors of the Free-will Baptist Quarterly. In April, 1857, he visited Europe, and on his return was called to the Roger Williams Church, in Providence, where he remained about nine years. At once he secured a high place among the ministers of the city. In 1866 he again visited Europe, and extended his trip to the Holy Land. The remainder of his life was spent as editor of the Morning Star. He died in Providence, May 21, 1875. See Bowen, Memoir. (J. C. S.)

Day, George W., a Baptist minister, was born in Russell County, Va., Feb. 15, 1807. He joined the Methodists Feb. 24, 1838, but soon after united with the Baptists; was licensed in La Grange, Tenn., April 14, 1839, and engaged in itinerant labors in the Big Hatchie Association; was ordained Oct. 17, 1841, and for several years was pastor of the Big Black Church, near Denmark, Madison Co., Tenn., also having charge of the Bethlehem Church in Hardeman County, for ten years, as well as of several others in Tennessee; and finally of the churches at Maple Springs, Denmark, and Ararat—all in Madison Co., and Woodland, Haywood Co. He died in August, 1881. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 191. (J. C. S.)

Day, Ira, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Burlington, Otsego Co., N. Y., Oct. 6, 1818. When about thirteen years old he joined the Congregational Church at Plainfield, N. Y.; in 1856 removed to Willet, where he joined the Free-will Baptists, and where he was subsequently licensed and ordained pastor. Finally he occupied the same relation in Fabius for three years, and died there, July 29, 1883. See Morning Star, Nov. 7, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Day, Isaac D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Petersburg, Pa., April 9, 1809. He was converted in his sixteenth year; in 1849 entered the Cincinnati Conference; two years later was transferred to the Ohio Conference, wherein he labored until his death, which occurred March 30, 1856. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 113.

Day, Israel, a Congregational minister, was born at Attleborough, Mass.; ordained over the Church in Killingly, Conn., in 1785; dismissed in 1826; and died in Killingly, Dec. 10, 1831. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 185.

Day, Jeremiah, a Congregational minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Jan. 25 (O. S.), 1737. He graduated from Yale College in 1756; taught a school in Sharon until Dec. 1, 1757, when he began the study of theology with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Bellamy; after a year and a half taught school again about two years in Esopus, N. Y.; settled on a farm on Sharon mountain, still continuing his studies; and in 1766 and 1767 was representative in the General Assembly. Not long after, he resumed his theological studies under the Rev. Cotton Mather Smith, and, after preaching at Danbury and other places, was ordained pastor at New Preston, Jan. 31, 1770. In the fall of 1788 he made a missionary tour through western Vermont. In 1794 he made another tour, this time to the settlements on the Delaware, in the state of New York, and on the Susquehanna, in Pennsylvania. From the establishment of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, in 1800, he was one of the editors until the close of his life, at Sharon, Sept. 12, 1806. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 688.

Day, John, an English clergyman, was born in Aldersgate Street, London, in 1566, and was educated at St. Alban's Hall, Oxford; in 1588 was elected a fellow of Oriel College; entered into holy orders, and became a favorite preacher in the university; travelled three years previous to 1608, when he obtained the vicarage of St. Mary's, in Oxford; and died at Thurlow, Suffolk, in 1627. He published some sermons, among which the best are Conciones ad Clerum (Oxon, 1612, 1615):—also Commentaries on the First Eight Psalms (ibid. 1620). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Day, John Steele, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Guildhall, Essex Co., Vt., June 4, 1816. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and licensed to preach in 1839; in 1843 joined the New England Conference, in which he became a superannuate in 1848; in 1851 resumed effective work; in 1878 took a supernumerary, and, in 1880, a superannuated relation; and died at Winthrop, Mass., March 1, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 92.

Day, Joshua, a Baptist minister, was born at Reading, Berkshire, England, in 1837. He came to the United States in 1863, and took up his residence in Gloversville, N. Y.; soon after entered the ministry, settling first at Northville, and removing afterwards to Newark; he became pastor of the North Baptist Church, and subsequently of the Calvary Church, in Albany, where he died, June 20, 1877. See Baptist Weekly, June 28, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Day, Jotham, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1790; was ordained in Kennebunkport in 1821; in 1828 became pastor of the Second Church in Lisbon; and after 1836 preached for the Second Church in Bowdoin as a supply. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 441. (J. C. S.)

Day, J. C., a Lutheran minister, was born at Germantown, Pa., Oct. 10, 1808. He was a student at Gettysburg in 1834; was licensed to preach in 1836; first labored at Friesburg, N. J.; then for ten years was pastor at Saddle River and Ramapo; six years in Churchtown, N. Y.; and for nineteen years in New Germantown, N. J.; removed, without charge, to Mount Vale, and died there, March 25, 1882. See Lutheran Observer, April 28, 1882.

Day, Mark, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Dewsbury, Yorkshire. He was converted at the age of seventeen; commenced his ministry in 1808; and died at Huddersfield, June 30, 1823, aged thirty-eight years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1823.

Day, Mulford, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Providence, N. J., April 8, 1801. He was converted in 1819; in 1833 entered the Philadelphia Conference; subsequently was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, and in it labored until his death, June 26, 1851. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 28.

Day, Pliny Butts, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Chester Village (now Huntington), Mass., April 21, 1806. He entered the academy at Amherst in 1828; graduated from Amherst College in 1834, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1837; during the winter months of his senior year at Andover performed missionary work among the Catholics in Canada. The First Congregational Church in Derry, N. H., installed him pastor, Oct. 4, 1837, and he continued there for more than thirteen years. During the summer of 1851 he visited Europe, and his letters of travel were published in the Congregational Journal. On his return he became pastor at Hollis, N. H., July 7, 1852, and remained until his death, July 6, 1869. He was remarkable for saintliness of character, superior business capacity, and thoughtful discourses. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 431.

Day, Reuben, a Baptist minister, was born Feb. 11, 1809, in Russell County, Va. In 1827 he removed to Tennessee; in 1841 united with the Church in Savannah, Hardin Co.; was licensed to preach in 1842; ordained in November the same year, and acted as pastor in Savannah in 1843; spent 1844 in missionary work, in West Tennessee; had a short pastorate at Cotton Grove, in Madison Co.; took charge, in 1846, of the Pleasant Plains Church, where he remained seven years; afterwards served several churches in Madison, Henderson, Gibson, and Hardeman counties, for ten or fifteen years, including Cane Creek and Liberty Grove. He died in 1880. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 197. (J. C. S.)

Day, Richard (1), an English martyr, was burned at the stake for the defence of the Gospel, with three others, in June, 1558, at Islington. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 467.

Day, Richard (2), an English clergyman and printer, was educated at Eton School and King's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow about 1571, and, being ordained, supplied the place of minister at Ryegate, in Surrey. He afterwards turned his attention principally to printing. He translated Fox's De Christo Triumphante Comedia (1579), and wrote a preface and conclusion to the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. & v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Day, Robert (1), an English Baptist minister, was born at Milverton, Somersetshire, July 2, 1721. He was converted at the age of nineteen; two years later united with the Church at Row Green, Wellington; in 1743 commenced his studies at Bristol, preaching occasionally to neighboring churches; was ordained pastor in Wellington April 8, 1747, and died there, April 1, 1791. See Rippon, Register, 1791, p. 260. (J. C. S.)

Day, Robert (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Dewsbury, Nov. 8, 1794. He was converted in 1809; called to the ministry in 1820; became a supernumerary in 1859; resided at Lowestoft, and died March 27, 1864. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1864, p. 20.

Day, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Wrentham, Mass., April 14, 1808. He graduated from Williams College in 1833; for a time taught in Wrentham and at Troy, N. Y.; preached for two years in West Troy; Sept. 23, 1840, was ordained pastor in Wolcottville, Conn., remaining until June, 1845; eight years following was agent of the American and Foreign Christian Union; then became acting pastor at Bellows' Falls, Vt., in 1854; Princeton, Ill., in 1859; Amboy, in 1860; chaplain of the 8th Regiment Illinois Volunteers in 1862; in 1866 removed to Ann Arbor, Mich., without charge, and died in Brooklyn, N. Y., April 8, 1881. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 28.

Day, Samuel Stearns, a Baptist minister, was born in Leeds County, Ont., in 1808. He joined the Baptists in 1825; graduated from the theological institution at Hamilton, N. Y., in 1835; was appointed by the Missionary Union to labor in the East, in August of the same year, and arrived in Calcutta the February following; in 1837 went to Madras for purposes of study, and in due time entered upon his work among the Telogoos. In 1840 he went to Bellare, and, with the exception of a short visit to his native country in 1845, labored most faithfully for eighteen years among the native tribes, after which he once more returned in broken health to the United States, and died at Cortlandville, N. Y., in October, 1871. See Baptist Missionary Magazine, November, 1871. (J. C. S.)

Day, Simon, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1745. He was converted while at a boarding-school at Bristol; soon began to preach in the village of Somerset; in 1766 was appointed for Cornwall, but after a while retired from the ministry; in 1779 again entered the itinerant work; in 1817 became a supernumerary at Frome, and died March 17, 1832. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1832.

Day, Warren, a Congregational minister, was born at Sharon, Vt., Oct. 1, 1789. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1814; preached at Richmond, N. Y., from 1816 to 1828; at Orangeville, two years; at Enfield, from 1838 to 1844; at Richmond, from 1845 to 1850; resided at Wawatosa, Wis., from 1854 to 1863, and died at Richmond, N. Y., May 19, 1864. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 207.

Day, William (1), an English prelate, brother of George Day, bishop of Chichester, was admitted to King's College, Cambridge, in 1545; became proctor of Cambridge in 1558; was made, by queen Elizabeth, provost of Eton and dean of Windsor; and made bishop of Winchester, which office he enjoyed scarcely a year, dying of extreme old age in 1596. Unlike his brother, he was a zealous Protestant. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 60.

Day, William (2), an English divine, was born about 1765. He was ordained to the curacy of Dewsbury, Yorkshire, in 1788, where he remained six years and a half; thence removed to Bengeworth, Worcestershire, in which he spent a similar period; in 1801 became assistant to the Rev. T. T. Biddulph, at St. James's, Bristol, with whom he continued till 1810, when he was preferred to the vicarage of St. Philip's by the corporation, at the same time laboring at other places in the vicinity. He died Sept. 7, 1832. See (Lond.) Christian Guardian, November, 1832, p. 425.

Dayken, Alexander, a German martyr, who had been the means of doing much good in other countries, went to Dornick, and for preaching there to the people was apprehended, beheaded, and burned, in 1562. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 394.

Dayton, A. C., a Baptist minister, was born at Plainfield, N. J., Sept. 4, 1813. He joined the Presbyterians at the age of twelve, graduated from the New York City Medical College, and, after practicing a short time, went to Florida for his health; three years afterwards removed to Vicksburg, Miss.; in 1852 united with a Baptist Church, and began at once to preach; subsequently became an agent of the Bible Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, residing in Nashville, Tenn., where he was the associate editor of the Tennessee Baptist, at the same time writing Theodosius, also Infant's Daughter, and several other books for Sunday-schools. During the civil war he was engaged in teaching and in literary pursuits, until his death at Perry, Ga., June 11, 1865. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 319. (J. C. S.)

Dayton, Ezra Fairchild, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mendham, N. J., June 6, 1808. He graduated from New Jersey College in 1826; was principal of an academy in Baskingridge, from 1826 to 1829; spent part of a year in Princeton Seminary; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Newark, Jan. 14, 1834; was stated supply at Augusta, from 1833 to 1836; at Sparta, from 1837 to 1839, and died there in October of the latter year. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 76.

Daza, Antonio, a Spanish theologian and ecclesiastical historian, was born at Valladolid, and lived about 1625. He took the habit of the Franciscans, became overseer of the convent at Valladolid, minister of the province of Concepcion, and commissary-general of his order under Gregory XV. He wrote, Las Crónicas de la Orden de S. Francisco (Valladolid, 1611);—Historia de las Llagas de S. Francisco (Madrid, 1612);—Vida de sor Juana de la Cruz, de la Tercera Orden de S. Francisco (ibid. 1613);—Ejercicios Espirituales (translated into Italian by Antiodocco, Rome, 1616);—La Purissima Concepcion de Nuestra Senora (Madrid, 1621);—Vida de Pedro Regalado (ibid. 1627). Dead, BEATING THE. See CHIRBUT HAK-KEBER.

DEAD, BURNING OF THE. See CREMATION.

DEAD, COMMUNION OF THE. The practice of placing the eucharist within the lips of the dead prevailed in all parts of the Church for some centuries. This and the baptism of the dead were forbidden by councils. Gregory Nazianzen utters a serious warning against them. Even when the better sense of the Church rejected the more revolting usage, the custom continued in a form hardly less superstitious, of placing a portion of the consecrated bread upon the breast of the corpse to be interred with it, as a charm against the attacks of malignant spirits.

Dealtry, Thomas, D.D., a missionary bishop of the Church of England, was born at Nottingley, near Pontefract, in 1795, and was the son of James Dealtry, descended from the ancient family of Dealtry of Lofthouse Hall, near Wakefield, Yorkshire. He was educated at St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated as LL.B. in 1828; was created archdeacon at Calcutta in 1835, and held that office until consecrated bishop of Madras, in 1849. He died March 4, 1861, leaving Sermons on various occasions. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 396.

Deambulatoria (or Deambulacra) were covered porticoes for walking in, more particularly those surrounding a church. They were sometimes of two stories, and occasionally contained altars. The term is also used for the walks of a cloister (q. v.).

Dean, Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, was born about 1430, and was probably educated at St. Mary's College, Oxford, but also studied at Cambridge. He seems to have been one of the black canons, and was prior at Llanthony, in Monmouthshire, before 1481. On Sept. 13, 1494, he was constituted lord chancellor of Ireland; was consecrated bishop of Bangor, Oct. 6, 1496, where he accomplished wonders in the way of restoring cathedrals, and rebuilding the palace. He was translated to the see of Salisbury, Aug. 23, 1499, and was at the same time appointed registrar of the Order of the Garter. He occupied the see of Salisbury little more than a year. During this time he received the great seal, under the title of lord-keeper. He was appointed to the see of Canterbury about 1501. His health began to fail in 1502, and he died Feb. 15, 1503. See Hook, Lives of the Abps. of Canterbury, v, 500 sq.

Dean, Paul, a noted Universalist and Unitarian minister, was born at Barnard, Vt., in 1789. He held the doctrine of the Restorationists, and was pastor of churches in Boston and Easton, Mass. He died at Framingham, Oct. 1, 1860. He published numerous Sermons, etc.

Dean, William, an early Presbyterian minister, was educated at the Log College, N. J.; was taken on trial by the New Brunswick Presbytery, Aug. 8, 1741; licensed Oct. 12, 1742, and was sent to Neshaminy and the Forks of Delaware, a region inhabited by the Lenape, or Delawares, and other tribes. In 1745 he went with Byram of Mendham into Augusta County, Va., where a great awakening attended their labors, and continued until 1751. He was ordained, in 1755, pastor of the Forks of Brandywine, and received a call also from Timber Ridge and the Forks of James River, but it was not put into his hands. He died July 9, 1758. (W. P. S.)

Deane, James, a judge and missionary to the Indians of New York, was born at Groton, Conn., Aug. 20, 1748, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1773. He having been associated in religious work among the Six Nations at the age of twelve, after leaving college was sent as a missionary to the Canadian Indians, and used his influence in the interests of peace. He served in the Revolution with the rank of major, and acted as interpreter at Fort Stanwix. After the war he was long a judge in Oneida County, N. Y., and held other important offices. He died at Westmoreland, in that county, Sept. 10, 1823.

Deane, Samuel (1), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Norton, Mass., July 30, 1733. He graduated from Harvard College in 1760; was settled in 1764 at Falmouth, as colleague to the Rev. Thomas Smith, and died Nov. 12, 1814. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 327.

Deane, Samuel (2), a Congregational minister, was born March 30, 1784, at Mansfield, Mass., and graduated from Brown University in 1805. In 1810 he became pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Scituate, where he remained until his death, Aug. 9, 1834. He published a History of Scituate (1831), besides several poems and sermons.

Deasuil (Celt. deas, "the south," and suil, "a way"), a Druidical ceremony consisting in pacing thrice round an earthen walk, which encompassed the temple externally, and which is still visible at Stonehenge (q. v.). The route represented the course of the sun, being from the east southward to the west. This custom, as a religious rite, is of great antiquity, and very extensive. The benediction of the Deasuil was long used in Ireland, Wales, and the Scottish Highlands, and is said to be at present not entirely extinct.—Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v. See DRUIDS.

Debir, in the mountains of Judah. Lieut. Conder gives an extended argument (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund." Jan. 1875, p. 49 sq.) in favor of locating this place at the modern ed-Dhoheriyeh [see DANAÏH, vol. ii, p. 672], which may be summed up thus: (1) Both names signify the back, i. e. ridge, of the mountains, on which this place is conspicuous; (2) it has ancient remains, consisting of cave dwellings, wells, and cisterns; five old roads lead from it, and large stones, at the distance of about three thousand cubits around it, seem to mark the limits of a Levitical city; (3) there are fine springs in the neighborhood, namely, those of Seil Dilleh, six miles west of Jutta, which feed a brook that runs several miles. To this identification Tristram (Bible Places, p. 61) and Trelawney Saunders (Map of the O. T.) accede. The argument, however, is rather specious than strong: (1) The names do not agree in etymology, and the resemblance in meaning is very doubtful; (2) the ruins show, indeed, an ancient site, but not necessarily the one in question, and the Levitical bounds are particularly dubious; (3) the springs are too distant to indicate any special connection with this locality, which, moreover, is farther from Hebron than we should expect.

De Blois, François Louis. See BLOSIUS.

De Blois, Stephen W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in 1827 at Halifax, N. S. He graduated from Acadia College in June, 1846; studied theology at Newton; was ordained Feb. 26, 1854, in Chester; and in 1855 became pastor of the First Church in Horton, where he remained twenty-seven years. He died at Wolfville, Feb. 4, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 322. (J. C. S.)

Debo (or Bebo) was the twenty-second bishop of Avignon, about 429. He was previously a senator of advanced years, universally beloved for his justice, mildness, and every good work. In 433 he restored the Church of St. Paul, which had been destroyed by the Vandals, and afterwards dedicated it to Sts. Peter and Paul.

De Bollandt, Sebastian. See BOLLANDUS.

Debris, NICOLAS, a French doctor of theology in the 16th century, was one of the four theologians whom Charles IX sent to the Council of Trent. He wrote, Instruction à Supporter les Adversités du Monde (Paris, 1542):—Bref Aiguillon à Aimer l'État de Religion Chrétienne, etc. (ibid. 1544). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Decalvatio (making bald). See CORPORAL INFLECTIONS; PUNISHMENTS.

Decanātus (or Decania), (1) the office of a dean; (2) the district of a rural dean; (3) sometimes a farm or monastic grange, in late charters.

Decāni (or Deans), an order of men instituted in the 9th century, to assist the bishops in the inspection of their dioceses. Seven of the most enlightened men of the congregation were appointed, under the name of decāni, to take charge of the rest. See DEAN.

Decaniſcium was the pastoral staff borne before the patriarch of Constantinople on solemn occasions, delivered to him in the first instance by the emperor. Pancirolus, however, states that it was a silver mace.

Decaniſm (Decania, or Decanica) was an ecclesiastical prison in which criminal clerks were incarcerated by their ecclesiastical superiors. The word is derived from the decāni, who were jailers. By a false etymology it is sometimes written decuſm and diaconism. The clergy, instead of being beheaded or hung for misdemeanors, had suspended from their necks the gospels and the cross, and were imprisoned in one of the decanica of the church. The heretics, by a decree of Arcadius and Honorius, were deprived, with other buildings, of the decanica. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.

Decentius, (1) bishop of Leone, in Spain, was present at the Council of Elvira, A.D. 300 or 301; (2) bishop of Eugubium, in Umbria, about 416. Among the epistles of Innocent I is a letter of praise addressed to him.

De Champs, Victor, cardinal-archbishop of Mechlin, was born Dec. 6, 1810, at Melle. He was a follower of Lamennais, and in the spirit of his teacher wrote for different political periodicals, but in 1832 betook himself to the study of theology. He joined the Redemptorists at St. Trond; soon became famous as a pulpit orator; went on a pilgrimage to Rome in 1850; in 1865 was raised to the episcopal see of Namur, and in 1867 to the archiepiscopal see of Mechlin; and in 1875 was made cardinal, probably for his advocacy of papal infallibility. Bishop De Champs was especially severe against the free-masons, and proved himself a decided Ultramontanist. He died Sept. 29, 1883. (B. P.)

De Charms, Richard, a minister of the New Jerusalem Church, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1797. In early life he was a printer; graduated at Yale College in 1826; the year previous studied Swedenborgianism under Thomas Worcester, D.D., at the same time superintending the publication of the New Jerusalem Magazine; continued his theological researches in Baltimore, Md., and there began to preach in 1828, his first sermon, considered a masterpiece, being published, and afterwards reprinted in London. Its title was The Paramount Importance of Spiritual Things. After a year of pastoral labor in Bedford, Pa., he went to London, studied under Rev. Samuel Noble, and on returning, in 1832, became pastor of the First New Jerusalem Church in Cincinnati, O., and conducted a periodical called The Precursor. Subsequently he preached in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York. In his latter days he devoted much attention to various mechanical contrivances and inventions of his own. He died March 20, 1864. He was the author of Sermons Illustrating the Doctrine of the Lord;—Series of Lectures Delivered at Charleston, S. C.;—The New Churchman;—and Freedom and Slavery in the Light of the New Jerusalem. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1864, p. 598.

Decius, (1) eighth bishop of Macon, is assigned by Severius to the period from 599 to 612; (2) succeeded Deodatus as eleventh bishop of Macon, in the latter part of the 7th century and the beginning of the 8th.

Decker, Christian August Heinrich, a Lutheran minister, was born Oct. 13, 1806, at Husum, in Schleswig, and studied theology at Kiel and Berlin. In 1833 he was appointed collaborator at the Meldorf school, and ten years later, in 1843, was called to the pastorate at Klein-Wesenberg, near Lubeck. In 1863 he was called to Leezen, near Segeberg, and in 1875 to the Thumbye and Struxdorf pastorate, in Angeln. He died June 11, 1884. He was a very active man, and a staunch defender of his Church. He wrote, Ordnung des Gottesdienstes und der Kirchlichen Handlungen, etc. (Altona, 1845):—Die Revolution in Schleswig-Holstein (Hamburg, 1850):—Ueber Gustav-Adolphs Verein und Bekenntnis (ibid. 1861). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i. 266; Luthardt's Allgemeine Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirchenzeitung, 1884, No. 42. (B. P.)

Decker (or Deckher), Conrad, a Dutch theologian of the order of the Jesuits, taught at Heidelberg, and died in 1620, leaving, De Papa Romano et Populo Romano:—De Proprietatibus Jesuitarum, etc. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Deckers, Jan, a Flemish theologian, was born at Hazebruck about 1559. He studied at Douay, became a Jesuit at Naples, taught, at Douay and Louvain, philosophy and theology, and became chancellor of the university at Gratz and rector of the college at Olmutz, in Moravia. He died at Gratz in 1619. His principal works are, Tabula Chronographica (1605):—Theologicæ Dissertationes, etc. (Paris, 1699):—Tabula Expansa Ephemeridum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Declan (or Deglan) (1) was an Irish saint, who wrought with St. Virgilius, St. Rupert, and others in the evangelization of Bavaria, and died at Frisingen, Dec. 1, about the middle of the 8th century; (2) bishop of Ardmore, was a son of Erc and Deitsin, or Dethidin. Through his father he could boast of royal ancestry. He was born at Decies, in the county of Waterford, and probably died about the middle of the 7th century. He is commemorated July 24.

Decret, CLAUDE, a French theologian and moralist, was born at Tournus in 1598. He joined the Jesuits in 1614, and became professor of philosophy and of belles-lettres at Châlons, and afterwards rector of the college in the same town. He died at Paris, April 10, 1668, leaving La Véritable Veue (Paris, 1654). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Decretists, one of the two parties into which the students of canon law in the 12th century were divided in consequence of the general recognition at that period of the supreme authority of the pope. The name is taken from the title of a work, Decretum Gratiani, which formed the basis of their studies in ecclesiastical law. Neander says, "The zeal with which the study of civil and ecclesiastical law was pursued had, however, this injurious effect, that the clergy were thereby drawn away from the study of the Bible, and from the higher, directly theological, interest, and their whole life devoted solely to these pursuits." The opposite party were called Legists. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iv, 203 sq.

Decrētum (or Decretālè) is the letter of the clergy and people of a city, sent to the metropolitan and the comprovincial bishops, signifying the election of a bishop of their city, whom they required to be consecrated. Gregory of Tours says that in the choice of Mauritius the electors could not come to one decretum. The name is also given to a form to be read by the deacon when a bishop is "designated." The difference between this and the foregoing decretum appears to be that the one was sent by the hands of some official of the vacant see immediately on the election of the bishop; if, thereupon, the pope gave his assent, the bishop became technically designate, and the deacon of his church read the decretule or petition for consecration.

Decumānus (or Degeman) was a Welsh saint, who lived a hermit on the seashore at the place called from him St. Decuman's, near Watchet, in Somersetshire. His well was long pointed out there, and a chapel existed in the parish of Wendron, near Helstone, in Cornwall, which was dedicated to him. He is said to have died Aug. 27, 706.

Deda was a presbyter and abbot of Peartaneu (Bardney), in the province of the Lindissi. He is the authority of Bede for what he states concerning the early evangelization of Lincolnshire, and the multitude of people baptized in the Trent by bishop Paulinus in the presence of king Edwin. Bede calls him a faithful man.

Defensor, (1) the first bishop of Angers. Nothing is known of his birth or age. (2) A monk of the monastery Ligugé, which St. Martin founded on the river Calin, not far from Poitiers. He lived about the end of the 7th century or the beginning of the 8th. He was a diligent student of the sa-thers, and by his scholarly habits acquired the title of "Grammarians." He made extracts and compiled a book entitled Scintillarum, seu Sententiarum Catholicorum Patrum. The work is divided into eighty chapters, and treats of the principal Christian virtues. It has appeared, according to Possevin, in three editions: Antwerp, 1550; Venice, 1552; Cologne, 1554.

Degin, bishop of Menevia. See DAVID, St.

Deguerri, GASPARD, a French priest, was born at Lyons in 1797. Having completed his studies in the college of Villefranche, he was in 1820 ordained priest. In 1824 he preached at Lyons, in 1825 and 1826 at Paris, and in the year following Charles X appointed him chaplain of the sixth regiment of the royal guards. After the revolution in 1830 Deguerri resumed preaching again. On his return from Rome, in 1840, he was made canon of Notre Dame, then archpriest, and finally curate of St. Eustatius in 1845 and of St. Magdalene in 1849. He refused the bishopric of Marseilles, offered to him by Napoleon III, but accepted a call as religious instructor of the prince in 1868. Being taken prisoner by the communists, March 18, 1871, he was shot at La Roquette. He wrote, Eloges de Jeanne d'Arc (1828, 1856):—Histoire de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament (1846):—Vie des Saints (1845):—and Sermons on the Lord's Prayer, preached at the Tuileries in 1866. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. P.)

Deharbe, JOSEPH, a German Jesuit, was born in 1800 at Strasburg. In 1817 he joined his order, and was professor at the college of Brieg, in Switzerland, where he educated most of the Jesuits, who since 1848 have acted as missionaries in Germany. He died Nov. 8, 1871, at Maria-Einsiedeln, leaving, Gründliche und leichtfassliche Erklärung des katholischen Katechismus (1857-63, 5 vols.):—Die vollkommene Liebe Gottes (Ratisbon, 1856):—Examen ad Usum Cleri (2d ed. 1849; 3d ed. 1866). (B. P.)

Deioōlāe (worshippers of God) was a name sometimes applied to monks.

Deioōlus (Deel, Deioola, or Dichuill) of Lure was a saint and abbot. He went with St. Columban from Britain to Burgundy, and shared his fortunes at Luxeuil. He was a uterine brother of St. Gallus. Bodily weakness hindered him from following Columban into exile, and although left to perish in the brushwood near the monastery, he found his way to the place where Lutra or Lure now stands, in Burgundy, and built his cell there, which eventually grew into a large and flourishing monastery. He is said to have been visited by the Roman pontiff. After ten years at Lure, seeing death approaching, he appointed Columbinus his successor, and, retiring to greater seclusion, died Jan. 18, 625. His chief festival has always been on that day of the year.

Deihl, MICHAEL, a Lutheran professor, was born near Greencastle, Franklin Co., Pa., in March, 1819. He attended a classical school, in his native town, in 1838; graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1844, and then pursued the course in the Gettysburg Theological Seminary. In 1846 he accepted an appointment to the chair of ancient languages in Wittenberg College, Springfield, O., which position he held until 1868, when impaired health compelled him to resign. In connection with his labors as professor, he took charge of churches at different times in several places near Springfield. He died there, March 29, 1869. In 1859 he published a Biography of Dr. Ezra Keller, first president of Wittenberg College. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1882, p. 220.

Deiniolen (Deiniol ab, Deiniol Ail, or Deiniol Fab) was a Welsh saint of the 6th century. He was a son of Deiniol, first bishop of Bangor. He succeeded his father as second abbot in the monastery at that place, and is said to have founded the church of Llandeiniolen, in Carnarvonshire, in 616. He is commemorated Nov. 23.

De Koven, JAMES, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Middletown, Conn., Sept. 19, 1831. He graduated from Columbia College and the General Theological Seminary; in 1857 took charge of the Church in Delafield, Wis.; and in 1859 removed to Racine, as rector and warden of the university there. In 1875 he was elected bishop of Illinois, but declined. For many years he was a delegate to the General Convention. He died at Racine, March 19, 1879. Dr. De Koven was noted for his High-Church views. A posthumous volume of his Sermons was published by Dr. Dix (N. Y. 1880). See Protestant Episcopal Almanac, 1880, p. 171.

De la Harpe, HENRI, D.D., a distinguished Swiss theologian, was born at Bordeaux, France, in 1809. He pursued his studies in Edinburgh, and gained the first prize in natural philosophy in 1828. The year following he went to Geneva, and finally graduated from the theological seminary of Montauban. In 1832 and 1833 he studied in the seminary just founded by D'Aubigné and his copeers. In 1837 he was called to the chair of Old-Test. exegesis and criticism, which place he filled until the day of his death, in December, 1880, and never consented to receive any compensation for his valuable services. He succeeded D'Aubigné as president of the theological seminary. Professor La Harpe was a broad as well as a deep scholar. He was more or less master of twenty languages. A short time before his death he completed the translation of the Old Test. into French, a work on which he had been engaged twenty-five years. He was president of the Geographical Society of Geneva and the editor of its Journal. See N. Y. Observer, Jan. 6, 1881. (W. P. S.)

De Lasky, JOHN. See LASKO.

Delatores (Informers, sometimes called Calumniatores) were those unfaithful brethren in the early Church, who, for money or favor from the civil authorities, betrayed the Christians into the hands of their persecutors. Titus issued an edict forbidding slaves to inform against their masters, or freedmen against their patrons. It is not wonderful that during and immediately after the days of persecution the informer was regarded with horror. Thus the Council of Elvira, A.D. 305, excommunicated, even on his deathbed, any informer who had caused the proscription or death of the person informed against; for informing in less important cases, the informer might be readmitted to communion after five years; or, if a catechumen, he might be admitted to baptism after five years. The first council of Arles, A.D. 314, reckons among "traditores" not only those who gave up to the persecutors the Holy Scriptures and sacred vessels, but also those who handed in lists of the brethren; and respecting these the council decrees that whoever shall be discovered, from the public records, to have committed such offences shall be solemnly degraded from the clerical order. The capitularies of the Frank kings cite the canon of Elvira. The same capitularies enjoin bishops to excommunicate "accusers of the brethren;" and, even after amendment, not to admit them to holy orders, though they may be admitted to communion. There is attributed to pope Hadrian I a decree: "Let the tongue of an informer be cut out, or let his head be cut off." Precisely the same is found in the Frank capitularies, and nearly the same in the Theodosian code.

Delaune, Thomas, an English Baptist minister and author, was born of Roman Catholic parents in Ireland, near the commencement of the 17th century. He was educated in his native country; was converted in youth; subsequently was teacher in a grammar-school in London, and was ordained as a Baptist minister. The nonconformists of England being invited by Dr. Calamy, at the time one of the chaplains of Charles II, to make a statement of the reasons which led them to dissent from the Established Church, with the assurance that they would be candidly taken into consideration, Delaune published his famous Plea for the Nonconformists (1684, 4to); it passed through twenty editions. The author was severely punished by torture, mutilation, fine, and imprisonment in Newgate, where, after a time, he died. His other works are, Truth Defended, etc. (Lond. 1667):—Survey of Joseph Whiston's Book on Baptism (1676):—The Present State of London (1681):—A Key to Open Scripture Metaphors (1682, 2 vols. fol.). See Hayne, Church Transplanted, p. 169.

Delaune, William, D.D., an English divine, became president of St. John's College, Oxford, in 1696, prebendary of Winchester in 1702, vice-chancellor of Oxford University the same year, Margaret professor of divinity at Oxford in 1715, and died May 23, 1728. He published A Sermon (1702):—and Twelve Sermons (1728). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Le Neve, Fasti, vol. i.

Delaware Version of the Scriptures. This dialect of the Algonquin stock was spoken at the time of the discovery of America, between the Hudson and the Susquehanna rivers, by the Delaware and Minsi tribes. In 1818 the Rev. Christian Frederick Dencke, a Moravian missionary stationed at New Fairfield, in Upper Canada, forwarded a translation of the Epistles of St. John to the board of the American Bible Society, which has been published. (B. P.)

Delbrück, JOHANN FRIEDRICH THEOPHIL, the elder, a German theologian, was born at Magdeburg, Aug. 22, 1768. He studied theology at Halle, was made professor of the gymnasium in his native town, and became rector in 1797. From 1800 to 1809 he had charge of the education of the Prussian princes, and was then appointed member of the privy council. He filled several other offices, and lastly had the superintendence of Zeitz (archbishopric). He died July 4, 1830. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Delfino, Giovanni Pietro, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Brescia in 1709. He studied theology at Venice, was appointed archpriest of San Zenone, and died in 1770, leaving, Il Tempio d. Dio (Brescia, 1760):— Ragionamento, etc. (in the Opuscoli Scientifici of Calogera). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Delfino, Pietro, an Italian theologian, was born at Venice in 1444. He joined the Camaldules at the age of eighteen, was elected vicar-general of his order in 1479, and general in 1480, holding this position, at times with much opposition, until 1515. He died Jan. 15, 1525, leaving Epistole (Venice, 1724). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Delfinone, GIROLAMO, a very eminent artist in pictorial embroidery, flourished at Milan about 1495. He executed a number of subjects from sacred history, some of which represent the history of the Virgin. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Delisle, Joseph, a French theologian, was born at Brainville, in Bassigny, about 1690. He served for some time in the French army, joined the Benedictines at St. Vanne in 1711, taught at the abbey of Moyenne-moutier, then at St. Maurice, in Valais; was appointed abbot of St. Leopold at Nancy, and died at St. Mihiel, Jan. 24, 1766, leaving, Vie de M. Hugy (Nancy, 1831):—L'obligation de Faire l'Aumône (Neufchâteau, 1786):—Le Martyre de la Légion Thébaine (Nancy, 1787):—Histoire du Jérôme (Paris, 1741):—Histoire de l'Abbaye de St. Mihiel (Nancy, 1758). Delitzsch, Johann, eldest son of Dr. Franz Delitzsch, was born at Rostock, Aug. 8, 1846. He studied at Erlangen, Tübingen, and Leipzig, and published as his doctorate dissertation Die Gotteslehre des Thomas von Aquino, in 1870. Two years later he commenced his academic career at Leipzig by presenting his De Inspiratione Scripture Sacre. In 1874 he published in the Studien und Kritiken an essay, Zur Quellenkritik der ältesten Kirchlichen Berichte über Simon Petrus und Simon Magus, which was followed in 1875 by his Lehrsystem der römischen Kirche. He was now made professor extraordinarius at the Leipzig University. In 1876 he published Oehler's Lehrbuch der Symbolik, but in the same year his health gave way, and he died, Feb. 3, at Rapallo, near Genoa. See Schürer, Theologische Literatur-zeitung, 1876, p. 141 sq. (B. P.)

Deliverers, a Christian sect mentioned by Augustine as having arisen about A.D. 260, and who derived their name from the doctrine, which they maintained, that upon Christ's descent into hell infidels believed, and all were delivered from thence.

Dell, William, M.D., an English Baptist minister, was born about 1600. Soon after graduation from the University of Cambridge, he took orders in the Established Church, and officiated in the parish of Yelden, Bedfordshire. In 1645 he became chaplain in the army, and in 1649 was appointed master of Caius College, Cambridge, but was ejected by the act of uniformity. The precise time of his death we have not been able to ascertain. Dr. Dell published several sermons and essays, the most important of which were eventually issued as his Select Works (London, 1773, 8vo). See Hayne, Baptist Cyclopædia, i, 195. (J. C. S.)

Dellingur (twilight), in Norse mythology, was the third husband of Norf's daughter, Not (night); the shining son of this couple was Dagur, or Dag (the day).

Dellius, Godfriedus, a minister of the Reformed Church in Holland, was sent to America in 1683 as assistant to the Rev. Gileon Schaats, in Albany. Mr. Dellius was also an active missionary among the Mohawk Indians. The last ten years of his pastorate exhibit a record of political complications, and his name appears very often in the Documentary History of N. Y., the Colonial History of N. Y., and other records of the time. Of his last days we have no notice. See also Corwin, Manual Ref. Church in America; Dr. Rogers's Historical Discourse, p. 17. (W. J. R. T.)

Delmare, Paolo Marcelli, an Italian theologian, was born at Geneva in 1734. He was converted from Judaism by a priest of his native city, and received baptism in 1753. He entered the clerical ranks, and, after spending several years in missionary work, was called in 1783 to teach theology at Florence; and died Feb. 17, 1821, leaving several controversial treatises, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Demarest, Cornelius T., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, graduated at Columbia College, N. Y., in 1804; studied theology with Dr. Solomon Froeligh; was pastor at White House, N. J., from 1808 to 1813, and at English Neighborhood from 1813 to 1824, when he se-ceded to the True Reformed Church, giving occasion to a celebrated lawsuit as to the Church property (see Taylor, Annals of the Classics of Bergen, p. 261-285). His ministry in the True Reformed Church continued until his decease in 1863, his last eleven years being spent as pastor of the Church in King Street, New York. He published A Lamentation over the Rev. Solomon Froeligh, with copious historical notes. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 69. (W. J. R. T.)

Demetrius. (1) A martyr at Thessalonica, A.D. 296; commemorated Oct. 8 or Oct. 26. (2) Bishop and martyr at Antioch with Anianus, Eutocius, and twenty others; commemorated Nov. 10. (3) Saint; commemorated Dec. 22, with Honoratus and Florus. (4) Patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 281; commemorated March 8 and Oct. 9. (5) Demetrius and Basilus; commemorated Nov. 12.

Demetrius PEPANUS, a Greek theologian, was born on the island of Chios about 1620. He was sent to Rome to finish his studies, and entered into orders, but was released from his vows on account of his health. He returned to his native land, but left the island of Chios with his wife and children in 1655, and it is supposed that he perished in a shipwreck. All his theological writings were intended to bring back the Greek schismatics to the Catholic Church. They were discovered at Chios by the English consul Stellio Rafalli, and were published under the title Demetrii Pepani Domestici Chii Opera quæ Reperiuntur (Rome, 1781, 2 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Demetrius of SURIUM, a Cynic philosopher, was educated in the school of the sophist Rhodius. He spent a considerable part of his life at Corinth, being an opponent of Apollonius of Tyana, and first became famous during the reign of Caligula (A.D. 37-41). The emperor, wishing to secure the philosopher to his party, sent him a large present; but Demetrius refused it with indignation, saying, "If Caligula wishes to bribe me, let him send me his crown." Vespasian banished him for his insolence, but he derided the punishment. He lived to an advanced age, and Seneca observes that nature had brought him forth to show mankind how an exalted genius may live uncorrupted by the vices of the world. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. and Myth. s. v.; Encyclop. Britan. (9th ed.) s. v.

Demme, Hermann Christoph Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian, was born Sept. 7, 1760, at Mülhausen, where, in 1796, he acted as superintendent. In 1801 he was called as general superintendent to Altenburg, and died there, Dec. 21, 1822. He wrote, Beiträge zur reinen Gottesverehrung (Riga, 1792):—Predigten über die Sonn- und Festtagsevangelien (Gotha, 1808):—Neue Reden zur Todtenfeier in Altenburg gehalten (ibid. 1817). He is also the author of several romances, under the pseudonym of Karl Stelle, besides numerous hymns. See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner der 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts, p. 26 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 93, 133, 160, 166, 173, 238, 294, 326, 337, 341, 398; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Democritus was one of the ablest and least known of the Greek philosophers, whose position lies on the border-line between the mythical sages of the elder time and the historic founders of Greek philosophy. His personal career is shadowy and uncertain; his speculations are fragmentary and dislocated; his works have been lost, or only survive in brief and disconnected fragments; his tenets are well known, but have often been exaggerated or distorted. His influence on later philosophy has not always been duly appreciated; but it has been scarcely inferior to that of Socrates and the Socratic school. His characteristic doctrines were transmitted by underground currents to widely diffused sects. They have special claims to present consideration for their marked congruity with the rationalistic and agnostic schemes now in vogue. In all ages there is an unbroken tradition of earlier opinions, and an intimate connection between the accepted theories and the contemporaneous conditions of the societies in which they prevail. In both respects, the philosophy of Democritus was notable in the æra of its manifestation, and it may be of great service for the elucidation, in both, of the philosophical distemperature of the respective periods.

I. Life.—The dates of the birth and death of Democritus, and his length of days, are entirely uncertain, though he may be regarded as later than Anaxagoras, and contemporaneous with Socrates. He appears to have been born at Abdera about B.C. 460, and to have died about B.C. 357. He is variously stated to have attained ninety, ninety-nine, one hundred, one hundred and four, one hundred and eight, and even one hundred and nine years. He was the son of Hegesistratus (by some named Damasippus, by others, Athenocritus), who was said to have entertained Xerxes on his flight from Salamis. Fables clustered round his name. Three autobiographical notices survive. The first states that he was forty years younger than Anaxagoras; the second, that the Little Diacosmos was composed "seven hundred and thirty years after the taking of Troy;" the third, "that he had traversed more countries than any of his countrymen" (Herodotus would be included); "that he had known the greatest diversities of climate and soil, and had heard many sages; that he had never been surpassed in geometrical diagrams and demonstrations, not even by the Egyptian Arpedonapta, with whom he had lived five years." Very little information is contained in these statements.

The death of his father left Democritus with an ample inheritance. He is reported to have taken the smallest share in the distribution of the property, as it was in ready money, immediately available for the travels which he promptly undertook. The rest of the estate he abandoned to his brothers. If this were the case, the epigrammatic observation of Horace would be deprived of its point (1 Epist. xii, 12).

Many legends were current in regard to the travels of Democritus among the Ethiopians, Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians, and even Indian Gymnosophists. A very pretty story is told of an imaginary visit to the king of Persia; but the same tale is told, in slightly altered form, in many lands. Darius was inconsolable for the loss of his queen. Democritus promised to recall her from the dead, if he were supplied with all things needed for the avocation. Whatever was required was furnished in abundance; but one thing more was demanded—the names of three persons who had never felt sorrow, to be inscribed on the tomb.

Democritus visited Athens (Fragm. Promisc. 7). He is reported to have resided there—to have known Socrates—but to have kept himself wholly unknown; "Constantem hominem et gravem! qui gloriatur, a Gloria se abfuisse" (Cicero, Tusc. Disp. V, xxxvi, 104). His whole career is a fabric of fables (Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. X, xii, 8). He is alleged to have shut himself up in tombs, that he might be free from interruption and distraction of mind. As Bayle suggests, the advantages of such a procedure are questionable. Bayle also characterizes as a "silly story" the tradition that he put out his eyes in order to promote his meditations (Cicero, De Fin. v, 29); Cicero prudently appends "cero falsone" as a restriction to his statement.

Democritus returned from his long travels enriched with great and varied knowledge, but stripped of means, which had been expended on his journeys. Thenceforth he may have been dependent upon his brother Damastes for support. The tradition represented that he was summoned before the magistrates of Abdera, for infringing the laws by living without
